37. The Court first recalls that in its Steel and Others judgment, it noted that the expression "to be of good behaviour" "was particularly imprecise and offered little guidance to the person bound over as to the type of conduct which would amount to a breach of the order" (ibid., pp. 2739-40, § 76). Those considerations apply equally in the present case, where the applicants were not charged with any criminal offence, and were found not to have breached the peace.

38. The Court next notes that conduct contra bonos mores is defined as behaviour which is "wrong rather than right in the judgment of the majority of contemporary fellow citizens" (see paragraph 13 above). It cannot agree with the Government that this definition has the same objective element as conduct "likely to cause annoyance", which was at issue in the Chorherr case (see paragraph 29 above). The Court considers that the question of whether conduct is "likely to cause annoyance" is a question which goes to the very heart of the nature of the conduct proscribed: it is conduct whose likely consequence is the annoyance of others. Similarly, the definition of breach of the peace given in the case of Percy v. Director of Public Prosecutions (see paragraph 11 above) – that it includes conduct the natural consequences of which would be to provoke others to violence – also describes behaviour by reference to its effects. Conduct which is "wrong rather than right in the judgment of the majority of contemporary fellow citizens", by contrast, is conduct which is not described at all, but merely expressed to be "wrong" in the opinion of a majority of citizens.

39. Nor can the Court agree that the Government's other examples of behaviour which is defined by reference to the standards expected by the majority of contemporary opinion are similar to conduct contra bonos mores as in each case cited by the Government the example given is but one element of a more comprehensive definition of the proscribed behaviour.

40. With specific reference to the facts of the present case, the Court does not accept that it must have been evident to the applicants what they were being ordered not do for the period of their binding over. Whilst in the case of Steel and Others the applicants had been found to have breached the peace, and the Court found that it was apparent that the binding over related to similar behaviour (ibid.), the present applicants did not breach the peace, and given the lack of precision referred to above, it cannot be said that what they were being bound over not to do must have been apparent to them.

41. The Court thus finds that the order by which the applicants were bound over to keep the peace and not to behave contra bonos mores did not comply with the requirement of Article 10 § 2 of the Convention that it be "prescribed by law".

42. In these circumstances, the Court is not required to consider the remainder of the issues under Article 10 of the Convention.

43. It follows that there has been a violation of Article 10 of the Convention.

III. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 41 OF THE CONVENTION

44. Article 41 of the Convention provides:

> "If the Court finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. Costs and expenses

45. The applicants claimed a total of 6,000 pounds sterling plus value-added tax in respect of costs and expenses in the Strasbourg proceedings, less amounts received by way of legal aid before the Court and Commission. The Government agreed with this figure.

The Court is satisfied that the claim for costs and expenses is reasonable, and should be reimbursed in its entirety.

B. Default interest

46. According to the information available to the Court, the statutory rate of interest applicable in England and Wales at the date of adoption of the present judgment is 7.5% per annum.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Holds unanimously that it is not necessary to examine the applicants' complaint under Article 11 of the Convention;

2. Holds by sixteen votes to one that there has been a violation of Article 10 of the Convention;

3. Holds unanimously
   (a) that the respondent State is to pay the applicants, within three months, for costs and expenses, 6,000 (six thousand) pounds sterling, together with any value-added tax that may be chargeable less the sums paid by way of legal aid;
   (b) that simple interest at an annual rate of 7.5% shall be payable from the expiry of the above-mentioned three months until settlement.

Done in English and in French, and delivered at a public hearing in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 25 November 1999.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE BAKA

It is not the task of an international judge to defend a national institution which clearly shows certain shortcomings. The magistrates' power to bind over – as the Law Commission's report on the subject explains – is based on "conduct which … is too vaguely defined; … binding-over orders when made are in terms which are too vague and are therefore potentially oppressive; … the power to imprison someone if he or she refuses to consent to be bound over is anomalous ...". For these and other reasons the Law Commission even recommended abolition of the power to bind over.

On the other hand, it is not easy to destroy old, established institutions which are deeply rooted in a country's legal system and have proved their usefulness over the centuries for protecting the rights of the public, as in the present case. If we look at the concrete circumstances of the case, what the applicants did according to the national courts' finding was "a deliberate attempt to interfere with the Portman Hunt and to take the hounds out of … control ...". They were avowed hunt saboteurs and as such they deliberately tried seriously to disturb other people's lawfully organised pleasure and leisure activity or even make it impossible. Their action, according to the Crown Court's findings, had not resulted in "violence or threats of violence on this occasion, so that it could not be said that any breach of the peace had been committed or threatened". On the other hand, their action, in my opinion, definitely required an adequate and proportionate legal response in order to protect others.

I agree with the Court that this case is different from the case of Steel and Others v. the United Kingdom (judgment of 23 September 1998, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1998-VII), in which the binding-over decision was based on breaches of the peace, while in the present case the findings against the applicants were based on behaviour contra bonos mores. In the Steel and Others case the Court was satisfied that binding-over orders had been imposed after a finding that the applicants had committed a breach of the peace, the elements of which – according to the Court's findings – "were adequately defined by English law" (see the Steel and Others judgment, p. 2739, § 75). What I do not agree with is that "the order by which the applicants were bound over to keep the peace and not to behave contra bonos mores did not comply with the requirement of Article 10 § 2 of the Convention that it be prescribed by law" (see paragraph 41 of the judgment).

The Court, when analysing the "prescribed by law" requirement of Article 10 § 2, has always reiterated that "the level of precision required of the domestic legislation – which cannot in any case provide for every eventuality – depends to a considerable degree on the content of the instrument considered, the field it is designed to cover and the number and status of those to whom it is addressed". It has pointed out also that "it is primarily for the national authorities to interpret and apply domestic law" (see the Chorherr v. Austria judgment of 25 August 1993, Series A no. 266-B, pp. 35-36, § 25).

On the basis of these elements of foreseeability, I am of the opinion that in the concrete circumstances of the case, the applicants should have known what kind of behaviour was contra bonos mores. It is true that the requirement is broadly defined, but taking into account the nature of the disturbance and the limited number of offenders, the institution of binding over to be of good behaviour imposed an unmistakable obligation on the applicants, namely to refrain from any offensive and deliberate action which could disturb the lawfully organised activity of others engaged in fox hunting. In my view, the "keep the peace or be of good behaviour" obligation has to be interpreted in the light of the specific anti-social behaviour committed by the applicants. In this context, I think that the binding-over requirement was foreseeable and enabled the applicants to a reasonable extent to behave accordingly.

On this basis, I think that the interference with the applicants' rights under Article 10 § 2 not only served a legitimate aim but was also prescribed by law and necessary in a democratic society. Consequently, I find no breach of Article 10 of the Convention.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

THIRD SECTION

CASE OF HATTON AND OTHERS v. THE UNITED KINGDOM

(Application no. 36022/97)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

2 October 2001

THIS CASE WAS REFERRED TO THE GRAND CHAMBER, WHICH DELIVERED JUDGMENT IN THE CASE ON
08/07/2003

In the case of Hatton and Others v. the United Kingdom,

The European Court of Human Rights (Third Section), sitting as a Chamber composed of:

Mr J.-P. COSTA, President,
Mr L. LOUCAIDES,
Mr P. KŪRIS,
Mrs F. TULKENS,
Mr K. JUNGWIERT,
Mrs H.S. GREVE, judges,
Sir Brian KERR, ad hoc judge,
and Mrs S. DOLLÉ, Section Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 16 May 2000, 4 July 2000 and on 11 September 2001,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case originated in an application (no. 36022/97) against the United Kingdom lodged on 6 May 1997 with the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") under former Article 25 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") by eight United Kingdom nationals, Ruth Hatton, Peter Thake, John Hartley, Philippa Edmunds, John Cavalla, Jeffray Thomas, Richard Bird and Tony Anderson ("the applicants").

2. The applicants were represented by Mr Richard Buxton, a lawyer practising in Cambridge. The Government of the United Kingdom ("the Government") were represented by their Agent, Mr Huw Llewellyn, Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

3. Following the entry into force of Protocol No. 11 to the Convention on 1 November 1998, and in accordance with the provisions of Article 5 § 2 thereof, the case falls to be examined by the Court.

4. The application was allocated to the Third Section of the Court (Rule 52 § 1 of the Rules of Court). Within that Section, the Chamber that would consider the case (Article 27 § 1 of the Convention) was constituted as provided in Rule 26 § 1 of the Rules of Court. Sir Nicolas Bratza, the judge elected in respect of the United Kingdom, withdrew from sitting in the case (Rule 28). The Government accordingly appointed Sir Brian Kerr to sit as an ad hoc judge (Article 27 § 2 of the Convention and Rule 29 § 1).

5. A hearing on admissibility and merits (Rule 54 § 4) took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 16 May 2000.

There appeared before the Court:

(a) for the Government
Mr H. LLEWELLYN, Agent,
Mr J. EADIE, Counsel,
Mr P. REARDON, Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, Adviser;

(b) for the applicants
Mr D. ANDERSON QC, Counsel,
Mr R. BUXTON,
Mrs S. RING, Solicitors,
Mr C. STANBURY, Adviser,
Mrs R. HATTON,
Mr J. THOMAS,
Mr A. ANDERSON, Applicants.

6. By a decision of 16 May 2000, following the hearing, the Chamber declared the application admissible.

7. The applicants and the Government each filed observations on the merits (Rule 59 § 1).

8. On 30 May 2000, third-party comments were received from British Airways, which had been given leave by the President following the hearing to intervene in the written procedure (Article 36 § 2 of the Convention and Rule 61 § 3).

THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

The position of the individual applicants

9. The noise levels experienced by each applicant, and the effect on each of them individually, are as follows:

10. Ruth Hatton was born in 1963 and, until 1997, lived in East Sheen with her husband and two children. From 1993, when the level of night noise increased, Mrs Hatton found the noise levels to be “intolerable” at night. The noise levels were greater when aircraft are landing at Heathrow from the east. When this happened, Mrs Hatton was unable to sleep without ear plugs and her children were frequently woken up before 6 a.m., and sometimes before 5 a.m. If Mrs Hatton did not wear ear plugs, she would be woken by aircraft activity at around 4 a.m. She was sometimes able to go back to sleep, but found it impossible to go back to sleep once the "early morning bombardment" started which, in the winter of 1996/1997, was between 5 a.m. and 5.30 a.m. When she was woken in this manner, Mrs Hatton tended to suffer from a headache for the rest of the day. When aircraft were landing from the west the noise levels were lower, and Mrs Hatton's children slept much better, generally not waking up until after 6.30 a.m. In the winter of 1993/1994, Mrs Hatton became so run down and depressed by her broken sleep pattern that her doctor prescribed anti-depressants. In October 1997, Mrs Hatton moved with her family to Kingston-upon-Thames in order to get away from the aircraft noise at night.

11. Peter Thake was born in 1965. From 1990 until 1998, he lived in Hounslow with his partner. His home in Hounslow was situated approximately 4 km from Heathrow airport and slightly to the north of the southern flight path. In about 1993, the level of disturbance at night from aircraft noise increased notably, and Mr Thake began to be woken or kept awake at night by aircraft noise. Mr Thake found it particularly difficult to sleep in warmer weather, when open windows increased the disturbance from aircraft noise, and closed windows made it too hot to sleep. Mr Thake found it difficult to go back to sleep after being woken by aircraft noise early in the morning. He was sometimes kept awake by aeroplanes flying until midnight or 1 a.m. and then woken between 4 a.m. and 5 a.m. Mr Thake was also sometimes woken by aeroplanes flying at odd hours in the middle of the night, for example when diverted from another airport. In 1997, Mr Thake became aware that he could complain to the Heathrow Noise Line about aircraft noise if he made a note of the time of the flight. By 30 April 1997, Mr Thake had been sufficiently disturbed to note the time of a flight, and made a complaint to the Heathrow Noise Line on 19 occasions. Mr Thake remained in Hounslow until February 1998 because his family, friends and place of work were in the Heathrow area. Mr Thake moved to Winchester, Hampshire, when a suitable job opportunity arose, even though it meant leaving his family and friends, in order to escape from the aircraft noise, which was "driving [him] barmy".

12. John Hartley was born in 1948 and lives in Richmond with his wife. He has lived at his present address since 1989. His house is about 8 miles (13 km) from Heathrow airport, and is situated almost directly under the approach to the airport's southern runway. The windows of the house are double-glazed. From 1993, Mr Hartley noticed a "huge" increase in the disturbance caused by flights between 6 a.m. and 6.30 a.m. (or 8 a.m. on Sundays). The British Airports Authority did not operate a practice of alternation (using only one runway for landings for half the day, and then switching landings to the other runway) during this period as it did during the day, and the airport regularly had aircraft landing from the east on both runways. When the wind was blowing from the west and aeroplanes were landing from the east, which was about 70% of the time, aircraft noise would continue until about midnight, so that Mr Hartley was unable to go to sleep earlier than midnight. He would then find it impossible to sleep after 6 a.m. on any day of the week, and was usually disturbed by aircraft noise at about 5 a.m., after which he found he could not go back to sleep. When the aeroplanes were landing from the west, Mr Hartley was able to sleep.

13. Philippa Edmunds was born in 1954 and lives with her husband and two children in East Twickenham. She has lived at her present address since 1992. Ms Edmund's house is approximately one kilometre from the Heathrow flight path. Before 1993, Ms Edmunds was often woken by aircraft noise at around 6 a.m. From 1993, she tended to be woken at around 4 a.m. In 1996, Ms Edmunds and her husband installed double-glazing in their bedroom to try to reduce the noise. Although the double-glazing reduced the noise, Ms Edmunds continued to be woken by aircraft. Ms Edmunds suffered from ear infections in 1996 and 1997 as a result of wearing ear plugs at night, and although she was advised by a doctor to stop using them, she continued to do so in order to be able to sleep. Ms Edmunds was also concerned about the possible long-term effects of using ear plugs, including an increased risk of tinnitus. Ms Edmunds's children both suffered from disturbance by aircraft noise.

14. John Cavalla was born in 1925. From 1970 to 1996, he lived in Isleworth. Mr Cavalla lives with his wife. Mr Cavalla's house in Isleworth was directly under the flight path of the northern runway at Heathrow airport. In the early 1990s, the noise climate deteriorated markedly, partly as a result of a significant increase in traffic, but mainly as a result of aircraft noise in the early morning. Mr Cavalla noticed that air traffic increased dramatically between 6 a.m. and 7 a.m. as a result of the shortening of the night quota period. Mr Cavalla found that, once woken by an aircraft arriving at Heathrow airport in the early morning, he was unable to go back to sleep. In 1996, Mr Cavalla and his wife moved to Sunbury in order to get away from the aircraft noise. After moving house, Mr Cavalla did not live under the approach tracks for landing aircraft, and aircraft used the departure route passing over his new home only very rarely at night. Consequently, Mr Cavalla was only very rarely exposed to any night-time aircraft noise following his move.

15. Jeffray Thomas was born in 1928 and lives in Kew with his wife and two sons, and the wife and son of one of those sons. Mr Thomas has lived at his present address since 1975. His house lies between the north and south Heathrow flight paths. Aircraft pass overhead on seven or eight days out of every ten, when the prevailing wind is from the west. Mr Thomas noticed a sudden increase in night disturbance in 1993. Mr Thomas would find that he was awoken at 4.30 a.m., when three or four large aircraft tended to arrive within minutes of each other. Once he was awake, one large aeroplane arriving every half an hour was sufficient to keep him awake until 6 a.m. or 6.30 a.m., when the aeroplanes started arriving at frequencies of up to one a minute until about 11 p.m.

16. Richard Bird was born in 1933 and lived in Windsor for 30 years until he retired in December 1998. His house in Windsor was directly under the westerly flight path to Heathrow airport. In recent years, and particularly from 1993, he and his wife suffered from intrusive aircraft noise at night. Although Mr Bird observed that both take-offs and landings continued later and later into the evenings, the main problem was caused by the noise of early morning landings. He stated that on very many occasions he was woken at 4.30 a.m. and 5 a.m. by incoming aircraft, and was then unable to get back to sleep, and felt extremely tired later in the day. Mr Bird retired in December 1998, and he and his wife moved to Wokingham, in Surrey, specifically to get away from the aircraft noise which was "really getting on [his] nerves".

17. Tony Anderson was born in 1932 and lives in Touchen End, which is under the approach to runway 09L at Heathrow airport, and approximately 9 or 10 nautical miles from the runway. Mr Anderson has lived in Touchen End since 1963. By 1994, Mr Anderson began to find that his sleep was being disturbed by aircraft noise at night, and that he was being woken at 4.15 a.m. or even earlier by aircraft coming in from the west to land at Heathrow airport.

The regulatory regime for Heathrow airport

18. Heathrow airport is the busiest airport in Europe, and the busiest international airport in the world. It is used by over 90 airlines, serving over 180 destinations world-wide. It is the United Kingdom's leading port in terms of visible trade.

19. Restrictions on night flights at Heathrow airport were introduced in 1962 and have been reviewed periodically, most recently in 1988, 1993 and 1998.

20. Between 1978 and 1987, a number of reports into aircraft noise and sleep disturbance were published by or on behalf of the Civil Aviation Authority.

21. A Consultation Paper was published by the United Kingdom Government in November 1987 in the context of a review of the night restrictions policy at Heathrow. The Consultation Paper stated that research into the relationship between aircraft noise and sleep suggested that the number of movements at night could be increased by perhaps 25% without worsening disturbance, provided Leq were not increased (dBA Leq metric is a measurement of noise exposure).

22. It indicated that there were two reasons for not considering a ban on night flights: first, that a ban on night flights would deny airlines the ability to plan some scheduled flights in the night period, and to cope with disruptions and delays; secondly, that a ban on night flights would damage the status of Heathrow airport as a 24-hour international airport (with implications for safety and maintenance and the needs of passengers) and its competitive position in relation to a number of other European airports.

23. From 1988 to 1993, night flying was regulated solely by means of a limitation upon the number of take-offs and landings permitted at night. The hours of restriction were as follows:

Summer	11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m. weekdays
	11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m. Sunday landings
	11.30 p.m. to 8 a.m. Sunday take-offs
Winter	11.30 p.m. to 6.30 a.m. weekdays
	11.30 p.m. to 8 a.m. Sunday take-offs and landings

24. In July 1990, the Department of Transport commenced an internal review of the restrictions on night flights. A new classification of aircraft and the development of a quota count system were the major focus of the review. As part of the review, the Department of Transport asked the Civil Aviation Authority to undertake further objective study of aircraft noise and sleep disturbance.

25. The fieldwork for the study was carried out during the summer of 1991. Measurements of disturbance were obtained from 400 subjects living in the vicinity of Heathrow, Gatwick, Stansted and Manchester airports. The findings were published in December 1992 as the "Report of a Field Study of Aircraft Noise and Sleep Disturbance" ("the 1992 sleep study"). It found that, once asleep, very few people living near airports were at risk of any substantial sleep disturbance due to aircraft noise and that, compared with the overall average of about 18 nightly awakenings without any aircraft noise, even large numbers of noisy night-time aircraft noise movements would cause very little increase in the average person's nightly awakenings. It concluded that the results of the field study provided no evidence to suggest that aircraft noise was likely to cause harmful after effects. It also emphasised, however, that its conclusions were based on average effects, and that some of the subjects of the study (2 to 3%) were over 60% more sensitive than average.

26. In January 1993, the Government published a Consultation Paper regarding a proposed new scheme for regulating night flights at the three main airports serving London: Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted. In considering the demand for night flights, the Consultation Paper made reference to the fact that if restrictions on night flights were imposed in the United Kingdom, certain flights would not be as convenient or their costs would be higher than competitors abroad could offer, and that passengers would choose alternatives that better suited their requirements.

27. It also stated that various foreign operators were based at airports with no night restrictions, which meant that they could keep prices down by achieving a high utilisation of aircraft, and that this was a crucial factor in attracting business in what was a highly competitive and price sensitive market.

28. Further, the Consultation Paper stated that both scheduled and charter airlines believed that their operations could be substantially improved by being allowed more movements during the night period, especially landings.

It also indicated that charter companies required the ability to operate in the night period, as they operated in a highly competitive, price sensitive market and needed to contain costs as much as possible. The commercial viability of their business depended upon high utilisation of their aircraft, which typically required three rotations a day to nearer destinations, and which could only be fitted in using movements at night.

29. Finally, in reference to the demand for night flights, the Consultation Paper referred to the continuing demand for some all-cargo flights at night carrying mail and other time-sensitive freight such as newspapers and perishable goods, and referred to the fact that all-cargo movements are banned, whether arriving or departing, for much of the day at Heathrow airport.

30. The Consultation Paper referred to the 1992 sleep study stating that the 1992 sleep study found that the number of disturbances caused by aircraft noise was so small that it had a negligible effect on overall normal disturbance rates, and that disturbance rates from all causes were not at a level likely to affect people's health or well-being.

31. The Consultation Paper further stated that, in keeping with the undertaking given in 1988 not to allow a worsening of noise at night, and ideally to improve it, it was proposed that the quota for the next five years based on the new system should be set at a level so as to keep overall noise levels below those in 1988.

32. A considerable number of responses to the Consultation Paper were received from trade and industry associations with an interest in air travel (including the International Air Transport Association ["IATA"], the Confederation of British Industry and the London and Thames Valley Chambers of Commerce) and from airlines, all of which emphasised the economic importance of night flights. Detailed information and figures were provided by the associations and the airlines to support their responses.

33. On 6 July 1993 the Secretary of State for Transport announced his intention to introduce, with effect from October 1993, a quota system of night flying restrictions, the stated aim of which was to reduce noise at the three main London airports, which included Heathrow ("the 1993 Scheme").

34. The 1993 Scheme introduced a noise quota scheme for the night quota period. Under the noise quota scheme each aircraft type was assigned a "quota count" between 0.5 QC (for the quietest) and 16 QC (for the noisiest). Heathrow airport was then allotted a certain number of quota points, and aircraft movements had to be kept within the permitted points total. The effect of this was that, under the 1993 Scheme, rather than a maximum number of individual aircraft movements being specified, aircraft operators could choose within the noise quota whether to operate a greater number of quieter aeroplanes or a lesser number of noisier aeroplanes. The system was designed, according to the 1993 Consultation Paper, to encourage the use of quieter aircraft by making noisier types use more of the quota for each movement.

35. The 1993 Scheme defined "night" as the period between 11 p.m. and 7 a.m., and further defined a "night quota period" from 11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m., seven days a week, throughout the year, when the controls were strict. During the night, operators were not permitted to schedule the noisier types of aircraft to take off (8 QC – quota count – or 16 QC) or to land (16 QC). During the night quota period, aircraft movements were restricted by a movements limit and a noise quota, which were set for each season (summer and winter).

36. The 1993 Consultation Paper had proposed a rating of 0 QC for the quietest aircraft. This would have allowed an unlimited number of these aircraft to fly at night, and the Government took account of objections to this proposal in deciding to rate the quietest aircraft at 0.5 QC. Otherwise, the 1993 Scheme was broadly in accordance with the proposals set out in the 1993 Consultation Paper.

37. The local authorities for the areas around the three main London airports sought judicial review of the Secretary of State's decision to introduce the 1993 Scheme, making four consecutive applications for judicial review and appealing twice to the Court of Appeal (see paragraphs 70-73 below) In consequence of the various judgments delivered by the High Court and Court of Appeal, the Government consulted on revised proposals in October and November 1993; commissioned a study by ANMAC (the Aircraft Noise Monitoring Advisory Committee of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions [formerly the Department of Transport; "the DETR"]) in May 1994 into ground noise at night at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports; added to the quota count system an overall maximum number of aircraft movements; issued a further Consultation Paper in March 1995, and issued a supplement to the March 1995 Consultation Paper in June 1995.

38. The June 1995 supplement stated that the Secretary of State's policies and the proposals based on them allowed more noise than was experienced from actual aircraft movements in the summer of 1988, and acknowledged that this was contrary to Government policy, as expressed in the 1993 Consultation Paper. As part of the 1995 review of the 1993 Scheme, the Government reviewed the Civil Aviation Authority reports on aircraft noise and sleep disturbance, including the 1992 sleep study. The DETR prepared a series of papers on night arrival and departure statistics at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports, scheduling and curfews in relation to night movements, runway capacity between 6 a.m. and 7 a.m., Heathrow night arrivals for four sample weeks in 1994, and Heathrow night departures for four sample weeks in 1994. The DETR also considered a paper prepared by Heathrow Airport Limited on the implications of a prohibition on night flights between 12 a.m. and 5.30 a.m.

39. On 16 August 1995, the Secretary of State for Transport announced that the noise quotas and all other aspects of the night restrictions regime would remain as previously announced. In July 1996, the Court of Appeal decided that the Secretary of State had given adequate reasons and sufficient justification for his conclusion that it was reasonable, on balance, to run the risk of diminishing to some degree local people's ability to sleep at nights because of the other countervailing considerations to which he was, in 1993, willing to give greater weight, and that by June 1995 errors in the consultation papers had been corrected and the new policy could not be said to be irrational. On 12 November 1996, the House of Lords dismissed a petition by the local authorities for leave to appeal against the decision of the Court of Appeal.

40. The movement limits for Heathrow under the 1993 Scheme, introduced as a consequence of the legal challenges in the domestic courts, were set at 2,550 per winter season from 1994/1995 to 1997/1998, and 3,250 per summer season from 1995 to 1998 (the seasons being deemed to change when the clocks change from GMT to BST). The noise quotas for Heathrow up to the summer of 1998 were set at 5,000 for each winter season and 7,000 for each summer season. Flights involving emergencies were excluded from the restrictions. The number of movements permitted during the night quota period (i.e. from 11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m.) remained at about the same level as between 1988 and 1993. At the same time, the number of movements permitted during the night period (i.e. from 11 p.m. to 7 a.m.) increased under the 1993 Scheme due to the reduction in the length of the night quota period.

41. In September 1995, a trial was initiated at Heathrow airport of modified procedures for early morning landings (those between 4 a.m. and 6.00 a.m.). The aim of the trial, which was conducted by National Air Traffic Services Limited on behalf of the DETR, was to help alleviate noise over parts of central London in the early morning. An interim report, entitled "Assessment of Revised Heathrow Early Mornings Approach Procedures Trial", was published in November 1998.

42. In December 1997, a study, commissioned by the DETR and carried out by the National Physical Laboratory gave rise to a report, "Night noise contours: a feasibility study", which was published in December 1997. The report contained a detailed examination of the causes and consequences of night noise, and identified possible areas of further research. It concluded that there was not enough research evidence to produce "scientifically robust night contours that depict levels of night-time annoyance".

43. In 1998, the Government conducted a two-stage consultation exercise on night restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports. In February 1998, a preliminary Consultation Paper on night restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted was published. The Preliminary Consultation Paper stated that most night movements catered primarily for different needs from those that took place during the daytime, and set out reasons for allowing night flights. These were essentially the same as those given in the 1993 Consultation Paper.

44. In addition, the Preliminary Consultation Paper referred to the fact that air transport was one of the fastest growing sectors of the world economy and contained some of the United Kingdom's most successful firms. Air transport facilitated economic growth, world trade, international investment and tourism, and was of particular importance to the United Kingdom because of its open economy and geographical position. The Consultation Paper went on to say that permitting night flights, albeit subject to restrictions, at major airports in the United Kingdom had contributed to this success.

45. The Government set movement limits and noise quotas for winter 1998/99 at the same level as for the previous winter, in order to allow adequate time for consultation.

46. The British Air Transport Association ("BATA") commissioned a report from Coopers & Lybrand into the economic costs of maintaining the restrictions on night flights. The report was published in July 1997 and was entitled "The economic costs of night flying restrictions at the London airports". The report concluded that the economic cost of the then current restrictions being maintained during the period 1997/1998 to 2002/2003 was about £850 million. BATA submitted the report to the Government when it responded to the Preliminary Consultation Paper.

47. On 10 September 1998, the Government announced that the movement limits and noise quotas for summer 1999 would be the same as for summer 1998.

48. In November 1998, the Government published the second stage Consultation Paper on night restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted. The Consultation Paper stated that it had been the view of successive Governments that the policy on night noise should be firmly based on research into the relationship between aircraft noise and interference with sleep and that, in order to preserve the balance between the different interests, this should continue to be the basis for decisions. The Consultation Paper indicated that 'interference with sleep' was intended to cover both sleep disturbance (an awakening from sleep, however short) and sleep prevention (a delay in first getting to sleep at night, and awakening and then not being able to get back to sleep in the early morning). The Consultation Paper stated that further research into the effect of aircraft noise on sleep had been commissioned, which would include a review of existing research in the United Kingdom and abroad, and a trial to assess methodology and analytical techniques to determine whether to proceed to a full scale study of either sleep prevention or total sleep loss.

49. The Consultation Paper repeated the finding of the 1992 sleep study that for noise events in the range of 90-100 dBA SEL (80-95 dBA Lmax), the likelihood of the average person being awakened by an aircraft noise event was about 1 in 75. It acknowledged that the 1 in 75 related to sleep disturbance, and not to sleep prevention, and that while there was a substantial body of research on sleep disturbance, less was known about sleep prevention or total sleep loss.

50. The Consultation Paper stated that the objectives of the current review were, in relation to Heathrow, to strike a balance between the need to protect local communities from excessive aircraft noise levels at night and to provide for air services to operate at night where they are of benefit to the local, regional and national economy; to ensure that the competitive factors affecting United Kingdom airports and airlines and the wider employment and economic implications were taken into account; to take account of the research into the relationship between aircraft noise and interference with sleep and any health effects; to encourage the use of quieter aircraft at night; to put in place at Heathrow, for the night quota period (11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m.), arrangements which would bring about further improvements in the night noise climate around the airport over time and to update the arrangements as appropriate.

51. The Consultation Paper stated that since the introduction of the 1993 Scheme, there had been an improvement in the noise climate around Heathrow during the night quota period, based on the total of the quota count ratings of aircraft counted against the noise quota, but that there had probably been a deterioration over the full night period between 11 p.m. and 7 a.m. as a result of the growth in traffic between 6 a.m. and 7 a.m.

52. The Consultation Paper found a strong customer preference for overnight long-haul services from the Asia-Pacific region.

53. The Consultation Paper indicated that the Government had not attempted to quantify the aviation and economic benefits of night flights in monetary terms. This was because of the difficulties in obtaining reliable and impartial data on passenger and economic benefits (some of which was commercially sensitive) and modelling these complex interactions. BATA had submitted a copy of the Coopers & Lybrand July 1997 report with its response to the Preliminary Consultation Paper, and the Consultation Paper noted that the report estimated the value of an additional daily long haul scheduled night flight at Heathrow to be £20m to £30m per year, over half of which was made up of airline profits. The Consultation Paper stated that the financial effects on airlines were understood to derive from estimates made by a leading United Kingdom airline. Other parts of the calculation reflected assumptions about the effects on passengers and knock-on effects on other services, expressed in terms of an assumed percentage of the assumed revenue earned by these services. The Consultation Paper stated that the cost of restricting existing night flights more severely might be different, and that BATA's figures took no account of the wider economic effects which were not captured in the estimated airline and passenger impacts.

54. The Consultation Paper stated that, in formulating their proposals, the Government had taken into account both BATA's figures and the fact that it was not possible for the Government to test the estimates or the assumptions made by BATA. Any value attached to a "marginal" night flight had to be weighed against the environmental disadvantages. These could not be estimated in monetary terms, but it was possible, drawing on the 1992 sleep study, to estimate the numbers of people likely to be awakened. The Consultation Paper concluded that in forming its proposals, the Government must take into account, on the one hand, the important aviation interests involved and the wider economic considerations. It seemed clear that United Kingdom airlines and airports would stand to lose business, including in the daytime, if prevented by unduly severe restrictions from offering limited services at night; that users could also suffer, and that the services offered by United Kingdom airports and airlines would diminish, and with them the appeal of London and the United Kingdom more generally. On the other hand, these considerations had to be weighed against the noise disturbance caused by night flights. The proposals made in the Consultation Paper aimed to strike a balance between the different interests and, in the Government's view, would protect local people from excessive aircraft noise at night.

55. The main proposals in relation to Heathrow were: not to introduce a ban on night flights, or a curfew period; to retain the seasonal noise quotas and movement limits; to review the QC classifications of individual aircraft and, if this produced significant reclassifications, to reconsider the quota limits; to retain the QC system; to review the QC system before the 2002 summer season (when fleet compositions would have changed following completion of the compulsory phase-out in Europe of Chapter 2 civil aircraft, with the exception of Concorde, which began in April 1995), in accordance with the policy of encouraging the use of quieter aircraft; to reduce the summer and winter noise quotas; to maintain the night period as 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. and the night quota period as 11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m.; to extend the restrictions on aircraft classified as QC8 on arrival or departure to match those for QC16 and to ban QC4 aircraft from being scheduled to land or take off during the night quota period from the start of the 2002 summer season (i.e. after completion of the compulsory Chapter 2 phase out).

56. The Consultation Paper stated that since the introduction of the 1993 scheme, headroom had developed in the quotas, reducing the incentive for operators to use quieter aircraft. The reduction in summer and winter noise quotas to nearer the level of current usage was intended as a first step to restoring the incentive. The winter noise quota level under the 1993 scheme was 5,000 QC points, and the average usage in the last two traffic seasons had been 3,879 QC points. A reduction to 4,000 was proposed. The summer noise quota level had been 7,000 points, and the average usage in the last two seasons was provisionally calculated at 4,472. A reduction to 5,400 was proposed. The new levels would remain in place until the end of the summer 2004 season, subject to the outcome of the QC review.

57. Part 2 of the Consultation Paper invited comments as to whether runway alternation should be introduced at Heathrow at night, and on the preferential use of Heathrow's runways at night.

58. On 10 June 1999, the Government announced that the proposals in the November 1998 Consultation Paper would be implemented with effect from 31 October 1999, with limited modifications. With respect to Heathrow, the only modification was that there was to be a smaller reduction in the noise quotas than proposed. The quotas were set at 4,140 QC points for the winter, and 5,610 QC points for the summer. The effect of this was to set the winter quota at a level below actual usage in winter 1998/99.

59. The 1999 Scheme came into effect on 31 October 1999.

60. On 10 November 1999, a report was published on "The Contribution of the Aviation Industry to the UK Economy". The report was prepared by Oxford Economic Forecasting and was sponsored by a number of airlines, airport operators and BATA, as well as the Government.

61. On 23 November 1999, the Government announced that runway alternation at Heathrow would be extended into the night "at the earliest practicable opportunity", and issued a further consultation paper concerning proposals for changes to the preferential use of Heathrow's runways at night.

62. In December 1999, the DETR and National Air Traffic Services Limited published the final report of the ANMAC Technical Working Group on "Noise from Arriving Aircraft". The purpose of the report was to describe objectively the sources of operational noise for arriving aircraft, to consider possible means of noise amelioration, and to make recommendations to the DETR.

63. In March 2000, DORA published a report, prepared on behalf of the DETR, entitled "Adverse effects of night-time aircraft noise". The report identified a number of issues for possible further research, and was intended to form the background to any future United Kingdom studies of night-time aircraft noise. The report stated that gaps in knowledge had been identified, and indicated that the DETR was considering whether there was a case for a further full-scale study on the adverse effects of night-time aircraft noise, and had decided to commission two further short research studies to investigate the options. These studies were commissioned in the autumn of 1999, before the publication of the DORA report. One is a trial study to assess research methodology. The other is a social survey the aims of which included an exploration of the difference between objectively measured and publicly received disturbance due to aircraft noise at night. Both studies are being conducted by university researchers.

64. A series of noise mitigation and abatement measures is in place at Heathrow airport, in addition to restrictions on night flights. These include the following: aircraft noise certification to reduce noise at source; the compulsory phasing out of older, noisier jet aircraft; noise preferential routes and minimum climb gradients for aircraft taking off; noise abatement approach procedures (continuous descent and low power/low drag procedures); limitation of air transport movements; noise related airport charges; noise insulation grant schemes and compensation for noise nuisance under the Land Compensation Act 1973.

65. The DETR and the management of Heathrow airport conduct continuous and detailed monitoring of the restrictions on night flights. Reports are provided each quarter to members of the Heathrow Airport Consultative Committee, on which local government bodies responsible for areas within the vicinity of Heathrow airport, and local residents' associations are represented.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW AND PRACTICE

66. Section 76 (1) of the 1982 Act provides, so far as relevant:

> "No action shall lie in respect of trespass or in respect of nuisance, by reason only of the flight of an aircraft over any property at a height above the ground which, having regard to wind, weather and all the circumstances of the case, is reasonable, or the ordinary incidents of such flight, so long as the provisions of any Air Navigation Order ... have been duly complied with ..."

67. Air Navigation Orders made under the 1982 Act provide for Orders in Council to be made for the regulation of aviation. Orders in Council have been made to deal with, amongst other matters, engine emissions, noise certification and compensation for noise nuisance.

68. Section 78 (3) of the 1982 Act provides, so far as relevant:

"If the Secretary of State considers it appropriate for the purpose of avoiding, limiting or mitigating the effect of noise and vibration connected with the taking-off or landing of aircraft at a designated aerodrome, to prohibit aircraft from taking off or landing, or limit the number of occasions on which they may take off or land, at the aerodrome during certain periods, he may by a notice published in the prescribed manner do all or any of the following, that is to say–

(a) prohibit aircraft of descriptions specified in the notice from taking off or landing at the aerodrome (otherwise than in an emergency of a description so specified) during periods so specified;

(b) specify the maximum number of occasions on which aircraft of descriptions so specified may be permitted to take off or land at the aerodrome ... during the periods so specified; ...."

69. Restrictions on night flights at Heathrow airport are imposed by means of notices published by the Secretary of State under section 78 (3) of the 1982 Act.

B. The challenges to the 1993 Scheme

70. The local authorities for the areas around the three main London airports sought judicial review of the Secretary of State's decision to introduce the 1993 Scheme. They made four consecutive applications for judicial review, and appealed twice to the Court of Appeal. The High Court declared that the 1993 Scheme was contrary to the terms of section 78 (3) (b) of the 1982 Act, and therefore invalid, because it did not "specify the maximum number of occasions on which aircraft of descriptions so specified may be permitted to take off or land" but, instead, imposed controls by reference to levels of exposure to noise energy (R. v. Secretary of State for Transport, ex parte Richmond upon Thames Borough Council and Others [1994] 1 Weekly Law Reports, p. 74).

71. The Secretary of State decided to retain the quota count system, but with the addition of an overall maximum number of aircraft movements. This decision was held by the High Court to be in accordance with section 78 (3) (b) of the 1982 Act. However, the 1993 Consultation Paper was held to have been "materially misleading" in failing to make clear that the implementation of the proposals for Heathrow airport would permit an increase in noise levels over those experienced in 1988 (R. v. Secretary of State for Transport, ex parte Richmond upon Thames Borough Council and Others [1995] Environmental Law Reports, p. 390).

72. Following the publication of a further consultation paper in March 1995, and of a supplement to the March 1995 consultation paper in June 1995, the local authorities brought a further application for judicial review. In July 1996, the Court of Appeal decided that the Secretary of State had given adequate reasons and sufficient justification for his conclusion that it was reasonable, on balance, to run the risk of diminishing to some degree local people's ability to sleep at night because of the other countervailing considerations to which he was, in 1993, willing to give greater weight, and that by June 1995 errors in the consultation papers had been corrected and the new policy could not be said to be irrational (R. v. Secretary of State for Transport, ex parte Richmond LBC [1996] 1 Weekly Law Reports, p. 1460).

73. On 12 November 1996, the House of Lords dismissed a petition by the local authorities for leave to appeal against the decision of the Court of Appeal.

THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 OF THE CONVENTION

74. The applicants alleged a violation of Article 8 by virtue of the increase in the level of noise caused at their homes by aircraft using Heathrow airport at night after the introduction of the 1993 scheme.

Article 8 of the Convention provides, so far as relevant, as follows:

> "1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home ...
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as in accordance with the law and necessary in a democratic society in the interests of ... the economic well-being of the country ... or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

75. The Government disagreed with the applicants' contention that there had been a violation of Article 8.

A. Arguments of the parties

I. The applicants

76. The applicants submitted that, after the 1993 scheme was introduced, the level of noise caused by aircraft taking off and landing at Heathrow airport between 4 a.m. and 7 a.m. increased significantly. They contended that they found it difficult to sleep after 4 a.m., and impossible after 6 a.m. They submitted that the levels of noise to which they were exposed at night were well in excess of those which were considered, internationally, to be tolerable. They contended that the evidence showed that almost all of them had suffered night noise levels in excess of 80 dB LA max, and in one case as high as 90 dB LA max. They referred to the World Health Organisation's guideline value for avoiding sleep disturbance at night, of a single noise event of 60 dB LA max, and argued that the Government had no adequate research to support their contention that levels of 80 dB LA max were tolerable. The applicants submitted that, in these circumstances, there had been an interference with their right to respect for their private and family lives and their home, as guaranteed by Article 8 § 1 of the Convention.

77. The applicants contended that the interference was not "necessary in a democratic society". They submitted that there was a great deal of first-hand evidence of the disruption, distress and ill-health caused by night flights. They underlined that the 1992 sleep study dealt only with awakenings from sleep, and reached no conclusions about the incidence or effects of sleep prevention (delay in first getting to sleep at night, and not being able to get back to sleep after being woken in the early morning). The applicants contended that sleep prevention has never been the subject of adequate scientific study. They submitted that basic factual information was needed to support an increase in night flights under the 1993 scheme, and that it was not assembled by the Government.

78. Although they accepted the general importance of Heathrow airport to the United Kingdom economy, the applicants contended that the Government had failed to adduce any evidence of the specific importance of night flights. They referred to the Oxford Economic Forecasting report of November 1999 on "The Contribution of the Aviation Industry to the UK Economy", and noted that the report, which considered the economic importance of Heathrow airport as a whole, did not consider separately the economic importance of night flights. They also submitted a report by Berkeley Hanover Consulting which challenged the validity of the Oxford report and its conclusions. The applicants contended, further, that night flights are of benefit only to the airlines which operate them, and that many other major European airports have greater restrictions on night flights than those in operation at Heathrow.

79. The applicants submitted that, in these circumstances, the reasons for the continuation of night flights adduced by the Government, both in 1993 and subsequently, were not relevant and sufficient, and that it was open to the Court to find a violation of Article 8 on this basis alone.

80. The applicants submitted, further, that the interference with their rights under Article 8 was not "in accordance with the law". They contended that, in order to be "in accordance with the law", there must be protection in domestic law against arbitrary interference with the rights guaranteed by Article 8 § 1 of the Convention; the law must be accessible, and its consequences must be foreseeable. These features were not present when the Government departed from its statement of policy "not to allow a worsening of noise at night, and ideally to improve it" (the 1993 Consultation Paper, paragraph 34), and was held by the High Court to have been "devious" in its attempt to conceal the departure (R. v. London Borough of Richmond and Others (No. 3) [1995] Environmental Law Reports 409).

81. Finally, the applicants contended that Article 8 is capable of conferring upon individuals a right to have essential environmental information communicated to them regarding the extent of an environmental threat to their moral and physical integrity (relying on the judgment of the Court in Guerra v. Italy, 19 February 1998, Reports of Judgments and Decisions, 1998-I, § 60), and contended that, a fortiori, Article 8 required that such information be assembled by the national authorities. They claimed that the increase in night flights under the 1993 scheme in the absence of proper information constituted in itself a breach of Article 8 of the Convention.

II. The Government

82. The Government acknowledged that the number of movements during the night quota period (11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m.) for the period from winter 1997/98 to summer 1999 was greater than that in 1992/93, and that the increase was greater if the period was taken to 6.30 a.m. They stated that the average QC per movement was significantly lower than the comparable figure prior to the introduction of the 1993 scheme, but that the quota count had increased due to the increased number of movements.

83. The Government's analysis of the current rate of arrivals during half hour slots from 4 a.m. to 6 a.m. was as follows:

	04.00-04.29	04.30-04.59	05.00-05.29	05.30-05.59
Winter	0.57	5.14	7.29	3.43
Summer	0.14	2.29	5.86	4.86

They stated that arrivals before 4 a.m. were so few as to be statistically insignificant, and that average arrivals between 6 a.m. and 6.30 a.m. were 17.86 in the winter and 19.14 in the summer.

84. The Government submitted that the applicants were exposed to lower noise levels than the applicants in the previous cases in which complaints were made concerning aircraft noise at Heathrow airport and which were declared admissible by the Commission (Arrondelle v. the United Kingdom, application no. 7889/97, decision of 15 July 1980, Decision and Reports (DR) 26, p. 5; Baggs v. the United Kingdom, application no. 9310/81, decision of 16 October 1985, DR 44, p. 13; Rayner v. the United Kingdom, application no. 9310/81, decision of 17 July 1986, DR 47, p. 5). With the exception of one of the applicants, Mr Cavalla, at his former address, all the applicants were exposed to the same or lower noise levels than Mr Glass at his former address. Mr Glass's application was declared inadmissible (application no. 28485/95, decision of 3 December 1997). They submitted that, in these circumstances, there had been no interference with the applicants' rights under Article 8 § 1 of the Convention.

85. The Government submitted, alternatively, that in deciding to introduce the 1993 scheme they struck an appropriate and justified balance between the various interests involved and that, accordingly, any interference with the applicants' rights under Article 8 was justified. They referred to the 1992 sleep study which was in 1993, and remains, the most comprehensive study of its type. They stated that the 1992 sleep study was commissioned in July 1990 in order to inform the 1993 review of restrictions on night flights, but emphasised that it had been preceded by a number of earlier detailed reports into aircraft noise and sleep disturbance, also published by or on behalf of the Civil Aviation Authority. Further, the Government stated that research undertaken in the United States since the results of the 1992 sleep study were published had not cast any doubt on its validity.

86. The Government pointed out that, as they did not own or operate Heathrow airport or the aeroplanes which were causing the noise of which the applicants were complaining, their obligations under Article 8 were properly to be analysed as positive obligations. They submitted that, in these circumstances, they should be permitted a greater degree of leeway than in a case of direct interference by a public authority, although they recognised (referring to the Court's Powell and Rayner v. the United Kingdom judgment of 21 February 1990, Series A no. 172, § 41), that the applicable principles were broadly similar whichever analytical approach were to be adopted.

87. The Government referred to the series of noise mitigation and abatement measures which have been implemented at Heathrow airport or have otherwise contributed to the improvement of the noise climate around the airport, in addition to the restrictions on night flights. They provided detailed information in respect of each of these measures.

88. The Government also referred to the responses to the 1993 Consultation Paper received from trade and industry associations with an interest in air travel and from airlines, all of which emphasised the economic importance of night flights and provided detailed information and figures to support their responses. The Government submitted that night flights form an integral part of the global network of air services, and that they have a direct impact on the demand for daytime flights, due to operational constraints (geography, journey length time, number of time zones and direction of flight, turn-around time and efficient aircraft utilisation). A prohibition on night flights would therefore have severe implications for the competitiveness of Heathrow airport and of the airlines based there. These submissions were supported by the written comments received from British Airways.

89. The Government submitted that active and detailed consideration continues to be given to the issue of whether the research undertaken to date needs to be supplemented and, if so, in what areas and on what scientific basis. They pointed to the fact that they are continuing to fund research into sleep disturbance, in the form of further detailed fieldwork and a laboratory trial.

90. They contended that the central issue which they considered before deciding upon the 1993 scheme was the extent to which the economic well-being of the United Kingdom, as represented by the need to meet the requirements of the global market, justified the inconvenience of night noise to local residents. They submitted that before taking the relevant decisions, they had available, and considered, extensive and detailed information regarding the results of research into the effect of night noise on sleep, and regarding the economic importance of night flights at Heathrow airport. They claimed that it was not possible to separate the economic importance of night flights at Heathrow airport from the overall importance of Heathrow to the United Kingdom economy. They contended further that, given the range of interests involved, striking a balance is not a straightforward task, and that it is something which the national authorities are particularly well placed to do. Finally, the Government submitted that the balance which they had struck was a fair and reasonable one.

B. Comments from British Airways plc

91. In written comments, British Airways plc ("BA") addressed the commercial significance of and need to schedule flights which arrive at Heathrow airport at night. BA indicated that its comments were endorsed by BATA. BA stated that in the last two seasons (summer 1999 and winter 1999/2000), BA's night quota flights and those scheduled to operate in the period up to 6.30 a.m., together with their return leg flights, accounted for 16% of BA's total revenue. It stated, further, that the loss of some or all of its night flights would have a serious effect on its ability to compete, and that this effect would be disproportionately great due to both the damage to the network and the scheduling difficulties which it would entail.

92. BA submitted that if its flights which were scheduled to arrive before 7.15 a.m. had not been permitted to operate at Heathrow airport during 1999, it would have lost 49% of its long haul flight output at its main airport base. It would not have been possible to retime night flights into the day due to the lack of spare terminal capacity at Terminals 3 and 4 (the terminals for long haul flights at Heathrow airport) and the fact that no runway slots were available during the morning period. BA would have suffered a very significant loss of revenue, with consequent large-scale redundancies.

93. The report by Berkeley Hanover Consulting submitted by the applicants challenged the validity of the information provided by BA.

C. The Court's assessment

94. The Court considers that it is not possible to make a sensible comparison between the situation of the present applicants and that of the applicants in the previous cases referred to by the Government because, first, the present applicants complain specifically about night noise, whereas the earlier applicants complained generally about aircraft noise and, secondly, the present applicants complain largely about the increase in night noise which they say has occurred since the Government altered the restrictions on night noise in 1993, whereas the previous applications concerned noise levels prior to 1993. The Court concludes, therefore, that the outcome of previous applications is not relevant to the present case.

95. The Court notes that Heathrow airport and the aircraft which use it are not owned, controlled or operated by the Government or by any agency of the Government. The Court considers that, accordingly, the United Kingdom cannot be said to have "interfered" with the applicants' private or family life. Instead, the applicants' complaints fall to be analysed in terms of a positive duty on the State to take reasonable and appropriate measures to secure the applicants' rights under Article 8 § 1 of the Convention (see the Powell and Rayner v. the United Kingdom judgment of 21 February 1990, Series A no. 172, § 41, and the Guerra v. Italy judgment of 19 February 1998, Reports 1998-I, § 58).

96. Whatever analytical approach is adopted – the positive duty or an interference – the applicable principles regarding justification under Article 8 § 2 are broadly similar (the aforementioned Powell and Rayner v. the United Kingdom judgment loc. cit.). In both contexts, regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole. In both contexts the State enjoys a certain margin of appreciation in determining the steps to be taken to ensure compliance with the Convention (see, for example, the Rees v. the United Kingdom judgment of 17 October 1986, Series A no. 106, § 37, as concerns Article 8 § 1, and the Leander v. Sweden judgment of 26 March 1987, Series A no. 116, § 59, as concerns Article 8 § 2). Furthermore, even in relation to the positive obligations flowing from Article 8 § 1, in striking the required balance the aims mentioned in Article 8 § 2 may be of a certain relevance (see the Rees v. the United Kingdom judgment previously cited, loc. cit.; see also the Lopez Ostra v. Spain judgment of 9 December 1994, Series A no. 303-C, p. 54, § 51).

97. The Court would, however, underline that in striking the required balance, States must have regard to the whole range of material considerations. Further, in the particularly sensitive field of environmental protection, mere reference to the economic well-being of the country is not sufficient to outweigh the rights of others. The Court recalls that in the above-mentioned Lopez Ostra v. Spain case, and notwithstanding the undoubted economic interest for the national economy of the tanneries concerned, the Court looked in considerable detail at "whether the national authorities took the measures necessary for protecting the applicant's right to respect for her home and for her private and family life ..." (judgment of 9 December 1994, p. 55, § 55). It considers that States are required to minimise, as far as possible, the interference with these rights, by trying to find alternative solutions and by generally seeking to achieve their aims in the least onerous way as regards human rights. In order to do that, a proper and complete investigation and study with the aim of finding the best possible solution which will, in reality, strike the right balance should precede the relevant project.

98. The Court notes that the Government have acknowledged that, while the average quota count per movement is now lower than the average prior to the introduction of the 1993 scheme, the increased number of movements has led to an increased quota count in comparison with the position in 1992/93. This means that, overall, the level of noise during the quota period (11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m.) has increased under the 1993 scheme. In addition, the Court notes the accounts given by the applicants of the disturbance to their sleep caused by the increase in noise from night flights at Heathrow airport from about 1993.

99. The Court must establish whether, in permitting increased levels of noise over the years since 1993, the Government respected their positive obligation to the applicants.

100. The Court notes that the Government had, when the 1993 scheme was being introduced and in the period whilst it was under judicial challenge, a certain amount of information as to the economic interest in night flights. In particular, they had the responses of industry and commerce to the Consultation Papers of January and November 1993, and of 1995. However, they do not appear to have carried out any research of their own as to the reality or extent of that economic interest.

101. It is true that a measure of further information as to the economic effects of night flights has now been assembled. In particular, BATA commissioned the Coopers & Lybrand report of July 1999 into the economic costs of night flying. This information, however, came too late to be considered in the process leading up to the 1993 Scheme (as reviewed in 1995). The Government acknowledged in the November 1998 Consultation Paper that no attempt was made to quantify the aviation and economic benefits in monetary terms (paragraph 53 above).

102. The Court concludes from the above that whilst it is, at the very least, likely that night flights contribute to a certain extent to the national economy as a whole, the importance of that contribution has never been assessed critically, whether by the Government directly or by independent research on their behalf.

103. As to the impact of the increased night flights on the applicants, the Court notes from the documents submitted that only limited research had been carried out into the nature of sleep disturbance and prevention when the 1993 Scheme was put in place. In particular, the 1992 sleep study, which was prepared as part of the internal Department of Transport review of the restrictions on night flights, was limited to sleep disturbance, and made no mention of the problem of sleep prevention – that is, the difficulties encountered by those who have been woken in falling asleep again. Further research is now under way, and while the conclusions may be valuable for future Schemes, the results will be too late to have any impact on the increase in night noise caused by the 1993 Scheme.

104. In determining the adequacy of the measures to protect the applicants' Article 8 rights, the Court must also have regard to the specific action which was taken to mitigate night noise nuisance as part of the 1993 Scheme, and to other action which was likely to alleviate the situation.

105. The Court notes that, although the 1993 Scheme did not achieve its stated aim of keeping overall noise levels below those in 1988, it represented an improvement over the proposals made in the 1993 Consultation Paper, in that no aircraft were exempt from the night restrictions (that is, even the quietest aircraft had a rating of 0.5 QC). Further, in the course of the challenges by way of judicial review to the 1993 Scheme, an overall maximum number of aircraft movements was set, and the Government did not accede to calls for large quotas and an earlier end to night quota restrictions.

106. However, the Court does not accept that these modest steps at improving the night noise climate are capable of constituting "the measures necessary" to protect the applicants' position. In particular, in the absence of any serious attempt to evaluate the extent or impact of the interferences with the applicants' sleep patterns, and generally in the absence of a prior specific and complete study with the aim of finding the least onerous solution as regards human rights, it is not possible to agree that in weighing the interferences against the economic interest of the country – which itself had not been quantified – the Government struck the right balance in setting up the 1993 Scheme.

107. Having regard to the foregoing, and despite the margin of appreciation left to the respondent State, the Court considers that in implementing the 1993 scheme the State failed to strike a fair balance between the United Kingdom's economic well-being and the applicants' effective enjoyment of their right to respect for their homes and their private and family lives.

There has accordingly been a violation of Article 8.

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONVENTION

108. The applicants contended that judicial review was not an effective remedy in relation to their rights under Article 8 of the Convention, in breach of Article 13.

Article 13 provides:

> "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

109. The Government disputed the applicants' contention that there had been a violation of Article 13.

A. Arguments of the parties

I. The applicants

110. The applicants contended that they had no private law rights in relation to excessive night noise, as a consequence of the statutory exclusion of liability in section 76 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982. They submitted that the limits inherent in an application for judicial review meant that it was not an effective remedy. They referred in particular to the fact that the issues arising under Article 8 could not be addressed in an application for judicial review, and that the arguments which had been raised by the local authorities concerning the substance of Article 8 in the four applications for judicial review were rejected on the grounds that they fell outside the scope of the court's power of review. They also referred to the high costs involved in bringing an application for judicial review.

II. The Government

111. The Government submitted that the applicants had no arguable claim of a violation of Article 8 and that, accordingly, no issue of entitlement to a remedy under Article 13 arose. Alternatively, they submitted that as the requirements of Article 13 are less strict than and are absorbed by those of Article 6, and as Article 6 would have applied had it not been for the exclusion of liability in section 76 of the 1982 Act, no separate issue arose under Article 13.

112. The Government contended that, in any event, the remedy of judicial review was available to the applicants. They referred to the wide margin of discretion available to the national authorities in relation to the decision to implement the 1993 scheme. They claimed that judicial review was an effective remedy because, although the English courts could not substitute their view as to where the appropriate balance lay between the competing interests concerned, the courts had power to set aside schemes on a variety of administrative law grounds (for example, irrationality, unlawfulness or patent unreasonableness). Indeed, the courts had exercised that power in relation to the 1993 scheme.

The Government contended, further, that judicial review would have allowed a challenge to be made on the basis of a failure to take relevant material into account, or the taking into account of irrelevant material. Finally, they observed that Article 8 was considered by the Court of Appeal in R. v. Secretary of State for Transport, ex parte Richmond LBC [1996] 1 Weekly Law Reports, p. 1460, at p. 1481E, where it was held that the Secretary of State had given adequate reasons and sufficient justification for his conclusion that it was reasonable, on balance, to run the risk of diminishing to some degree local people's ability to sleep at night because of the other countervailing considerations to which he was, in 1993, willing to give greater weight.

B. The Court's assessment

113. Article 13 has been consistently interpreted by the Court as requiring a remedy in domestic law only in respect of grievances which can be regarded as "arguable" in terms of the Convention (see, for example, the Boyle and Rice v. the United Kingdom judgment of 27 April 1988, Series A no. 131, § 54). In the present case, there has been a finding of a violation of Article 8, and the complaint under Article 13 must therefore be considered.

114. Section 76 of the 1982 Act prevents actions in nuisance in respect of excessive noise caused by aircraft at night. The question which the Court must address is whether the applicants had a remedy at national level to "enforce the substance of the Convention rights ... in whatever form they may happen to be secured in the domestic legal order" (Vilvarajah and Others v. the United Kingdom judgment of 30 October 1991, Series A no. 215, §§ 117 to 127). The scope of the domestic review in the Vilvarajah case, which concerned immigration, was relatively broad because of the importance domestic law attached to the matter of physical integrity. It was on this basis that judicial review was held to comply with the requirements of Article 13. In contrast, however, in its judgment in the case of Smith and Grady v. the United Kingdom of 27 September 1999 (§§ 135 to 139, ECHR 1999-VI [Section 3]), the Court concluded that judicial review was not an effective remedy on the grounds that the domestic courts defined policy issues so broadly that it was not possible for the applicants to make their Convention points regarding their rights under Article 8 of the Convention in the domestic courts.

115. The Court notes that judicial review proceedings were capable of establishing that the 1993 scheme was unlawful because the gap between Government policy and practice was too wide (see R. v. Secretary of State for Transport, ex parte Richmond LBC (No. 2) [1995] Environmental Law Reports p. 390). However, it is clear that the scope of review by the domestic courts was limited to the classic English public law concepts, such as irrationality, unlawfulness and patent unreasonableness, and did not allow consideration of whether the increase in night flights under the 1993 scheme represented a justifiable limitation on their right to respect for the private and family lives or the homes of those who live in the vicinity of Heathrow airport.

116. In these circumstances, the Court considers that the scope of review by the domestic courts in the present case was not sufficient to comply with Article 13.

There has therefore been a violation of Article 13 of the Convention.

III. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 41 OF THE CONVENTION

117. Article 41 of the Convention provides:

> "If the Court finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. Damages

118. The applicants submitted that they had each suffered considerable non-pecuniary damage as a result of noise caused by night flights and, in particular, the increase in night flights since 1993. They suggested that an award of 2,000 to 4,000 pounds sterling (GBP) each would be an appropriate starting point for an award of non-pecuniary damage.

119. The Government did not comment on the applicants' submissions.

120. Having regard to the accounts given by the applicants of the impact on each of them of the increase in night flights since 1993, and making its award on an equitable basis, the Court awards the applicants the sum of GBP 4,000 each in respect of non-pecuniary damage.

B. Costs and expenses

121. The applicants submitted a claim for costs and expenses of the proceedings before the Commission and the Court in the sum of GBP 153,867.56, plus GBP 24,929.55 value added tax ("VAT"). They submitted that although their application was almost identical to that made by Mr Glass (the annexes to which were simply reproduced for the purposes of the present application), they should recover the cost of preparation of the application because their representative had represented Mr Glass on a contingency (no-win no-fee) basis, and therefore had not recovered a fee for the work done on his behalf. They indicated that they had excluded from their claim costs incurred solely in connection with Mr Glass's application, and that they had further reduced the sums claimed by 25% in order to ensure that there was no element of double recovery.

122. The Government expressed some doubt as to whether the applicants were in fact liable for the costs, as the basis for the retention of the applicants' lawyers was not clear. In any event, they considered that the rates and the time charged were excessive, and that the travel expenses were, to a certain extent, not necessary. They put an appropriate figure for costs at GBP 56,739.44 including VAT. They subsequently added that they understood that up to GBP 80,000 had been raised by a pressure group to fund costs.

123. Making its assessment on an equitable basis, the Court awards the applicants by way of costs and expenses the global sum of GBP 70,000, including VAT.

C. Default interest

124. According to the information available to the Court, the statutory rate of interest applicable in the United Kingdom at the date of adoption of the present judgment is 7.5% per annum.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Holds by five votes to two that there has been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention;

2. Holds by six votes to one that there has been a violation of Article 13 of the Convention;

3. Holds by six votes to one
   (a) that the respondent State is to pay the applicants, within three months from the date on which the judgment becomes final according to Article 44 § 2 of the Convention, the following amounts:
      (i) in respect of non-pecuniary damage, 4,000 (four thousand) pounds sterling each;
      (ii) for costs and expenses, 70,000 (seventy thousand) pounds sterling, including any value added tax that may be chargeable;
   (b) that simple interest at an annual rate of 7.5% shall be payable from the expiry of the above-mentioned three months until settlement;

4. Dismisses unanimously the remainder of the applicants' claim for just satisfaction.

Done in English and notified in writing on 2 October 2001, pursuant to Rule 77 §§ 2 and 3 of the Rules of Court.

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE COSTA

(Translation)

On mature reflection, and not without having hesitated a great deal, I voted in favour of finding that there had been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention. (I concluded more easily that there had been a violation of Article 13, so shall confine my comments to Article 8.)

This case, which gave rise to a public hearing, is far from easy. On the one hand there is the principle, established by the Court as early as the Marckx judgment of 13 June 1979, that the State has positive duties, and that the right to a healthy environment is included in the concept of the right to respect for private and family life (see, for example, the Powell and Rayner against the United Kingdom judgment of 21 February 1990, quoted in the instant judgment (see paragraph 95), which also concerned noise disturbance inflicted on the communities near Heathrow by aircraft noise). On the other hand there is the margin of appreciation which must be left to the States in this sphere, particularly as to the choice of means by which to reduce aircraft noise (see the Powell and Rayner judgment, § 45), and the economic well-being of the country, referred to in Article 8 § 2 of the Convention, which relates to the general interest, a matter towards which I am personally very sensitive. (I refer in this connection to my dissenting opinion in the case of Chassagnou against France: judgment of 29 April 1999.)

There were therefore serious reasons for considering, as did the judges forming the minority, that the inconvenience caused to the applicant as a result of their proximity to Heathrow airport was not disproportionate.

It seems to me, however, that the inconvenience was very substantial and, all in all, excessive. As stated in paragraphs 10 to 17 of the judgment, the eight applicants lived very near the runways, and four of them had to move house. They certainly did not do so merely to satisfy a whim, but because they and their families had been finding it extremely difficult to bear the noise, and, in particular, to sleep. It should not be forgotten that, unlike the cases which were the subject of the Powell and Rayner judgment, and the decisions of the Commission such as Arrondelle (DR 26, p. 5) or Baggs (DR 44, p. 13), what was at issue here were night flights, with aeroplanes landing or taking off between 4 a.m. and 6 a.m. Anyone who has suffered for a long period from noise disturbance such as to disrupt their sleep (or prevent them from getting back to sleep once awake) is well aware that the effects of this on the nerves and on one’s physical and mental well-being are extremely unpleasant and even harmful. Furthermore, again unlike the earlier cases, the applications lodged by Mrs Hatton and the other applicants concern the period subsequent to 1993, and the Government have acknowledged that since 1993 the number of night flights has substantially increased (see, for example, the admissibility decision of 16 May 2000, p. 13, and the present judgment, paragraph 98).

Moreover, the issues raised by the case do not necessarily boil down to macro economic considerations requiring radical solutions which would compromise the economic well-being of the country (or of the airline companies, the airport authorities, or all three categories at once). In accordance with its positive obligations, could the State not have explored less drastic solutions, such as subsidies (from the State or from the Heathrow management authorities) to soundproof the applicants' homes? The objection may be raised that they are not the only residents suffering from the noise and that, consequently, that solution would have opened the floodgates to multiple requests for subsidies or compensation, whereupon the macro economy would again be in issue and would subsume the individual nature of the applications and violations.

That is certainly true, but it has to be one thing or the other: either the number of potential victims of night flight noise is limited and the "beneficiaries" of those flights can compensate them, or it is too high for the level of compensation to be financially viable for the beneficiaries, whereupon night flights need to be reviewed in their entirety.

It therefore appears to me that, having regard to the Court's case-law on the right to a healthy environment (see, for example, the Lopez Ostra against Spain judgment of 9 December 1994, or the Guerra against Italy judgment of 19 February 1998), maintaining night flights at that level meant that the applicants had to pay too high a price for an economic well-being, of which the real benefit, moreover, is not apparent from the facts of the case. Unless, of course, it is felt that the case-law goes too far and overprotects a person's right to a sound environment. I do not think so. Since the beginning of the 1970s, the world has become increasingly aware of the importance of environmental issues and of their influence on people's lives. Our Court's case-law has, moreover, not been alone in developing along those lines. For example, Article 37 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union of 18 December 2000 is devoted to the protection of the environment. I would find it regrettable if the constructive efforts made by our Court were to suffer a setback.

That is why I have finally subscribed, in the main, to the reasoning of the majority of my colleagues, and fully to their conclusion.

PARTLY DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE GREVE

In the present case I have not found a violation of Article 8.

In reaching this finding I share essentially the views expressed by Sir Brian Kerr in his dissenting opinion relating to Article 8. I am, however, unlike Sir Brian, prepared to accept the applicants' allegation that the night flights' noise did interfere substantially with their sleep.

In the following I shall limit myself to elaborating on the main points on which I take a different view from that of the majority of my colleagues in this case.

Introductory remark

Article 8 §1 reads:

> "Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence."

In relation to the notion of "home", the essence of the protection under the provision is to secure the inviolability of one's home, that is to safeguard private individuals against arbitrary interference with their homes. The Convention being a living instrument, the provision has gradually been interpreted to include also environmental rights. There are limits as to the kind of environmental problems – pollution in the widest sense of the word – which people will have to accept before these problems give rise to a violation of Article 8. These environmental rights are nonetheless of a different character from the core right not to have one's home raided without a warrant. Environmental problems may lead to State responsibility under Article 8 as a consequence of the impact of planning decisions, and potentially also when a State refrains from adequately addressing serious environmental problems.

The State's inquiry into night flights

Unlike the majority, I find no major shortcomings in the State's inquiry into night flights' noise and the decision-making process used in this case by the authorities in the United Kingdom. On the contrary, I find that the procedures were reasonable and adequate.

The margin of appreciation

An interference with the right to respect for one's home will infringe Article 8 of the Convention, unless it is "in accordance with the law", pursues one or more legitimate aims under paragraph 2 and is "necessary in a democratic society" to achieve those aims. In the present case, the main issue turns on whether the latter requirement was satisfied.

The majority's understanding of the margin of appreciation left to the national courts is, in my opinion, in conflict with the Court's established case-law.

The standard relied on by the majority requiring States "to minimise, as far as possible, the interference with [Article 8] rights, by trying to find alternative solutions and by generally seeking to achieve their aims in the least onerous way as regards human rights" (paragraph 97 of the judgment) is, in my opinion, incompatible with the wide margin of appreciation left by the European Court to Contracting States in other planning cases.

The general principles in this respect are laid down in the Buckley v. the United Kingdom judgment (25 September 1996, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1996-IV, pp. 1291-1293, §§ 74-77), and read:

> "As is well established in the Court's case-law, it is for the national authorities to make the initial assessment of the 'necessity' for an interference, as regards both the legislative framework and the particular measure of implementation (see, inter alia and mutatis mutandis, the Leander v. Sweden judgment of 26 March 1987, Series A no. 116, p. 25, § 59, and the Miailhe v. France (no. 1) judgment of 25 February 1993, Series A no. 256-C, p. 89, § 36). Although a margin of appreciation is thereby left to the national authorities, their decision remains subject to review by the Court for conformity with the requirements of the Convention.
> The scope of this margin of appreciation is not identical in each case but will vary according to the context (see, inter alia and mutatis mutandis, the above-mentioned Leander judgment, ibid.). Relevant factors include the nature of the Convention right in issue, its importance for the individual and the nature of the activities concerned.
> The Court has already had occasion to note that town and country planning schemes involve the exercise of discretionary judgment in the implementation of policies adopted in the interest of the community (in the context of Article 6 § 1, see the Bryan judgment cited above, p. 18, § 47; in the context of Article 1 of Protocol No. 1, see the Sporrong and Lönnroth v. Sweden judgment of 23 September 1982, Series A no. 52, p. 26, § 69; the Erkner and Hofauer v. Austria judgment of 23 April 1987, Series A no. 117, pp. 65-66, §§ 74-75 and 78; the Poiss v. Austria judgment of 23 April 1987, Series A no. 117, p. 108, §§ 64-65, and p. 109, § 68; the Allan Jacobsson v. Sweden judgment of 25 October 1989, Series A no. 163, p. 17, § 57, and p. 19, § 63). It is not for the Court to substitute its own view of what would be the best policy in the planning sphere or the most appropriate individual measure in planning cases (see, mutatis mutandis, the Klass and Others v. Germany judgment of 6 September 1978, Series A no. 28, p. 23, § 49). By reason of their direct and continuous contact with the vital forces of their countries, the national authorities are in principle better placed than an international court to evaluate local needs and conditions. In so far as the exercise of discretion involving a multitude of local factors is inherent in the choice and implementation of planning policies, the national authorities in principle enjoy a wide margin of appreciation."

These principles have most recently been followed by the Court's Grand Chamber in its judgments of 18 January 2001 in the cases of Chapman v. the United Kingdom (application no. 27238/95), Beard v. the United Kingdom (application no. 24882/94), Coster v. the United Kingdom

(application no. 24876/94), Lee v. the United Kingdom (application no. 25289/94) and Jane Smith v. the United Kingdom (application no. 25154/94); and in the inadmissibility decision of 25 May 2000 by the Court (Fourth Section) in the Noack and Others v. Germany case (application no. 46346/99). The latter case is of particular interest as it involved no less than the transfer of an entire village – members of the Sorbian minority included. The Court (Fourth Section) described the background to the case as follows:

> "The case concerns the transfer – scheduled to take place at the end of 2002 – of the inhabitants of Horno, a village in the Land of Brandenburg fifteen kilometres north of the town of Cottbus, near the Polish border. Horno has a population of 350, approximately a third of whom are from the Sorbian minority, of Slav origin. The first twelve applicants say that they are members of the Sorbian minority. [The other applicants were the Domowina, an association for the protection of Sorbian interests, and the Horno Protestant community.] Approximately 20,000 Sorbs (Sorben) live in the Land of Brandenburg. They have their own language and culture. They have their own customs (sorbisches Brauchtum), which are kept alive by groups performing Sorbian songs or wearing traditional costumes and by drama societies, literary circles and drawing classes. The majority of Sorbs are Protestants.
> The inhabitants of Horno are to be transferred to a town some twenty kilometres away because of an expansion of lignite-mining operations (Braunkohleabbau) in the area, as the Jänschwalde open-cast lignite mine (Braunkohletagebau) is just a few kilometres from Horno."

The Court (Fourth Section) concluded that the impugned interference, though indisputably painful for the inhabitants of Horno, was not disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued (economic well-being) in view of the margin of appreciation which States are afforded in this area.

The reasons for a wide margin of appreciation in planning and environmental cases are in my opinion no less valid today. In modern society, environmental problems are not discreet and only of concern to those who may invoke Article 8, given their proximity to the source of the given problem. One of the functions of planning is, to the extent possible, to protect people against the negative impact on the environment of, for instance, and as in casu, the transport infrastructure; another function is to ensure that no group of people is disproportionately affected by what is considered necessary to meet the needs of modern urban society. The amount and complexity of the factual information needed to strike a fair balance in these respects is more often than not of such a nature that the European Court will be at a marked disadvantage compared to the national authorities in terms of acquiring the necessary level of understanding for appropriate decision-making. Moreover, environmental rights represent a new generation of human rights. How the balance is to be struck will therefore affect the rights not only of those close enough to the source of the environmental problem to invoke Article 8, but also the rights of those members of the wider public affected by the problem and who must be considered to have a stake in the balancing exercise.

Furthermore, the general principle concerning the assessment of facts argues in favour of a wide margin of appreciation in these cases.

The general principle concerning the assessment of facts

It is normally not within the province of the Court to substitute its own assessment of the facts for that of the domestic courts and, as a general rule, it is for these courts to assess the evidence before them (see, inter alia, the Klaas v. Germany judgment of 22 September 1993, Series A no. 269, p. 17, § 29).

The arguments listed above in favour of a wide margin of appreciation in planning cases also have as a consequence that the Court ought to be reluctant to substitute its own assessment of facts in these cases unless there are relatively clear and substantiated indications that the national authorities have got the facts wrong. In my opinion, there are no such indications in the present case which would make the Court a more competent fact-finder than the national authorities. I consider that the majority moves beyond what appears to me advisable in this respect.

DISSENTING OPINION OF SIR BRIAN KERR

I regret that I am unable to agree with my fellow judges in their conclusion that there have been violations of Articles 8 and Article 13 of the Convention in this case.

Article 8

Article 8 prohibits unjustified State interference with an individual's "right to respect for his private ... life [and] his home". The opportunity for undisturbed sleep is an important aspect of one's private life. The flying of aircraft at night can interfere with the sleep of those who live in its flight path. It scarcely requires to be said, however, that, by allowing night flights, (even those which cause sleep interference) the State is not automatically guilty of an unjustified interference with the right to respect for private life and home. Before that conclusion can be reached, a close examination is required of (i) the nature of the alleged interference, (ii) the State's inquiry into the effects of night flights' noise and (iii) the assessment that the State has made of the consequences of curtailing night flights.

The nature of the interference

The applicants' claims that their sleep has been disturbed have not been subjected to any critical challenge. The account that they have given in documents submitted to the court cannot be accepted without reservation, therefore. Nor can the assumption be made that these accounts are necessarily representative of a general experience of those who live in the same areas as the applicants. In making an assessment of whether the State has been guilty of a failure to have respect for the applicants' private life and home, it must be borne in mind that the extent of the claimed disturbance has not been established to any significant degree.

It may be considered that it is not easy to prove that one's sleep has been disturbed. This difficulty does not alone justify the weight given by the Chamber to an alleged absence of scientific study into the problem. There can be no substitute for a discussion of the facts of the specific case before the Court. This is after all an application under Article 34 of the Convention, and not Article 33.

It is relevant that none of the applicants has been prevented from moving away from the area. None claims that their house became unsaleable or that they lost value to such an extent that equivalent property elsewhere was not affordable. This point does not, of course, deprive the applicants of the status required to claim to be victims of a violation of the Convention within the meaning of Article 34, but it is highly material in determining whether, overall, the government's policy was so wide-ranging and unreasonable as to render it incompatible with Article 8 of the Convention. It is well known that pressure on property prices around London is so great that they are not seriously affected by aircraft noise. In such circumstances, those who claim sleep disturbance from night flying have a genuine choice as to whether to remain or to move elsewhere.

Modern life is beset with inconveniences. It is an inevitable incident of our changing world that land use plans change and that those changes have an impact on the lives of individuals. From time to time motorways are extended, roads are re-routed or public buildings are erected near private property. Those who are directly affected by such developments are naturally most likely to oppose them. So it is with night flights. But the mere fact that one's private life is interfered with by such developments is not enough to attract the protection of Article 8. It must be demonstrated that, in trying to balance the individual's rights and society's needs and interests, the State has not afforded the rights enshrined in that provision the requisite respect. In addressing that question, the possibility of removing oneself from the source of the inconvenience cannot be ignored.

Having considered all the available evidence, I have concluded that it has not been established that there was a significant interference with the applicants' right to private life.

The State's inquiry into night flights' noise

The majority has concluded that the State did not conduct a sufficient inquiry into the effects of night flying on the sleep of those affected by it (paragraph 106). Since the introduction of the 1993 scheme, however, the Government has taken the following steps, among others, (i) consulted on revised proposals in October and November 1993; (ii) commissioned a study by ANMAC in May 1994; (iii) issued a Consultation paper in March 1995 and a supplement in June 1995; (iv) initiated a trial of modified procedures for early morning landings and published the results in November 1998; (v) commissioned a study to be carried out by the National Physical Laboratory in December 1997; (vi) engaged in a two stage consultation exercise in 1998, publishing the second stage in November of that year; (vii) as a result of the consultation exercise, introduced a new scheme in 1999, and (viii) published a report in March 2000 identifying a number of issues for further possible research.

I cannot subscribe to the view that the Government have been unwarrantably inactive in this area, therefore. On the contrary, the amount of research that has been conducted into the problem of night noise has been substantial, in my opinion. Furthermore, as the judgment records, (paragraph 64) a series of noise mitigation and abatement measures is in place at Heathrow airport, in addition to restrictions on night flights. The DETR and the management of Heathrow airport conduct continuous and detailed monitoring of the restrictions of night flights. These measures betoken a concern that the right to a private life should not be unduly interfered with rather than a failure to accord that right the requisite respect.

The consequences of curtailing night flights

The majority has concluded that "mere reference to the economic well-being of the country is not sufficient to outweigh the rights of others". I agree. In the present case, however, it is surely misconceived to characterise the case made on behalf of the United Kingdom as a "mere reference" to the economic well being of the country. As the judgment has acknowledged, (paragraph 90) the United Kingdom Government had available to them detailed information regarding the economic importance of night flights at Heathrow. The applicants have challenged the accuracy and validity of that information. In particular, they claim that the Oxford Economic Forecasting report did not consider separately the economic importance of night flights. I am not persuaded, however, that it is possible to segregate the night flights factor in the way suggested by the applicants and I do not consider that it has been shown that the economic effects of curtailing night flights will be other than substantial.

The importance to the national economy of the aircraft industry as a whole, and of Heathrow airport in particular, is self-evident. As to the specific role of night flights at Heathrow, some 3% of air movements take place between 23.30 and 6.30; flights between 6.00 and 6.30 are almost exclusively long haul arrivals. British Airways have informed the Court that this sector of the market is particularly important for them for a number of reasons – customer preference, the need to use aircraft as intensively as possible and the lack of runway and terminal capacity at other times – and there is every reason why the same should apply to other airlines. It is, in my view, beyond plausible dispute that night flights form part of that national economic interest. The preponderance of the evidence available to the Court strongly favours the conclusion that there will be considerable adverse effect to the economy if night flights are curtailed.

In reaching the conclusion that the economic well-being of the country did not outweigh the rights of the applicants, the majority referred to the Lopez Ostra case in which the Court found State responsibility for nuisances created by a waste-treatment plant. It has been pointed out that, notwithstanding the undoubted economic interest for the national economy of the tanneries concerned in Lopez Ostra, the Court looked in considerable detail at "whether the national authorities took the measures necessary for protecting the applicant's right to respect for her home and for her private and family life..." I would again respectfully agree that this is an entirely appropriate approach. But the fact that the interest for the national economy of the enterprise concerned did not outweigh the State's obligation to have respect for the applicant's rights under Article 8 in the Lopez Ostra case, does not diminish the potential importance of that factor in other cases in considering whether, if there has been interference with the right to respect for private life and home, that interference may be said to be unjustified. Each case must be considered on its individual merits. In some cases, the economic argument may be pivotal where the interference is not substantial; in others it may be weak, particularly where the interference is considerable. The case of Lopez Ostra does not purport to lay down a general principle that the interest for the national economy is a factor which is to be disregarded or that it must always yield to the need to protect the right to respect for private and home life, especially if the interference with those rights is peripheral or illusory.

Moreover, I would point to a number of significant differences between that case and the present. In Lopez Ostra, the domestic courts accepted that it had been established that the operation of the waste treatment plant created nuisances that "impaired the quality of life of those living in the plant's vicinity" (p. 54, § 50). In the present case, the applicants were not parties in the only court proceedings in the domestic courts. No domestic court has evaluated the actual impact on their lives of the night flights complained of, therefore. Moreover, such proceedings as have been undertaken have concerned procedural aspects of the policy-making process rather than the assessment of any actual nuisance.

By contrast, the waste-treatment plant at issue in Lopez Ostra had started to operate recently (it was built in 1988), was patently illegal in that it was operating without the necessary licences (p. 43, § 8), and the authorities (in re-housing residents, p. 53, § 53) and the courts (p. 44, § 11) accepted that the operation caused actual nuisance. In the present case, Heathrow had been a major international airport long before any of the applicants took up residence at the addresses where they lived when the application was introduced, none of the night flights has been established to be illegal, and the authorities have never taken any measures specific to the applicants.

The majority decision does not address these issues. Rather, it relies on what appears to be a wholly new test for the application of Article 8 in proclaiming that States are required "to minimise, as far as possible, the interference with [Article 8] rights, by trying to find alternative solutions and by generally seeking to achieve their aims in the least onerous way as regards human rights" (paragraph 97). I am not aware of any other Convention case in which such a test has been applied. Indeed, it is difficult to see how it can be reconciled with the principle that States should have a margin of appreciation in devising measures to strike the proper balance between respect for Article 8 rights and the interests of the community as a whole. This margin of appreciation was expressly acknowledged in the Lopez Ostra case (p. 54, § 51; p. 56, § 58). The test enunciated by the majority denies to States any discretion as to how they wish to address socio-economic issues, and instead requires that all policy decisions be dictated by a strict "minimum interference with fundamental rights" rule. Such a rule can form part of domestic law, and is not out of place in the case-law of the European Court of Justice, which is itself an essential part of domestic law for the member States of the European Union. It appears to me to be in conflict with the essential subsidiarity of the Convention system[1], however, and cannot therefore be appropriate to the present case.

Looking at the balance that has to be struck between competing interests (the cases are cited at paragraph 96 of the judgment), one evidently must bear in mind all the factors in a case. The Chamber sets against an increase in permitted levels of night noise from 1993 the following factors: an absence of scientific and/or independent information on the economic interest in night flights (paragraphs 100-102); a limited amount of research as to sleep disturbance and prevention (paragraph 103), and specific action taken to mitigate night noise (paragraph 105). Requiring, as the Chamber in effect does, specific research into the extent of the obvious seems to me to be placing a very substantial, and retroactive, burden on the Government.

A further point to be considered in striking the balance between the various interests is that the applicants are challenging not a specific decision which affected them, but a macro-economic policy. It is open to the Court to consider the effect of general policies or laws on individuals, but it must be aware that to make an assessment of a general policy on the basis of a specific case is an exercise that is fraught with difficulty.

Article 8 § 2 includes in the list of justifications for an interference with Article 8 § 1 rights "the rights of others". In a case involving night flights, the rights and freedoms of air carriers and of passengers must be brought into the equation. It is difficult to envisage how the Government may do so in any meaningful way if they are obliged "to minimise, as far as possible, the interference with [Article 8] rights, by trying to find alternative solutions and by generally seeking to achieve their aims in the least onerous way as regards human rights".

In performing the balancing exercise under Article 8 in this case, one should also consider the consequences of a finding that there has been a violation. The mere fact that a finding of a violation in a particular case might give rise to a large number of applications is not a reason to shirk from that finding. If Convention standards are not met in an individual case, it is the role of the Court to say so, regardless of how many others are in the same position. But when, as here, a substantial proportion of the population of south London is in a similar position to the applicants, the Court must consider whether the proper place for a discussion of the particular policy is in Strasbourg, or whether the issue should not be left to the domestic political sphere.

It will be apparent from the above that I consider that there are so many factors weighing against the applicants, and so few in their favour, that I cannot subscribe to a conclusion that the balance required by Article 8 was not struck in this case.

Article 13

I have concluded that there was no violation under Article 8. As the majority have pointed out, Article 13 has been consistently interpreted by the Court as requiring a remedy in domestic law only in respect of grievances that can be regarded as "arguable" in terms of the Convention. I take the view that the Article 8 claims must so clearly be decided in the Government's favour, that they cannot be considered to be "arguable". Therefore, I must also conclude that there has not been a violation of Article 13.

Had I concluded that the Article 8 claim was arguable, I would still have had doubts as to whether there was a violation of Article 13. The English courts recognise that the intensity of review in a public law case will depend on the subject matter (R (Mahmood) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2001] 1 WLR 840, at page 847, approved by Lord Steyn in R v. Secretary of State of the Home Department, ex parte Daly [2001] 3 All ER 433 at page 477). While this Chamber in its Smith and Grady judgment found that judicial review did not satisfy the requirements of Article 13, that case involved matters of an intensely personal nature for the applicants which put it clearly within the scope of Article 8, and the national security considerations reduced the scope of the review. The present case is different in that the interference with the applicants' right to respect for their Article 8 rights is, as I have outlined above, difficult to define. In these circumstances, I consider that the possibility of a judicial review of the Minister's policy by way of a challenge to the reasonableness, lawfulness and arbitrariness of the policy is precisely the sort of remedy Article 13 envisages in cases involving not a specific decision, or a decision directly affecting an individual, but a challenge to a general policy on night flights.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

CASE OF HATTON AND OTHERS v. THE UNITED KINGDOM

(Application no. 36022/97)

GRAND CHAMBER

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

8 July 2003

In the case of Hatton and Others v. the United Kingdom,

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting as a Grand Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr L. WILDHABER, President,
Mr J.-P. COSTA,
Mr G. RESS,
Mr G. BONELLO,
Mrs E. PALM,
Mr I. CABRAL BARRETO,
Mr R. TÜRMEN,
Mrs V. STRÁŽNICKÁ,
Mr V. BUTKEVYCH,
Mr B. ZUPANČIČ,
Mrs N. VAJIĆ,
Mrs S. BOTOUCHAROVA,
Mr A. KOVLER,
Mr V. ZAGREBELSKY,
Mrs E. STEINER,
Mr S. PAVLOVSCHI,
Sir Brian KERR, ad hoc judge,

and also of Mr P.J. MAHONEY, Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 13 November 2002 and 21 May 2003,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case originated in an application (no. 36022/97) against the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland lodged on 6 May 1997 with the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") under former Article 25 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") by eight United Kingdom nationals, Ms Ruth Hatton, Mr Peter Thake, Mr John Hartley, Ms Philippa Edmunds, Mr John Cavalla, Mr Jeffray Thomas, Mr Richard Bird and Mr Tony Anderson ("the applicants"). The applicants are all members of the Heathrow Association for the Control of Aircraft Noise (HACAN, now HACAN-ClearSkies), which itself is a member of the Heathrow Airport Consultative Committee.

2. The applicants were represented by Mr R. Buxton, a lawyer practising in Cambridge. The United Kingdom Government ("the Government") were represented by their Agent, Mr H. Llewellyn, of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

3. The applicants alleged that government policy on night flights at Heathrow Airport gave rise to a violation of their rights under Article 8 of the Convention and that they were denied an effective domestic remedy for this complaint, contrary to Article 13 of the Convention.

4. The application was transmitted to the Court on 1 November 1998, when Protocol No. 11 to the Convention came into force (Article 5 § 2 of Protocol No. 11).

5. The application was allocated to the Third Section of the Court (Rule 52 § 1 of the Rules of Court). On 16 May 2000, following a hearing on admissibility and the merits (Rule 54 § 4, former version), it was declared admissible by a Chamber of that Section, composed of Mr J. P. Costa, President, Mr L. Loucaides, Mr P. Kūris, Mrs F. Tulkens, Mr K. Jungwiert, Mrs H.S. Greve, judges, Sir Brian Kerr, ad hoc judge, and Mrs S. Dollé, Section Registrar.

6. On 2 October 2001 the Chamber delivered its judgment in which it held, by five votes to two, that there had been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention and, by six votes to one, that there had been a violation of Article 13. The Chamber also decided, by six votes to one, to award compensation for non-pecuniary damage of 4,000 pounds sterling (GBP) to each applicant, and a global sum of GBP 70,000 in respect of legal costs and expenses. The separate opinions of Mr Costa, Mrs Greve and Sir Brian Kerr were annexed to the judgment.

7. On 19 December 2001 the Government requested, in accordance with Article 43 of the Convention and Rule 73, that the case be referred to the Grand Chamber. A panel of the Grand Chamber accepted this request on 27 March 2002.

8. The composition of the Grand Chamber was determined according to the provisions of Article 27 §§ 2 and 3 of the Convention and Rule 24. Mr C.L. Rozakis and Mr P. Lorenzen, who were unable to take part in the final deliberations, were replaced by Mrs E. Steiner and Mr I. Cabral Barreto (Rule 24 § 3).

9. The applicants and the Government each filed written observations on the merits. In addition, third-party comments were received from Friends of the Earth and from British Airways (Article 36 § 2 of the Convention and Rule 61 § 3 of the Rules of Court).

10. A hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 13 November 2002 (Rule 59 § 2).

There appeared before the Court:

(a) for the Government
Mr H. LLEWELLYN, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Agent,
Lord GOLDSMITH QC, Attorney General,
Mr P. HAVERS QC,
Mr J. EADIE, Counsel,
Mr G. GALLIFORD,
Mr P. REARDON,
Mr G. PENDLEBURY,
Ms M. CROKER, Advisers;

(b) for the applicants
Mr D. ANDERSON QC,
Ms H. MOUNTFIELD, Counsel,
Mr R. BUXTON,
Ms S. RING, Solicitors,
Mr C. STANBURY,
Mr M. SHENFIELD, Advisers.

The Court heard addresses by Mr Anderson and Lord Goldsmith.

THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

A. The degree of disturbance caused to each applicant by night flights

11. Ruth Hatton was born in 1963. Between 1991 and 1997 she lived in East Sheen with her husband and two children. According to information supplied by the Government, her house was 11.7 km from the end of the nearest runway at Heathrow and fell within a daytime noise contour where the level of disturbance from aircraft noise was between 57 and 60 dBa Leq. According to the Government, dBA Leq measure the average degree of community annoyance from aircraft noise over a sixteen-hour daytime period and studies have shown that in areas where the daytime noise exposure is below 57 dBA Leq there is no significant community annoyance. The Government state that a daytime noise contour of 57 dBA Leq represents a low level of annoyance; 63 dBA Leq represent a moderate level of annoyance; 69 dBA Leq correspond to a high level of annoyance; and 72 dBA Leq represent a very high level of annoyance.

12. According to Ms Hatton, in 1993 the level of night noise increased and she began to find noise levels to be "intolerable" at night. She believed that the noise was greater when aircraft were landing at Heathrow from the east. When this happened, Ms Hatton was unable to sleep without ear plugs and her children were frequently woken up before 6 a.m., and sometimes before 5 a.m. If Ms Hatton did not wear ear plugs, she would be woken by aircraft activity at around 4 a.m. She was sometimes able to go back to sleep, but found it impossible to go back to sleep once the "early morning bombardment" started which, in the winter of 1996/1997, was between 5 a.m. and 5.30 a.m. When she was woken in this manner, Ms Hatton tended to suffer from a headache for the rest of the day. When aircraft were landing from the west the noise levels were lower, and Ms Hatton's children slept much better, generally not waking up until after 6.30 a.m. In the winter of 1993/1994, Ms Hatton became so run down and depressed by her broken sleep pattern that her doctor prescribed anti-depressants. In October 1997, she moved with her family to Kingston-upon-Thames in order to get away from the aircraft noise at night.

13. Peter Thake was born in 1965. From 1990 until 1998, he lived in Hounslow with his partner. His home in Hounslow was situated 4.4 km from Heathrow Airport and slightly to the north of the southern flight path, within a daytime noise contour of between 63 and 66 dBA Leq, according to the Government.

14. Mr Thake claims that in about 1993 the level of disturbance at night from aircraft noise increased notably and he began to be woken or kept awake at night by aircraft noise. Mr Thake found it particularly difficult to sleep in warmer weather, when open windows increased the disturbance from aircraft noise, and closed windows made it too hot to sleep, and he found it hard to go back to sleep after being woken by aircraft noise early in the morning. He was sometimes kept awake by aeroplanes flying until midnight or 1 a.m. and then woken between 4 a.m. and 5 a.m. Mr Thake was also sometimes woken by aeroplanes flying at odd hours in the middle of the night, for example when diverted from another airport. In 1997, Mr Thake became aware that he could complain to the Heathrow Noise Line about aircraft noise if he made a note of the time of the flight. By 30 April 1997, Mr Thake had been sufficiently disturbed to note the time of a flight, and made a complaint to the Heathrow Noise Line on nineteen occasions. He remained in Hounslow until February 1998 because his family, friends and place of work were in the Heathrow area, but moved to Winchester, in Hampshire, when a suitable job opportunity arose, even though it meant leaving his family and friends, in order to escape from the aircraft noise, which was "driving [him] barmy".

15. John Hartley was born in 1948 and has lived with his wife at his present address in Richmond since 1989. According to the information provided by the Government, Mr Hartley's house is 9.4 km from the end of the nearest Heathrow runway and, situated almost directly under the southern approach to the airport, within a daytime noise contour area of between 60 and 63 dBA Leq. The windows of the house are double-glazed.

16. From 1993, Mr Hartley claims to have noticed a “huge” increase in the disturbance caused by flights between 6 a.m. and 6.30 a.m. (or 8 a.m. on Sundays). He states that the British Airports Authority did not operate a practice of alternation (using only one runway for landings for half the day, and then switching landings to the other runway) during this period as it did during the day, and the airport regularly had aircraft landing from the east on both runways. When the wind was blowing from the west and aeroplanes were landing from the east, which was about 70% of the time, aircraft noise would continue until about midnight, so that Mr Hartley was unable to go to sleep earlier than then. He would find it impossible to sleep after 6 a.m. on any day of the week, and was usually disturbed by aircraft noise at about 5 a.m., after which he found he could not go back to sleep. When the aeroplanes were landing from the west, Mr Hartley was able to sleep.

17. Philippa Edmunds was born in 1954 and lives with her husband and two children in East Twickenham. She has lived at her present address since 1992. According to information supplied by the Government, Ms Edmund's house is 8.5 km from the end of the nearest Heathrow runway and approximately 1 km from the flight path, within a daytime noise contour area of under 57 dBA Leq.

18. The applicant claims that before 1993 she was often woken by aircraft noise at around 6 a.m. From 1993, she tended to be woken at around 4 a.m. In 1996, Ms Edmunds and her husband installed double-glazing in their bedroom to try to reduce the noise. Although the double-glazing reduced the noise, Ms Edmunds continued to be woken by aircraft. She suffered from ear infections in 1996 and 1997 as a result of wearing ear plugs at night and, although she was advised by a doctor to stop using them, she continued to do so in order to be able to sleep. Ms Edmunds was also concerned about the possible long-term effects of using ear plugs, including an increased risk of tinnitus. Ms Edmunds's children both suffered from disturbance by aircraft noise.

19. John Cavalla was born in 1925. From 1970 to 1996 he lived with his wife in Isleworth, directly under the flight path of the northern runway at Heathrow Airport. According to information supplied by the Government, the applicant's house was 6.3 km from the end of the nearest Heathrow runway, within a daytime noise contour of between 63 and 66 dBA Leq.

20. The applicant claims that in the early 1990s the noise climate deteriorated markedly, partly because of a significant increase in traffic, but mainly as a result of aircraft noise in the early morning. Mr Cavalla considers that air traffic increased dramatically between 6 a.m. and 7 a.m. as a result of the shortening of the night quota period. He found that, once woken by an aircraft arriving at Heathrow Airport in the early morning, he was unable to go back to sleep.

21. In 1996, Mr Cavalla and his wife moved to Sunbury in order to get away from the aircraft noise. According to the Government, the new house is 9.5 km from Heathrow, within a daytime noise contour area of under 57 dBA Leq. After moving house, Mr Cavalla did not live under the approach tracks for landing aircraft, and aircraft used the departure route passing over his new home only very rarely at night. Consequently, he was only very rarely exposed to any night-time aircraft noise following his move.

22. Jeffray Thomas was born in 1928 and lives in Kew with his wife and two sons, and the wife and son of one of those sons. The family have lived at their present address since 1975, in a house lying between the north and south Heathrow flight paths. According to the Government, it is 10.7 km from Heathrow, within a noise contour area of 57 to 60 dBA Leq. Aircraft pass overhead on seven or eight days out of every ten when the prevailing wind is from the west.

23. Mr Thomas claims to have noticed a sudden increase in night disturbance in 1993. He complains of being woken at 4.30 a.m., when three or four large aircraft tended to arrive within minutes of each other. Once he was awake, one large aeroplane arriving every half hour was sufficient to keep him awake until 6 a.m. or 6.30 a.m., when the aeroplanes started arriving at frequencies of up to one a minute until about 11 p.m.

24. Richard Bird was born in 1933 and lived in Windsor for thirty years until he retired in December 1998. His house in Windsor was directly under the westerly flight path to Heathrow Airport. According to the Government, it was 11.5 km from Heathrow, within a daytime noise contour area of 57 to 60 dBA Leq.

25. The applicant claims that in recent years, and particularly from 1993, he and his wife suffered from intrusive aircraft noise at night. Although Mr Bird observed that both take-offs and landings continued later and later into the evenings, the main problem was caused by the noise of early morning landings. He stated that on very many occasions he was woken at 4.30 a.m. or 5 a.m. by incoming aircraft, and was then unable to get back to sleep, and felt extremely tired later in the day. Mr Bird retired in December 1998 and moved with his wife to Wokingham, in Surrey, specifically to get away from the aircraft noise which was “really getting on [his] nerves”.

26. Tony Anderson was born in 1932 and has lived since 1963 in Touchen End, under the approach to runway 09L at Heathrow Airport and, according to the Government, 17.3 km from the end of the nearest runway, within a daytime noise contour area of under 57 dBA Leq.

According to the applicant, by 1994 he began to find that his sleep was being disturbed by aircraft noise at night, and that he was being woken at 4.15 a.m. or even earlier by aircraft coming in from the west to land at Heathrow Airport.

27. The dBA Leq noise contour figures supplied by the Government and referred to above measure levels of annoyance caused by noise during the course of an average summer day. The Government state that it is not possible to map equivalent contours for night noise disturbance, because there is no widely accepted scale or standard with which to measure night-time annoyance caused by aircraft noise. However, the Government claim that the maximum "average sound exposure" levels, in decibels (dBA), suffered by each applicant as a result of the seven different types of aircraft arriving at Heathrow before 6 a.m. each morning is as follows: Ms Hatton – 88 dBA; Mr Thake – 88.8 dBA; Mr Hartley – 89.9 dBA; Ms Edmunds – 83.4 dBA; Mr Cavalla (at his previous address) – 94.4 dBA; Mr Thomas – 88.7 dBA; Mr Bird – 87.8 dBA; and Mr Anderson – 84.1 dBA.

The Government further claim that the average "peak noise event" levels, that is the maximum noise caused by a single aircraft movement, suffered by each applicant at night are as follows: Mrs Hatton – 76.3 dBA; Mr Thake – 77.1 dBA; Mr Hartley – 78.9 dBA; Ms Edmunds – 70 dBA; Mr Cavalla (at his previous address) – 85 dBA; Mr Thomas – 77.2 dBA; Mr Bird – 76 dBA; Mr Anderson – 71.1 dBA.

The Government claim that research commissioned before the 1993 review of night restrictions indicated that average outdoor sound exposure levels of below 90 dBA, equivalent to peak noise event levels of approximately 80 dBA, were unlikely to cause any measurable increase in overall rates of sleep disturbance experienced during normal sleep. The applicants, however, refer to World Health Organisation "Guidelines for Community Noise", which gave a guideline value for avoiding sleep disturbance at night of a single noise event of 60 dBA[1].

B. The night-time regulatory regime for Heathrow Airport

28. Heathrow Airport is the busiest airport in Europe, and the busiest international airport in the world. It is used by over 90 airlines, serving over

[1] . The Government note that these guidelines were promulgated in 1999, and that they represent a target at which sleep will not be disturbed, rather than an international standard.

180 destinations world-wide. It is the United Kingdom's leading port in terms of visible trade.

29. Restrictions on night flights at Heathrow Airport were introduced in 1962 and have been reviewed periodically, most recently in 1988, 1993 and 1998.

30. Between 1978 and 1987, a number of reports into aircraft noise and sleep disturbance were published by or on behalf of the Civil Aviation Authority.

31. A Consultation Paper was published by the United Kingdom government in November 1987 in the context of a review of the night restrictions policy at Heathrow. The Consultation Paper stated that research into the relationship between aircraft noise and sleep suggested that the number of movements at night could be increased by perhaps 25% without worsening disturbance, provided levels of dBA Leq were not increased.

32. It indicated that there were two reasons for not considering a ban on night flights: firstly, that a ban on night flights would deny airlines the ability to plan some scheduled flights in the night period, and to cope with disruptions and delays; secondly, that a ban on night flights would damage the status of Heathrow Airport as a twenty-four-hour international airport (with implications for safety and maintenance and the needs of passengers) and its competitive position in relation to a number of other European airports.

33. From 1988 to 1993, night flying was regulated solely by means of a limitation on the number of take-offs and landings permitted at night. The hours of restriction were as follows:

Summer 11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m. weekdays,
11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m. Sunday landings,
11.30 p.m. to 8 a.m. Sunday take-offs;

Winter 11.30 p.m. to 6.30 a.m. weekdays,
11.30 p.m. to 8 a.m. Sunday take-offs and landings.

34. In July 1990, the Department of Transport commenced an internal review of the restrictions on night flights. A new classification of aircraft and the development of a quota count system were the major focus of the review. As part of the review, the Department of Transport asked the Civil Aviation Authority to undertake further objective study of aircraft noise and sleep disturbance. The objectives of the review included “to continue to protect local communities from excessive aircraft noise at night” and “to ensure that the competitive influences affecting UK airports and airlines and the wider employment and economic implications are taken into account”.

35. The fieldwork for the study was carried out during the summer of 1991. Measurements of disturbance were obtained from 400 subjects living in the vicinity of Heathrow, Gatwick, Stansted and Manchester Airports. The findings were published in December 1992 as the “Report of a field study of aircraft noise and sleep disturbance" ("the 1992 sleep study"). It found that, once asleep, very few people living near airports were at risk of any substantial sleep disturbance due to aircraft noise and that, compared with the overall average of about eighteen nightly awakenings without any aircraft noise, even large numbers of noisy night-time aircraft movements would cause very little increase in the average person's nightly awakenings. It concluded that the results of the field study provided no evidence to suggest that aircraft noise was likely to cause harmful after-effects. It also emphasised, however, that its conclusions were based on average effects, and that some of the subjects of the study (2 to 3%) were over 60% more sensitive than average.

36. In January 1993, the government published a Consultation Paper regarding a proposed new scheme for regulating night flights at the three main airports serving London: Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted. The Consultation Paper set up four objectives of the review being undertaken (so far as Heathrow was concerned): to revise and update the existing arrangements; to introduce a common night flights regime for the three airports; to continue to protect local communities from excessive aircraft noise levels at night; and to ensure that competitive influences and the wider employment and economic implications were taken into account. In a section entitled "Concerns of local people", the Consultation Paper referred to arguments that night flights should be further restricted or banned altogether. In the authors' view, the proposals struck a fair balance between the different interests and did "protect local people from excessive aircraft noise at night". In considering the demand for night flights, the Consultation Paper made reference to the fact that, if restrictions on night flights were imposed in the United Kingdom, certain flights would not be as convenient or their costs would be higher than those that competitors abroad could offer, and that passengers would choose alternatives that better suited their requirements.

37. It also stated that various foreign operators were based at airports with no night restrictions, which meant that they could keep prices down by achieving a high utilisation of aircraft, and that this was a crucial factor in attracting business in what was a highly competitive and price-sensitive market.

38. Further, the Consultation Paper stated that both regular and charter airlines believed that their operations could be substantially improved by being allowed more movements during the night period, especially landings.

It also indicated that charter companies required the ability to operate in the night period, as they operated in a highly competitive, price-sensitive market and needed to contain costs as much as possible. The commercial viability of their business depended on high utilisation of their aircraft, which typically required three rotations a day to nearer destinations, and this could only be fitted in by using movements at night.

39. Finally, as regards night flights, the Consultation Paper referred to the continuing demand for some all-cargo flights at night carrying mail and other time-sensitive freight such as newspapers and perishable goods, and pointed to the fact that all-cargo movements were banned, whether arriving or departing, for much of the day at Heathrow Airport.

40. The Consultation Paper referred to the 1992 sleep study, noting that it had found that the number of disturbances caused by aircraft noise was so small that it had a negligible effect on overall normal disturbance rates, and that disturbance rates from all causes were not at a level likely to affect people's health or well-being.

41. The Consultation Paper further stated that, in keeping with the undertaking given in 1988 not to allow a worsening of noise at night, and ideally to reduce it, it was proposed that the quota for the next five years based on the new system should be set at a level such as to keep overall noise levels below those in 1988.

42. A considerable number of responses to the Consultation Paper were received from trade and industry associations with an interest in air travel (including the International Air Transport Association (IATA), the Confederation of British Industry and the London and Thames Valley Chambers of Commerce) and from airlines, all of which emphasised the economic importance of night flights. Detailed information and figures were provided by the associations and the airlines to support their responses.

43. On 6 July 1993 the Secretary of State for Transport announced his intention to introduce, with effect from October 1993, a quota system of night flying restrictions, the stated aim of which was to reduce noise at the three main London airports, which included Heathrow ("the 1993 Scheme").

44. The 1993 Scheme introduced a noise quota scheme for the night quota period. Under the noise quota scheme each aircraft type was assigned a "quota count" between 0.5 QC (for the quietest) and 16 QC (for the noisiest). Each airport was then allotted a certain number of quota points, and aircraft movements had to be kept within the permitted points total. The effect of this was that, under the 1993 Scheme, rather than a maximum number of individual aircraft movements being specified, aircraft operators could choose within the noise quota whether to operate a greater number of quieter aeroplanes or a lesser number of noisier aeroplanes. The system was designed, according to the 1993 Consultation Paper, to encourage the use of quieter aircraft by making noisier types use more of the quota for each movement.

45. The 1993 Scheme defined "night" as the period between 11 p.m. and 7 a.m., and further defined a "night quota period" from 11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m., seven days a week, throughout the year, when the controls were strict. During the night, operators were not permitted to schedule the noisier types of aircraft to take off (aircraft with a quota count of 8 QC or 16 QC) or to land (aircraft with a quota count of 16 QC). During the night quota period, aircraft movements were restricted by a movements limit and a noise quota, which were set for each season (summer and winter).

46. The 1993 Consultation Paper had proposed a rating of 0 QC for the quietest aircraft. This would have allowed an unlimited number of these aircraft to fly at night, and the government took account of objections to this proposal in deciding to rate the quietest aircraft at 0.5 QC. Otherwise, the 1993 Scheme was broadly in accordance with the proposals set out in the 1993 Consultation Paper.

47. The local authorities for the areas around the three main London airports sought judicial review of the Secretary of State's decision to introduce the 1993 Scheme, making four consecutive applications for judicial review and appealing twice to the Court of Appeal (see paragraphs 80-83 below). As a result of the various judgments delivered by the High Court and Court of Appeal, the government consulted on revised proposals in October and November 1993; commissioned a study by ANMAC (the Aircraft Noise Monitoring Advisory Committee of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions (DETR) formerly the Department of Transport) in May 1994 into ground noise at night at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted Airports; added to the quota count system an overall maximum number of aircraft movements; issued a further Consultation Paper in March 1995 and issued a supplement to the March 1995 Consultation Paper in June 1995.

48. The June 1995 supplement stated that the Secretary of State's policies and the proposals based on them allowed more noise than was experienced from actual aircraft movements in the summer of 1988, and acknowledged that this was contrary to government policy, as expressed in the 1993 Consultation Paper. As part of the 1995 review of the 1993 Scheme, the government reviewed the Civil Aviation Authority reports on aircraft noise and sleep disturbance, including the 1992 sleep study. The DETR prepared a series of papers on night arrival and departure statistics at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted Airports, scheduling and curfews in relation to night movements, runway capacity between 6 a.m. and 7 a.m., Heathrow night arrivals for four sample weeks in 1994, and Heathrow night departures for four sample weeks in 1994. The DETR also considered a paper prepared by Heathrow Airport Limited on the implications of a prohibition on night flights between 12 midnight and 5.30 a.m.

49. On 16 August 1995 the Secretary of State for Transport announced that the noise quotas and all other aspects of the night restrictions regime would remain as previously announced. In July 1996, the Court of Appeal confirmed the lawfulness of the 1993 Scheme, as it had been amended (see paragraphs 82-83 below).

50. The movement limits for Heathrow under the 1993 Scheme, introduced as a consequence of the legal challenges in the domestic courts, were set at 2,550 per winter season from 1994/1995 to 1997/1998, and 3,250 per summer season from 1995 to 1998 (the seasons being deemed to change when the clocks changed from Greenwich Mean Time (GMT) to British Summer Time (BST)). The noise quotas for Heathrow up to the summer of 1998 were set at 5,000 for each winter season and 7,000 for each summer season. Flights involving emergencies were excluded from the restrictions. The number of movements permitted during the night quota period (i.e. from 11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m.) remained at about the same level as between 1988 and 1993. At the same time, the number of movements permitted during the night period (i.e. from 11 p.m. to 7 a.m.) increased under the 1993 Scheme due to the reduction in the length of the night quota period.

51. In September 1995, a trial was initiated at Heathrow Airport of modified procedures for early morning landings (those between 4 a.m. and 6 a.m.). The aim of the trial, which was conducted by National Air Traffic Services Limited on behalf of the DETR, was to help alleviate noise over parts of central London in the early morning. An interim report, entitled "Assessment of revised Heathrow early mornings approach procedures trial", was published in November 1998.

52. In December 1997, a study, commissioned by the DETR and carried out by the National Physical Laboratory gave rise to a report, "Night noise contours: a feasibility study", which was published the same month. The report contained a detailed examination of the causes and consequences of night noise, and identified possible areas of further research. It concluded that there was not enough research evidence to produce "scientifically robust night contours that depict levels of night-time annoyance".

53. In 1998, the government conducted a two-stage consultation exercise on night restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted Airports. In February 1998, a Preliminary Consultation Paper on night restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted was published. The Preliminary Consultation Paper stated that most night movements catered primarily for different needs from those that took place during the daytime, and set out reasons for allowing night flights. These were essentially the same as those given in the 1993 Consultation Paper.

54. In addition, the Preliminary Consultation Paper referred to the fact that air transport was one of the fastest growing sectors of the world economy and contained some of the United Kingdom's most successful firms. Air transport facilitated economic growth, world trade, international investment and tourism, and was of particular importance to the United Kingdom because of its open economy and geographical position. The Consultation Paper went on to say that permitting night flights, albeit subject to restrictions, at major airports in the United Kingdom had contributed to this success.

55. The government set movement limits and noise quotas for winter 1998/99 at the same level as for the previous winter, in order to allow adequate time for consultation.

56. The British Air Transport Association (BATA) commissioned a report from Coopers & Lybrand into the economic costs of maintaining the restrictions on night flights. The report was published in July 1997 and was entitled "The economic costs of night flying restrictions at the London airports". The report concluded that the economic cost of the then current restrictions being maintained during the period 1997/1998 to 2002/2003 was about 850 million pounds sterling (GBP). BATA submitted the report to the government when it responded to the Preliminary Consultation Paper.

57. On 10 September 1998 the Government announced that the movement limits and noise quotas for summer 1999 would be the same as for summer 1998.

58. In November 1998, the government published the second stage Consultation Paper on night restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted. The Consultation Paper stated that it had been the view of successive governments that the policy on night noise should be firmly based on research into the relationship between aircraft noise and interference with sleep and that, in order to preserve the balance between the different interests, this should continue to be the basis for decisions. The Consultation Paper indicated that "interference with sleep" was intended to cover both sleep disturbance (an awakening from sleep, however short) and sleep prevention (a delay in first getting to sleep at night, and awakening and then not being able to get back to sleep in the early morning). The Consultation Paper stated that further research into the effect of aircraft noise on sleep had been commissioned, which would include a review of existing research in the United Kingdom and abroad, and a trial to assess methodology and analytical techniques to determine whether to proceed to a full-scale study of either sleep prevention or total sleep loss.

59. The Consultation Paper repeated the finding of the 1992 sleep study that for noise events in the range of 90-100 dBA SEL (80-95 dBA Lmax), the likelihood of the average person being awakened by an aircraft noise event was about 1 in 75. It acknowledged that the 1 in 75 related to sleep disturbance, and not to sleep prevention, and that while there was a substantial body of research on sleep disturbance, less was known about sleep prevention or total sleep loss.

60. The Consultation Paper stated that the objectives of the current review were, in relation to Heathrow, to strike a balance between the need to protect local communities from excessive aircraft noise levels at night and to provide for air services to operate at night where they were of benefit to the local, regional and national economy; to ensure that the competitive factors affecting United Kingdom airports and airlines and the wider employment and economic implications were taken into account; to take account of the research into the relationship between aircraft noise and interference with sleep and any health effects; to encourage the use of quieter aircraft at night; and to put in place at Heathrow, for the night quota period (11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m.), arrangements which would bring about further improvements in the night noise climate around the airport over time and update the arrangements as appropriate.

61. The Consultation Paper stated that since the introduction of the 1993 Scheme, there had been an improvement in the noise climate around Heathrow during the night quota period, based on the total of the quota count ratings of aircraft counted against the noise quota, but that there had probably been a deterioration over the full night period between 11 p.m. and 7 a.m. as a result of the growth in traffic between 6 a.m. and 7 a.m.

62. The Consultation Paper found a strong customer preference for overnight long-haul services from the Asia-Pacific region.

63. The Consultation Paper indicated that the government had not attempted to quantify the aviation and economic benefits of night flights in financial terms. This was because of the difficulties in obtaining reliable and impartial data on passenger and economic benefits (some of which were commercially sensitive) and modelling these complex interactions. BATA had submitted a copy of the Coopers & Lybrand July 1997 report with its response to the Preliminary Consultation Paper, and the Consultation Paper noted that the report estimated the value of an additional daily long-haul scheduled night flight at Heathrow to be GBP 20 million to GBP 30 million per year, over half of which was made up of airline profits. The Consultation Paper stated that the financial effects on airlines were understood to derive from estimates made by a leading United Kingdom airline. Other parts of the calculation reflected assumptions about the effects on passengers and knock-on effects on other services, expressed in terms of an assumed percentage of the assumed revenue earned by these services. The Consultation Paper stated that the cost of restricting existing night flights more severely might be different, and that BATA's figures took no account of the wider economic effects which were not captured in the estimated airline and passenger impacts.

64. The Consultation Paper stated that, in formulating its proposals, the government had taken into account both BATA's figures and the fact that it was not possible for the government to test the estimates or the assumptions made by BATA. Any value attached to a “marginal” night flight had to be weighed against the environmental disadvantages. These could not be estimated in financial terms, but it was possible, drawing on the 1992 sleep study, to estimate the number of people likely to be awakened. The Consultation Paper concluded that, in forming its proposals, the government must take into account, on the one hand, the important aviation interests involved and the wider economic considerations. It seemed clear that United Kingdom airlines and airports would stand to lose business, including in the daytime, if prevented by unduly severe restrictions from offering limited services at night, that users could also suffer, and that the services offered by United Kingdom airports and airlines would diminish, and with them the appeal of London and the United Kingdom more generally. On the other hand, these considerations had to be weighed against the noise disturbance caused by night flights. The proposals made in the Consultation Paper aimed to strike a balance between the different interests and, in the government's view, would protect local people from excessive aircraft noise at night.

65. The main proposals in relation to Heathrow were: not to introduce a ban on night flights, or a curfew period; to retain the seasonal noise quotas and movement limits; to review the QC classifications of individual aircraft and, if this produced significant re-classifications, to reconsider the quota limits; to retain the QC system; to review the QC system before the 2002 summer season (when fleet compositions would have changed following completion of the compulsory phase-out in Europe of "Chapter 2" civil aircraft, with the exception of Concorde, which began in April 1995), in accordance with the policy of encouraging the use of quieter aircraft; to reduce the summer and winter noise quotas; to maintain the night period as 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. and the night quota period as 11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m.; to extend the restrictions on aircraft classified as QC8 on arrival or departure to match those for QC16; and to ban QC4 aircraft from being scheduled to land or take off during the night quota period from the start of the 2002 summer season (that is, after completion of the compulsory Chapter 2 phase-out).

66. The Consultation Paper stated that since the introduction of the 1993 Scheme, headroom had developed in the quotas, reducing the incentive for operators to use quieter aircraft. The reduction in summer and winter noise quotas to nearer the level of current usage was intended as a first step to restoring the incentive. The winter noise quota level under the 1993 Scheme was 5,000 QC points, and the average usage in the last two traffic seasons had been 3,879 QC points. A reduction to 4,000 was proposed. The summer noise quota level had been 7,000 points, and the average usage in the last two seasons was provisionally calculated at 4,472. A reduction to 5,400 was proposed. The new levels would remain in place until the end of the summer 2004 season, subject to the outcome of the QC review.

67. Part 2 of the Consultation Paper invited comments as to whether runway alternation should be introduced at Heathrow at night, and on the preferential use of Heathrow's runways at night.

68. On 10 June 1999 the government announced that the proposals in the November 1998 Consultation Paper would be implemented with effect from 31 October 1999, with limited modifications. With respect to Heathrow, the only modification was that there was to be a smaller reduction in the noise quotas than proposed. The quotas were set at 4,140 QC points for the winter, and 5,610 QC points for the summer. The effect of this was to set the winter quota at a level below actual usage in winter 1998/99.

69. The 1999 Scheme came into effect on 31 October 1999.

70. On 10 November 1999, a report was published on "The contribution of the aviation industry to the UK economy". The report was prepared by Oxford Economic Forecasting and was sponsored by a number of airlines, airport operators and BATA, as well as the government.

71. On 23 November 1999 the government announced that runway alternation at Heathrow would be extended into the night "at the earliest practicable opportunity", and issued a further Consultation Paper concerning proposals for changes to the preferential use of Heathrow's runways at night.

72. In December 1999, the DETR and National Air Traffic Services Limited published the final report of the ANMAC Technical Working Group on "Noise from Arriving Aircraft". The purpose of the report was to describe objectively the sources of operational noise for arriving aircraft, to consider possible means of noise amelioration, and to make recommendations to the DETR.

73. In March 2000, the Department of Operational Research and Analysis (DORA) published a report, prepared on behalf of the DETR, entitled "Adverse effects of night-time aircraft noise". The report identified a number of issues for possible further research, and was intended to form the background to any future United Kingdom studies of night-time aircraft noise. The report stated that gaps in knowledge had been identified, and indicated that the DETR was considering whether there was a case for a further full-scale study on the adverse effects of night-time aircraft noise, and had decided to commission two further short research studies to investigate the options. These studies were commissioned in the autumn of 1999, before the publication of the DORA report. One is a trial study to assess research methodology. The other is a social survey the aims of which included an exploration of the difference between objectively measured and publicly received disturbance due to aircraft noise at night. Both studies are being conducted by university researchers.

74. A series of noise mitigation and abatement measures is in place at Heathrow Airport, in addition to restrictions on night flights. These include the following: aircraft noise certification to reduce noise at source; the compulsory phasing out of older, noisier jet aircraft; noise preferential routes and minimum climb gradients for aircraft taking off; noise abatement approach procedures (continuous descent and low power/low drag procedures); limitation of air transport movements; noise-related airport charges; noise insulation grant schemes; and compensation for noise nuisance under the Land Compensation Act 1973.

75. The DETR and the management of Heathrow Airport conduct continuous and detailed monitoring of the restrictions on night flights.

Reports are provided each quarter to members of the Heathrow Airport Consultative Committee, on which local government bodies responsible for areas in the vicinity of Heathrow Airport and local residents' associations are represented.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW AND PRACTICE

A. The Civil Aviation Act 1982 ("the 1982 Act")

76. Section 76(1) of the 1982 Act provides, in its relevant part:

> "No action shall lie in respect of trespass or in respect of nuisance, by reason only of the flight of an aircraft over any property at a height above the ground which, having regard to wind, weather and all the circumstances of the case, is reasonable, or the ordinary incidents of such flight, so long as the provisions of any Air Navigation Order ... have been duly complied with ..."

77. Air Navigation Orders made under the 1982 Act provide for Orders in Council to be made for the regulation of aviation. Orders in Council have been made to deal with, amongst other matters, engine emissions, noise certification and compensation for noise nuisance.

78. Section 78(3) of the 1982 Act provides, in its relevant part:

> "If the Secretary of State considers it appropriate for the purpose of avoiding, limiting or mitigating the effect of noise and vibration connected with the taking-off or landing of aircraft at a designated aerodrome, to prohibit aircraft from taking off or landing, or limit the number of occasions on which they may take off or land, at the aerodrome during certain periods, he may by a notice published in the prescribed manner do all or any of the following, that is to say –
> (a) prohibit aircraft of descriptions specified in the notice from taking off or landing at the aerodrome (otherwise than in an emergency of a description so specified) during periods so specified;
> (b) specify the maximum number of occasions on which aircraft of descriptions so specified may be permitted to take off or land at the aerodrome ... during the periods so specified;

79. Restrictions on night flights at Heathrow Airport are imposed by means of notices published by the Secretary of State under section 78(3) of the 1982 Act.

B. The challenges to the 1993 Scheme

80. The local authorities for the areas around the three main London airports sought judicial review of the Secretary of State's decision to introduce the 1993 Scheme. They made four consecutive applications for judicial review, and appealed twice to the Court of Appeal. The High Court declared that the 1993 Scheme was contrary to the terms of section 78(3)(b) of the 1982 Act, and therefore invalid, because it did not "specify the maximum number of occasions on which aircraft of descriptions so specified may be permitted to take off or land" but, instead, imposed controls by reference to levels of exposure to noise energy (see R. v. Secretary of State for Transport, ex parte Richmond upon Thames Borough Council and Others [1994] 1 Weekly Law Reports 74).

81. The Secretary of State decided to retain the quota count system, but with the addition of an overall maximum number of aircraft movements. This decision was held by the High Court to be in accordance with section 78(3)(b) of the 1982 Act. However, the 1993 Consultation Paper was held to have been "materially misleading" in failing to make clear that the implementation of the proposals for Heathrow Airport would permit an increase in noise levels over those experienced in 1988 (see R. v. Secretary of State for Transport, ex parte Richmond upon Thames Borough Council and Others [1995] Environmental Law Reports 390).

82. Following the publication of a further Consultation Paper in March 1995, and of a supplement to the March 1995 Consultation Paper in June 1995, the local authorities brought a further application for judicial review. In July 1996, the Court of Appeal decided that the Secretary of State had given adequate reasons and sufficient justification for his conclusion that it was reasonable, on balance, to run the risk of diminishing to some degree local people's ability to sleep at night because of the other countervailing considerations to which he was, in 1993, willing to give greater weight, and that by June 1995 errors in the consultation papers had been corrected and the new policy could not be said to be irrational (see R. v. Secretary of State for Transport, ex parte Richmond LBC [1996] 1 Weekly Law Reports 1460).

83. On 12 November 1996 the House of Lords dismissed a petition by the local authorities for leave to appeal against the decision of the Court of Appeal.

THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 OF THE CONVENTION

84. The applicants complained that the government policy on night flights at Heathrow introduced in 1993 violated their rights under Article 8 of the Convention, which provides:

> "1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

The Government denied that there had been any violation of the Convention in this case.

A. The general principles

1. The Chamber's judgment

85. In its judgment of 2 October 2001, the Chamber held that because Heathrow Airport and the aircraft which used it were not owned, controlled or operated by the government or its agents, the United Kingdom could not be said to have "interfered" with the applicants' private or family lives. Instead, the Chamber analysed the applicants' complaints in terms of a positive duty on the State to take reasonable and appropriate measures to secure the applicants' rights under Article 8 § 1 (see paragraph 95 of the Chamber's judgment).

86. The Chamber further held that, whatever analytical approach was adopted, regard must be had to the fair balance that had to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and the community as a whole. In both contexts, the State enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in determining the steps to be taken to ensure compliance with the Convention (see paragraph 96 of the Chamber's judgment). However, the Chamber underlined that in striking the required balance States must have regard to the whole range of material considerations. Further, in the particularly sensitive field of environmental protection, mere reference to the economic well-being of the country was not sufficient to outweigh the rights of others. The Chamber considered that States were required to minimise, as far as possible, interference with Article 8 rights, by trying to find alternative solutions and by generally seeking to achieve their aims in the least onerous way as regards human rights. In order to do that, a proper and complete investigation and study, with the aim of finding the best possible solution which would, in reality, strike the right balance, should precede the relevant project (see paragraph 97 of the Chamber's judgment).

2. The parties' submissions

(a) The Government

87. In their letter requesting that the case be referred to the Grand Chamber, and in their written and oral observations to the Grand Chamber, the Government strongly objected to the "minimum interference" approach outlined by the Chamber in paragraph 97 of its judgment.

The Government argued that this test in the context of the present type of case was at odds with a consistent line of Convention jurisprudence and was unwarranted in principle. They submitted that the test reduced to vanishing-point the margin of appreciation afforded to States in an area involving difficult and complex balancing of a variety of competing interests and factors.

88. Not merely was there clear authority in favour of a wide margin, it was appropriate and right in principle that the State should be allowed such a margin in a context such as the present, since it involved the balancing of a number of competing rights and interests, the importance and sensitivity of some of which might be difficult accurately to evaluate. There was no single correct policy to be applied as regards the regulation of night flights; States could and did adopt a variety of different approaches. The Government reasoned that the present context was similar to the field of planning policy, where the Court had consistently recognised that by reason of their direct and continuous contact with the vital forces of their countries and because of the range of discretionary issues involved, the national authorities were in principle better placed than an international court to evaluate local conditions and needs.

89. They accepted that inherent in the striking of a fair balance was a need to be sufficiently informed in relation to the relevant issues, in order to avoid making or appearing to make an arbitrary decision. However, the decision-making process was primarily for the national authorities, in this case, the government, subject to judicial review by the domestic courts. The European Court's powers in this context were supervisory: in the absence of any indication of an arbitrary or clearly inadequate investigation, a detailed and minute critique of the information which the government should take into account was neither necessary nor appropriate.

(b) The applicants

90. The applicants argued that it was well established from previous case-law that aircraft noise was capable of infringing the Article 8 rights of those sufficiently affected by it and that national authorities owed a positive duty to take steps to ensure the effective protection of these rights. Relying on earlier environmental cases and also child-care and other cases under Article 8, they submitted that the duty could be breached in circumstances where, having regard to the margin of appreciation, the Court considered that the State had struck the wrong substantive balance between the interest it pursued and the individual's effective enjoyment of the Article 8 right, or where there had been a procedural failing, such as the failure to disclose information to an individual affected by environmental nuisance or a failure to base a decision-making process on the relevant considerations or to give relevant and sufficient reasons for an interference with a fundamental right.

91. The applicants accepted that any informed assessment of whether an interference with Article 8 rights was "necessary in a democratic society" would be accorded a margin of appreciation, the width of that margin depending on the context. However, they submitted that in the present case the margin should be narrow, because deprivation of sleep by exposure to excessive noise, like the infliction of inhuman or degrading treatment, was a matter which could and should be judged by similar standards in similar Contracting States.

92. Moreover, where a case – such as the present – could be decided on the basis of a procedural breach, namely the government's failure properly to assemble the evidence necessary for the decision-making process, the doctrine of the margin of appreciation had no role to play, since the international judge was well placed to assess the adequacy of the procedural safeguards applied by the State.

93. For the applicants, the approach of the Chamber – that the violation of Article 8 was based on the government's failure to assemble the evidence that would have been necessary for the decision to be made on the basis of the relevant considerations – was but one way of dealing with the case. A violation of Article 8 could also be established on the basis that the necessary steps to ensure protection of Article 8 rights were not taken, that "relevant and sufficient reasons" had not been given for the interference, or that the substantive balance of interests had not been properly struck.

3. The third parties

94. Friends of the Earth submitted that the Chamber's judgment in the present case was consistent with developments in national and international law concerning the relationship between human rights and the environment. In particular, it was consistent with requirements under general international law requiring decision-makers to satisfy themselves by means of proper, complete, and prior investigation as to the factors which should be taken into account in order to achieve an appropriate balance between individual rights and the State's economic interests.

95. British Airways did not comment on the general principles to be applied by the Court.

4. The Court's assessment

96. Article 8 protects the individual's right to respect for his or her private and family life, home and correspondence. There is no explicit right in the Convention to a clean and quiet environment, but where an individual is directly and seriously affected by noise or other pollution, an issue may arise under Article 8. Thus, in Powell and Rayner v. the United Kingdom (judgment of 21 February 1990, Series A no. 172, p. 18, § 40), where the applicants had complained about disturbance from daytime aircraft noise, the Court held that Article 8 was relevant, since "the quality of [each] applicant's private life and the scope for enjoying the amenities of his home [had] been adversely affected by the noise generated by aircraft using Heathrow Airport". Similarly, in López Ostra v. Spain (judgment of 9 December 1994, Series A no. 303-C, pp. 54-55, § 51) the Court held that Article 8 could include a right to protection from severe environmental pollution, since such a problem might "affect individuals' well-being and prevent them from enjoying their homes in such a way as to affect their private and family life adversely, without, however, seriously endangering their health". In Guerra and Others v. Italy (judgment of 19 February 1998, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1998-I), which, like López Ostra, concerned environmental pollution, the Court observed that "[the] direct effect of the toxic emissions on the applicants' right to respect for their private and family life means that Article 8 is applicable" (p. 227, § 57).

97. At the same time, the Court reiterates the fundamentally subsidiary role of the Convention. The national authorities have direct democratic legitimation and are, as the Court has held on many occasions, in principle better placed than an international court to evaluate local needs and conditions (see, for example, Handyside v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 7 December 1976, Series A no. 24, p. 22, § 48). In matters of general policy, on which opinions within a democratic society may reasonably differ widely, the role of the domestic policy-maker should be given special weight (see James and Others v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 21 February 1986, Series A no. 98, p. 32, § 46, where the Court found it natural that the margin of appreciation "available to the legislature in implementing social and economic policies should be a wide one").

98. Article 8 may apply in environmental cases whether the pollution is directly caused by the State or whether State responsibility arises from the failure to regulate private industry properly. Whether the case is analysed in terms of a positive duty on the State to take reasonable and appropriate measures to secure the applicants' rights under paragraph 1 of Article 8 or in terms of an interference by a public authority to be justified in accordance with paragraph 2, the applicable principles are broadly similar. In both contexts regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole; and in both contexts the State enjoys a certain margin of appreciation in determining the steps to be taken to ensure compliance with the Convention. Furthermore, even in relation to the positive obligations flowing from the first paragraph of Article 8, in striking the required balance the aims mentioned in the second paragraph may be of a certain relevance (see Powell and Rayner, p. 18, § 41, and López Ostra pp. 54-55, § 51, both cited above).

99. The Court considers that in a case such as the present one, involving State decisions affecting environmental issues, there are two aspects to the inquiry which may be carried out by the Court. First, the Court may assess the substantive merits of the government's decision, to ensure that it is compatible with Article 8. Secondly, it may scrutinise the decision-making process to ensure that due weight has been accorded to the interests of the individual.

100. In relation to the substantive aspect, the Court has held that the State must be allowed a wide margin of appreciation. In Powell and Rayner, for example, it asserted that it was "certainly not for the Commission or the Court to substitute for the assessment of the national authorities any other assessment of what might be the best policy in this difficult social and technical sphere", namely the regulation of excessive aircraft noise and the means of redress to be provided to the individual within the domestic legal system. The Court continued that "this is an area where the Contracting States are to be recognised as enjoying a wide margin of appreciation" (p. 19, § 44).

101. In other cases involving environmental issues, for example planning cases, the Court has also held that the State must be allowed a wide margin of appreciation. The Court explained the reasons for this approach in Buckley v. the United Kingdom, where the applicant complained that she had been denied planning permission to install a residential caravan on land that she owned (judgment of 25 September 1996, Reports 1996-IV, pp. 1291-93, §§ 74-77):

> "74. As is well established in the Court's case-law, it is for the national authorities to make the initial assessment of the 'necessity' for an interference, as regards both the legislative framework and the particular measure of implementation ... Although a margin of appreciation is thereby left to the national authorities, their decision remains subject to review by the Court for conformity with the requirements of the Convention.
> The scope of this margin of appreciation is not identical in each case but will vary according to the context ... Relevant factors include the nature of the Convention right in issue, its importance for the individual and the nature of the activities concerned.

> 75. The Court has already had occasion to note that town and country planning schemes involve the exercise of discretionary judgment in the implementation of policies adopted in the interest of the community ... It is not for the Court to substitute its own view of what would be the best policy in the planning sphere or the most appropriate individual measure in planning cases ... By reason of their direct and continuous contact with the vital forces of their countries, the national authorities are in principle better placed than an international court to evaluate local needs and conditions. In so far as the exercise of discretion involving a multitude of local factors is inherent in the choice and implementation of planning policies, the national authorities in principle enjoy a wide margin of appreciation.
> 76. The Court cannot ignore, however, that in the instant case the interests of the community are to be balanced against the applicant's right to respect for her 'home', a right which is pertinent to her and her children's personal security and well-being ... The importance of that right for the applicant and her family must also be taken into account in determining the scope of the margin of appreciation allowed to the respondent State.
> Whenever discretion capable of interfering with the enjoyment of a Convention right such as the one in issue in the present case is conferred on national authorities, the procedural safeguards available to the individual will be especially material in determining whether the respondent State has, when fixing the regulatory framework, remained within its margin of appreciation. Indeed it is settled case-law that, whilst Article 8 contains no explicit procedural requirements, the decision-making process leading to measures of interference must be fair and such as to afford due respect to the interests safeguarded to the individual by Article 8 ...
> 77. The Court's task is to determine, on the basis of the above principles, whether the reasons relied on to justify the interference in question are relevant and sufficient under Article 8 § 2."

102. The Court has recognised that, where government policy in the form of criminal laws interferes with a particularly intimate aspect of an individual's private life, the margin of appreciation left to the State will be reduced in scope (see Dudgeon v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 22 October 1981, Series A no. 45, p. 21, § 52).

103. The Court is thus faced with conflicting views as to the margin of appreciation to be applied: on the one hand, the Government claim a wide margin on the ground that the case concerns matters of general policy, and, on the other hand, the applicants' claim that where the ability to sleep is affected, the margin is narrow because of the "intimate" nature of the right protected. This conflict of views on the margin of appreciation can be resolved only by reference to the context of a particular case.

104. In connection with the procedural element of the Court's review of cases involving environmental issues, the Court is required to consider all the procedural aspects, including the type of policy or decision involved, the extent to which the views of individuals (including the applicants) were taken into account throughout the decision-making procedure, and the procedural safeguards available.

B. Appraisal of the facts of the case in the light of the general principles

1. The Chamber's judgment

105. The Chamber found that, overall, the level of noise during the hours 11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m. had increased under the 1993 Scheme. It considered that, in permitting increased levels of noise from 1993 onwards, the government had failed to respect their positive obligation to the applicants, through omitting, either directly or through the commissioning of independent research, to assess critically the importance of the contribution of night flights to the United Kingdom economy. The Chamber further criticised the government for carrying out only limited research into the effects of night flights on local residents prior to the introduction of the 1993 Scheme, noting that the 1992 sleep study was limited to sleep disturbance and made no mention of the problem of sleep prevention. The Chamber did not accept that the "modest" steps taken to mitigate night noise under the 1993 Scheme were capable of constituting "the measures necessary" to protect the applicants. It concluded that "in the absence of any serious attempt to evaluate the extent or impact of the interferences with the applicants' sleep patterns, and generally in the absence of a prior specific and complete study with the aim of finding the least onerous solution as regards human rights, it is not possible to agree that in weighing the interferences against the economic interest of the country – which itself had not been quantified – the government struck the right balance in setting up the 1993 Scheme".

2. The parties' submissions

(a) The Government

106. The Government recognised that night-time noise from aircraft had the capacity to disturb or prevent sleep, but urged the Court to assess critically the applicants' claims that each suffered from a high level of disturbance. In this connection they pointed out that there was a considerable variety in the geographical positions of the applicants and in the levels of night noise to which they were exposed. Furthermore, it was noteworthy that hundreds of thousands of residents of London and the home counties were in a similar position, that the property market in the affected areas was thriving and that the applicants had not claimed that they were unable to sell their houses and move.

107. The Government stressed that all other principal European hub airports had less severe restrictions on night flights than those imposed at the three London airports. Paris-Charles de Gaulle and Amsterdam-Schiphol had no restrictions at all on the total number of "Chapter 3" aircraft which could operate at night, while Frankfurt had restrictions on landings by Chapter 3 aircraft between 1 a.m. and 4 a.m. If restrictions on night flights at Heathrow were made more stringent, UK airlines would be placed at a significant competitive disadvantage. Since 1988 they had used the scarce night slots permitted at Heathrow for two purposes: a small number were late evening departures on flights which had been delayed but the majority, typically thirteen to sixteen flights a night, were early morning arrivals between 4 a.m. and 6 a.m. of long-haul scheduled flights, mainly from South-East Asia, North America and southern Africa. In recent years the airlines concerned had taken steps to ensure that these arrivals did not land before 4.30 a.m.

The Government submitted that these flights formed an integral part of the network of connecting air services. If they were forced to operate during the day they could provide fewer viable connections with regional services at both ends, making London a less attractive place in which to do business. In any event, daytime capacity at all of London's airports was close to full, and it would be impracticable to re-schedule flights out of the night period.

108. The Government asserted that before 1993 detailed reviews were conducted into a number of aspects of the night restrictions regime. Thus, in July 1990 the Department of Transport commenced an internal review into the restrictions then applying and, in January, October and November 1993, and also in March and June 1995, published Consultation Papers to seek the views of the public and the industries concerned on the need for and effects of night flights and on various proposed modifications to the regime.

The respondents from the airline industry stressed the economic importance of night flights, as set out above. They provided information showing that, in 1993, a typical daily night flight would generate an annual revenue of between GBP 70 and 175 million and an annual profit of up to GBP 15 million. The loss of this revenue and profit would impact severely on the ability of airlines to operate and the cost of air travel by day and night. The Government submitted that the basic components of the economic justification for night flights have never been substantially challenged, either by other respondents to the Consultation Papers or since. Despite accepting the force of the economic justification, the authorities did not go as far as they were invited to by the industry; for example, they did not grant the repeated requests for much larger night noise quotas or a night quota period ending at 5 a.m. Instead, they struck a genuine balance between the interests of the industry and of local residents.

109. The Government stressed that they had also had available, in December 1992, the results of research commissioned in July 1990 into aircraft noise disturbance amongst people living near to Gatwick, Heathrow, Stansted and Manchester Airports ("the 1992 sleep study" – see paragraph 35 above). This study was, and remained, the most comprehensive of its type, and had been preceded by a number of other reports into aircraft noise and sleep disturbance, including detailed interviews with some 1,636 people living near the airports ("the social survey"). The purpose of all this research, culminating in the 1992 sleep study, was to provide information, on as reliable a scientific basis as possible, as to the effects of night-time aircraft noise on sleep. The sleep study showed that external noise levels below 80 dBA were very unlikely to cause any increase in the normal rate of disturbance of someone's sleep; that with external noise levels between 80 and 95 dBA the likelihood of an average person being awakened was about 1 in 75; and that the number of disturbances caused by aircraft noise was so small that it had a negligible effect on overall disturbance rates, although it was possible that the 2 to 3% of the population who were more sensitive to noise disturbance were twice as likely to be woken. According to the social survey, approximately 80% of those living in the Heathrow area had said that they were never or only sometimes woken up for any cause. Of those that were woken, 17% gave aircraft noise as the cause, 16% blamed a partner or a child and another 28.5% gave a variety of different reasons. Approximately 35% of those living near Heathrow said that if woken, for any reason, they found it difficult to get back to sleep.

110. The Government submitted that the changes to the hours of restriction, the extension of the quota restrictions to place limits on many previously exempt types of aircraft and the restrictions on the scheduling for landing or taking off of the noisiest categories of aircraft over a longer night period made an exact comparison between the regimes before and after 1993 impossible.

They recognised that there had been an increase in the number of movements between 6 a.m. and 6.30 a.m. in winter, since this time slot had been subject to restriction before 1993 and now fell outside the quota period. However, the Government contended that, during the core quota period of 11.30 p.m. to 6 a.m., there had been an improvement in the noise environment because of the measures taken, notably the introduction of the quota count system, to encourage the use of quieter aircraft at night.

111. The applicants, who accepted the Chamber's judgment as one way of applying the Convention to the facts of the case, underlined that only a very small percentage of flights take place between 11.30 p.m. and 6 a.m., and that there are hardly any flights before 4 a.m. at all, with an average of four aircraft landing between 4 a.m. and 4.59 a.m. in 2000, and eleven between 5 a.m. and 5.59 a.m.. They maintained that the disturbance caused by these flights was extensive because the applicants and large numbers of others were affected, and it is the nature of sleep disturbance that once people are awake even a few flights will keep them awake.

112. The applicants also pointed out that the night noise they are subjected to is frequently in excess of international standards: the World Health Organisation sets as a guideline value for avoiding sleep disturbance at night a single noise event level of 60 dBA Lmax; almost all the applicants have suffered night noise events in excess of 80 dBA Lmax, and in one case as high as 90 dBA Lmax. Because of the logarithmic nature of the decibel scale, noise energy at 80 dBA Lmax is one hundred times the noise energy at 60 dBA Lmax, and in terms of subjective loudness is four times as loud.

113. The applicants contended that the 1993 Scheme was bound to, and did, result in an increase in night flights and deterioration in the night noise climate, regardless of whether the position was measured by reference to the official night period from 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. or the night quota period from 11.30 a.m. to 6 a.m..

114. The applicants pointed to the absence of any research into sleep prevention before the 1993 Scheme, and added that post-1993 studies and proposals did not amount to an assessment of the effect of night noise on sleep prevention. They further noted the absence of any government-commissioned research into the economic benefits claimed for night flights, seeing this omission as particularly serious given that many of the world's leading business centres (for example, Berlin, Zürich, Munich, Hamburg and Tokyo) have full night-time passenger curfews of between seven and eight hours.

3. The third parties

115. British Airways, whose submissions were supported by the British Air Transport Association (BATA) and the International Air Transport Association (IATA), submitted that night flights at Heathrow play a vital role in the United Kingdom's transport infrastructure, and contribute significantly to the productivity of the United Kingdom economy and the living standards of United Kingdom citizens. They contended that a ban on, or reduction in, night flights would cause major and disproportionate damage to British Airways' business, and would reduce consumer choice. The loss of night flights would cause significant damage to the United Kingdom economy.

4. The Court's assessment

116. The case concerns the way in which the applicants were affected by the implementation in 1993 of the new scheme for regulating night flights at Heathrow. The 1993 Scheme was latest in the series of restrictions on night flights which began at Heathrow in 1962 and replaced the previous five-year 1988 Scheme. Its aims included, according to the 1993 Consultation Paper (see paragraph 36 above), both protection of local communities from excessive night noise, and taking account of the wider economic implications. The undertaking given by the government in 1988 “not to allow a worsening of noise at night, and ideally to improve it” was maintained (see paragraphs 41 and 43 above). Specifically, the scheme replaced the earlier system of movement limitations with a regime which gave aircraft operators a choice, through the quota count, as to whether to fly fewer noisier aircraft, or more less noisy types (for details, see paragraphs 44-46 above). Although modified in some respects following various judicial review proceedings (see paragraphs 47-50 and 80-83 above) and as a result of further studies and consultations (see paragraphs 51-69 above), the quota count system introduced in 1993 has remained in place to the present day, the authorities continuing to monitor the situation with a view to possible improvements (see paragraphs 70-75 above).

117. The 1993 Scheme accepted the conclusions of the 1992 sleep study (see paragraph 35 above) that for the large majority of people living near airports there was no risk of substantial sleep disturbance due to aircraft noise and that only a small percentage of individuals (some 2 to 3%) were more sensitive than others. On this basis, disturbances caused by aircraft noise were regarded as negligible in relation to overall normal disturbance rates (see paragraph 40 above). The 1992 sleep study continued to be relied upon by the government in their 1998/99 review of the regulations for night flights, when it was acknowledged that further research was necessary, in particular as regards sleep prevention, and a number of further studies on the subject were commissioned (see paragraphs 58-59 and 73 above).

118. The Court has no doubt that the implementation of the 1993 Scheme was susceptible of adversely affecting the quality of the applicants' private life and the scope for their enjoying the amenities of their respective homes, and thus their rights protected by Article 8 of the Convention. Each of the applicants has described the way in which he or she was affected by the changes brought about by the 1993 Scheme at the relevant time (see paragraphs 11-26 above), and the Court sees no reason to doubt the sincerity of their submissions in this respect. It is true that the applicants have not submitted any evidence in support of the degree of discomfort suffered, in particular they have not disproved the Government's indications as to the “objective” daytime noise contour measured at each applicant's home (ibid.). However, as the Government themselves admit, and as is evident from the 1992 sleep study on which they rely, sensitivity to noise includes a subjective element, a small minority of people being more likely than others to be woken or otherwise disturbed in their sleep by aircraft noise at night. The discomfort caused to the individuals concerned will therefore depend not only on the geographical location of their respective homes in relation to the various flight paths, but also on their individual disposition to be disturbed by noise. In the present case the degree of disturbance may vary somewhat from one applicant to the other, but the Court cannot follow the Government when they seem to suggest that the applicants were not, or not considerably, affected by the scheme at issue.

119. It is clear that in the present case the noise disturbances complained of were not caused by the State or by State organs, but that they emanated from the activities of private operators. It may be argued that the changes brought about by the 1993 Scheme are to be seen as a direct interference by the State with the Article 8 rights of the persons concerned. On the other hand, the State's responsibility in environmental cases may also arise from a failure to regulate private industry in a manner securing proper respect for the rights enshrined in Article 8 of the Convention. As noted above (see paragraph 98), broadly similar principles apply whether a case is analysed in terms of a positive duty on the State or in terms of an interference by a public authority with Article 8 rights to be justified in accordance with paragraph 2 of this provision. The Court is not therefore required to decide whether the present case falls into the one category or the other. The question is whether, in the implementation of the 1993 policy on night flights at Heathrow Airport, a fair balance was struck between the competing interests of the individuals affected by the night noise and the community as a whole.

120. The Court notes at the outset that in previous cases in which environmental questions gave rise to violations of the Convention, the violation was predicated on a failure by the national authorities to comply with some aspect of the domestic regime. Thus, in López Ostra, the waste-treatment plant at issue was illegal in that it operated without the necessary licence, and was eventually closed down (López Ostra, cited above, pp. 46-47, §§ 16-22). In Guerra and Others, the violation was also founded on an irregular position at the domestic level, as the applicants had been unable to obtain information that the State was under a statutory obligation to provide (Guerra and Others, cited above, p. 219, §§ 25-27).

This element of domestic irregularity is wholly absent in the present case. The policy on night flights which was set up in 1993 was challenged by the local authorities, and was found, after a certain amount of amendment, to be compatible with domestic law. The applicants do not suggest that the policy (as amended) was in any way unlawful at a domestic level, and indeed they have not exhausted domestic remedies in respect of any such claim. Further, they do not claim that any of the night flights which disturbed their sleep violated the relevant regulations, and again any such claim could have been pursued in the domestic courts under section 76(1) of the Civil Aviation Act 1982.

121. In order to justify the night flight scheme in the form in which it has operated since 1993, the Government refer not only to the economic interests of the operators of airlines and other enterprises as well as their clients, but also, and above all, to the economic interests of the country as a whole. In their submission these considerations make it necessary to impinge, at least to a certain extent, on the Article 8 rights of the persons affected by the scheme. The Court observes that according to the second paragraph of Article 8 restrictions are permitted, inter alia, in the interests of the economic well-being of the country and for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. It is therefore legitimate for the State to have taken the above economic interests into consideration in the shaping of its policy.

122. The Court must consider whether the State can be said to have struck a fair balance between those interests and the conflicting interests of the persons affected by noise disturbances, including the applicants. Environmental protection should be taken into consideration by States in acting within their margin of appreciation and by the Court in its review of that margin, but it would not be appropriate for the Court to adopt a special approach in this respect by reference to a special status of environmental human rights. In this context the Court must revert to the question of the scope of the margin of appreciation available to the State when taking policy decisions of the kind at issue (see paragraph 103 above).

123. The Court notes that the introduction of the 1993 Scheme for night flights was a general measure not specifically addressed to the applicants in this case, although it had obvious consequences for them and other persons in a similar situation. However, the sleep disturbances relied on by the applicants did not intrude into an aspect of private life in a manner comparable to that of the criminal measures considered in Dudgeon to call for an especially narrow scope for the State's margin of appreciation (see Dudgeon, cited above, p. 21, § 52, and paragraph 102 above). Rather, the normal rule applicable to general policy decisions (see paragraph 97 above) would seem to be pertinent here, the more so as this rule can be invoked even in relation to individually addressed measures taken in the framework of a general policy, such as in Buckley, cited above (see paragraph 101). Whilst the State is required to give due consideration to the particular interests, the respect for which it is obliged to secure by virtue of Article 8, it must in principle be left a choice between different ways and means of meeting this obligation. The Court's supervisory function being of a subsidiary nature, it is limited to reviewing whether or not the particular solution adopted can be regarded as striking a fair balance.

124. In the present case the Court first notes the difficulties in establishing whether the 1993 Scheme actually led to a deterioration of the night noise climate. The applicants contend that it did; the Government disagree. Statements in the 1998 Consultation Paper suggest that, generally, the noise climate around Heathrow may have improved during the night quota period, but probably deteriorated over the full night period (see paragraph 61 above). The Court is not able to make any firm findings on this point. It notes the dispute between the parties as to whether aircraft movements or quota counts should be employed as the appropriate yardstick for measuring night noise. However, it finds no indication that the authorities' decision to introduce a regime based on the quota count system was as such incompatible with Article 8.

125. Whether in the implementation of that regime the right balance has been struck in substance between the Article 8 rights affected by the regime and other conflicting community interests depends on the relative weight given to each of them. The Court accepts that in this context the authorities were entitled, having regard to the general nature of the measures taken, to rely on statistical data based on average perception of noise disturbance. It notes the conclusion of the 1993 Consultation Paper that due to their small number sleep disturbances caused by aircraft noise could be treated as negligible in comparison to overall normal disturbance rates (see paragraph 40 above). However, this does not mean that the concerns of the people affected were totally disregarded. The very purpose of maintaining a scheme of night flight restrictions was to keep noise disturbance at an acceptable level for the local population living in the area near the airport. Moreover, there was a realisation that in view of changing conditions (increase of air transport, technological advances in noise prevention, development of social attitudes, etc.) the relevant measures had to be kept under constant review.

126. As to the economic interests which conflict with the desirability of limiting or halting night flights in pursuance of the above aims, the Court considers it reasonable to assume that those flights contribute at least to a certain extent to the general economy. The Government have produced to the Court reports on the results of a series of inquiries on the economic value of night flights, carried out both before and after the 1993 Scheme. Even though there are no specific indications about the economic cost of eliminating specific night flights, it is possible to infer from those studies that there is a link between flight connections in general and night flights. In particular, the Government claim that some flights from Far-East destinations to London could arrive only by departing very late at night, giving rise to serious passenger discomfort and a consequent loss of competitiveness. One can readily accept that there is an economic interest in maintaining a full service to London from distant airports, and it is difficult, if not impossible, to draw a clear line between the interests of the aviation industry and the economic interests of the country as a whole. However, airlines are not permitted to operate at will, as substantial limitations are put on their freedom to operate, including the night restrictions which apply at Heathrow. The Court would note here that the 1993 Scheme which was eventually put in place was stricter than that envisaged in the 1993 Consultation Paper, as even the quietest aircraft were included in the quota count system. The Government have in addition resisted calls for a shorter night quota period, or for the lifting of night restrictions. The Court also notes subsequent modifications to the system involving further limitations for the operators, including, inter alia, the addition of an overall maximum number of permitted aircraft movements (see paragraph 50 above) and reduction of the available quota count points (see paragraph 66 above).

127. A further relevant factor in assessing whether the right balance has been struck is the availability of measures to mitigate the effects of aircraft noise generally, including night noise. A number of measures are referred to above (see paragraph 74). The Court also notes that the applicants do not contest the substance of the Government's claim that house prices in the areas in which they live have not been adversely affected by the night noise. The Court considers it reasonable, in determining the impact of a general policy on individuals in a particular area, to take into account the individuals' ability to leave the area. Where a limited number of people in an area (2 to 3% of the affected population, according to the 1992 sleep study) are particularly affected by a general measure, the fact that they can, if they choose, move elsewhere without financial loss must be significant to the overall reasonableness of the general measure.

128. On the procedural aspect of the case, the Court notes that a governmental decision-making process concerning complex issues of environmental and economic policy such as in the present case must necessarily involve appropriate investigations and studies in order to allow them to strike a fair balance between the various conflicting interests at stake. However, this does not mean that decisions can only be taken if comprehensive and measurable data are available in relation to each and every aspect of the matter to be decided. In this respect it is relevant that the authorities have consistently monitored the situation, and that the 1993 Scheme was the latest in a series of restrictions on night flights which stretched back to 1962. The position concerning research into sleep disturbance and night flights is far from static, and it was the government's policy to announce restrictions on night flights for a maximum of five years at a time, each new scheme taking into account the research and other developments of the previous period. The 1993 Scheme had thus been preceded by a series of investigations and studies carried out over a long period of time. The particular new measures introduced by that scheme were announced to the public by way of a Consultation Paper which referred to the results of a study carried out for the Department of Transport, and which included a study of aircraft noise and sleep disturbance. It stated that the quota was to be set so as not to allow a worsening of noise at night, and ideally to improve the situation. This paper was published in January 1993 and sent to bodies representing the aviation industry and people living near airports. The applicants and persons in a similar situation thus had access to the Consultation Paper, and it would have been open to them to make any representations they felt appropriate. Had any representations not been taken into account, they could have challenged subsequent decisions, or the scheme itself, in the courts. Moreover, the applicants are, or have been, members of HACAN (see paragraph 1 above), and were thus particularly well-placed to make representations.

129. In these circumstances the Court does not find that, in substance, the authorities overstepped their margin of appreciation by failing to strike a fair balance between the right of the individuals affected by those regulations to respect for their private life and home and the conflicting interests of others and of the community as a whole, nor does it find that there have been fundamental procedural flaws in the preparation of the 1993 regulations on limitations for night flights.

130. There has accordingly been no violation of Article 8 of the Convention.

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONVENTION

131. The applicants contended that judicial review was not an effective remedy in relation to their rights under Article 8 of the Convention, in breach of Article 13.

Article 13 provides:

> "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in [the] Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

132. The Government disputed the applicants' contention that there had been a violation of Article 13.

A. The Chamber's judgment

133. In its judgment of 2 October 2001, the Chamber held that the scope of review by the domestic courts did not allow consideration of whether the increase in night flights under the 1993 Scheme represented a justifiable limitation on the Article 8 rights of those who live in the vicinity of Heathrow Airport (see paragraphs 115 and 116 above).

B. The parties' submissions

1. The Government

134. In their letter requesting that the case be referred to the Grand Chamber, the Government made no reference to Article 13 of the Convention. In subsequent communications they referred back to the pleadings before the Commission and the Chamber, summarised at paragraphs 112 and 113 of the Chamber's judgment, in which they contended that Article 13 was not applicable or, in the alternative, that the scope of judicial review was sufficient to satisfy the requirements of that provision. At the hearing of 13 November 2002 the Government underlined that the present case concerned positive rather than negative obligations, and pointed to similarities between the judicial review proceedings in the United Kingdom and the Convention approach.

2. The applicants

135. The applicants contended, as they had before the Chamber, that they had no private-law rights in relation to excessive night noise, as a consequence of the statutory exclusion of liability in section 76 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982. They submitted that the limits inherent in an application for judicial review meant that it was not an effective remedy. They added that in R. (Daly) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department ([2001] 2 Appeal Cases 532), the House of Lords had confirmed the inadequacy of the approach in R. v. Minister of Defence, ex parte Smith ([1996] Queen's Bench Reports 517).

C. The third parties

136. The third parties did not comment on the Article 13 issues.

D. The Court's assessment

137. As the Chamber observed, Article 13 has been consistently interpreted by the Court as requiring a remedy in domestic law only in respect of grievances which can be regarded as "arguable" in terms of the Convention (see, for example, Boyle and Rice v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 27 April 1988, Series A no. 131, pp. 23-24, § 54). In the present case, it has not found a violation of Article 8, but the Court considers that confronted with a finding by the Chamber that the Article 8 issues were admissible and indeed that there was a violation of that provision, it must accept that the claim under Article 8 was arguable. The complaint under Article 13 must therefore be considered.

138. The Court would first reiterate that Article 13 does not go so far as to guarantee a remedy allowing a Contracting State's laws to be challenged before a national authority on the ground of being contrary to the Convention (see Costello-Roberts v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 25 March 1993, Series A no. 247-C, p. 62, § 40). Similarly, it does not allow a challenge to a general policy as such. Where an applicant has an arguable claim to a violation of a Convention right, however, the domestic regime must afford an effective remedy (ibid., p. 62, § 39).

139. As the Chamber found, section 76 of the 1982 Act prevents actions in nuisance in respect of excessive noise caused by aircraft at night. The applicants complain about the flights which were permitted by the 1993

Scheme, and which were in accordance with the relevant regulations. No action therefore lay in trespass or nuisance in respect of lawful night flights.

140. The question which the Court must address is whether the applicants had a remedy at national level to "enforce the substance of the Convention rights ... in whatever form they may happen to be secured in the domestic legal order" (see Vilvarajah and Others v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 30 October 1991, Series A no. 215, pp. 38-40, §§ 117-27). The scope of the domestic review in Vilvarajah, which concerned immigration, was relatively broad because of the importance domestic law attached to the matter of physical integrity. It was on this basis that judicial review was held to comply with the requirements of Article 13. In contrast, in Smith and Grady v. the United Kingdom (nos. 33985/96 and 33986/96, §§ 135-39, ECHR 1999-VI), the Court concluded that judicial review was not an effective remedy on the ground that the domestic courts defined policy issues so broadly that it was not possible for the applicants to make their Convention points regarding their rights under Article 8 in the domestic courts.

141. The Court observes that judicial review proceedings were capable of establishing that the 1993 Scheme was unlawful because the gap between government policy and practice was too wide (see R. v. Secretary of State for Transport, ex parte Richmond LBC (no. 2) [1995] Environmental Law Reports 390). However, it is clear, as noted by the Chamber, that the scope of review by the domestic courts was limited to the classic English public-law concepts, such as irrationality, unlawfulness and patent unreasonableness, and did not at the time (that is, prior to the entry into force of the Human Rights Act 1998) allow consideration of whether the claimed increase in night flights under the 1993 Scheme represented a justifiable limitation on the right to respect for the private and family lives or the homes of those who live in the vicinity of Heathrow Airport.

142. In these circumstances, the Court considers that the scope of review by the domestic courts in the present case was not sufficient to comply with Article 13.

There has therefore been a violation of Article 13 of the Convention.

III. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 41 OF THE CONVENTION

143. Article 41 of the Convention provides:

> "If the Court finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. Damage

144. The applicants, referring to the Chamber's judgment, considered that a modest award should be made in relation to non-pecuniary damage.

145. The Government took the view that a finding of a violation would constitute in itself sufficient just satisfaction in respect of a violation of either Article 8 or Article 13.

146. The Chamber awarded the applicants the sum of 4,000 pounds sterling (GBP) each for non-pecuniary damage in respect of the violations it found of Articles 8 and 13.

147. The Court has found a violation of the procedural right to an effective domestic remedy under Article 13 of the Convention in respect of the applicants' complaints under Article 8, but no violation of the substantive right to respect for private life, family life, home and correspondence under Article 8 itself.

148. The Court notes that in Camenzind v. Switzerland (judgment of 16 December 1997, Reports 1997-VIII, pp. 2897-98, § 57) the Court found a violation of Article 13 in relation to the applicant's claim under Article 8, but no substantive violation of the Convention. In that case the Court considered that the judgment constituted in itself sufficient just satisfaction for the alleged non-pecuniary damage.

Furthermore, in the present case, the violation of Article 13 derived, not from the applicants' lack of any access to the British courts to challenge the impact on them of the State's policy on night flights at Heathrow Airport, but rather from the overly narrow scope of judicial review at the time, which meant that the remedy available under British law was not an "effective" one enabling them to ventilate fully the substance of their complaint under Article 8 of the Convention (see paragraphs 140-42 above).

This being so, the Court considers that, having regard to the nature of the violation found, the finding of a violation constitutes in itself sufficient just satisfaction in respect of any non-pecuniary damage.

B. Costs and expenses

149. The applicants claimed a total of GBP 153,867.56 plus GBP 24,929.55 value-added tax (VAT) in respect of the costs before the Chamber, and an additional GBP 154,941.48 plus GBP 23,976.82 VAT (totalling GBP 178,918.30) before the Grand Chamber.

150. The Government made a number of comments on the costs and expenses before the Grand Chamber. They challenged the rates charged by the solicitors involved, and considered that the time billed by the solicitors was excessive. They also considered that the fees charged by counsel and the applicants' experts were excessive. Overall, they suggested GBP 109,000 as an appropriate figure for the Grand Chamber costs and expenses.

151. The Chamber reduced the costs and expenses claimed by the applicants in the proceedings up to then from GBP 153,867.56 to GBP 70,000.

152. Costs and expenses will not be awarded under Article 41 unless it is established that they were actually and necessarily incurred and are also reasonable as to quantum (see The Sunday Times v. the United Kingdom (no. 1) (Article 50), judgment of 6 November 1980, Series A no. 38, p. 13, § 23). Furthermore, legal costs are only recoverable in so far as they relate to the violation found (see Beyeler v. Italy (just satisfaction) [GC], no. 33202/96, § 27, 28 May 2002).

153. The Court notes that whilst the Chamber found a violation of both Articles 8 and 13 of the Convention, the Grand Chamber has found solely a violation of Article 13 in relation to the applicants' claim under Article 8. Whilst this difference between the findings should be reflected in the award of costs, the Grand Chamber should not lose sight of the fact that Article 13 cannot stand alone. Without an "arguable claim" in respect of the substantive issues, the Court would have been unable to consider Article 13 (see, for example, Boyle and Rice, cited above, pp. 23-24, §§ 52 and 54). The award of costs should therefore reflect the work undertaken by the applicants' representatives on the Article 8 issues to a certain extent, even if not to the same extent as if a violation of Article 8 had also been found.

154. The Court awards the applicants the sum of 50,000 euros, including VAT, in respect of costs and expenses.

C. Default interest

155. The Court considers it appropriate that the default interest should be based on the marginal lending rate of the European Central Bank, to which should be added three percentage points.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Holds by twelve votes to five that there has been no violation of Article 8 of the Convention;

2. Holds by sixteen votes to one that there has been a violation of Article 13 of the Convention;

3. Holds by fifteen votes to two that the finding of a violation of Article 13 of the Convention constitutes in itself sufficient just satisfaction for any damage sustained by the applicants;

4. Holds unanimously
   (a) that the respondent State is to pay the applicants, within three months, EUR 50,000 (fifty thousand euros) in respect of costs and expenses, to be converted into pounds sterling at the rate applicable on the date of settlement, including any tax that may be chargeable;
   (b) that from the expiry of the above-mentioned three months until settlement simple interest shall be payable on the above amount at a rate equal to the marginal lending rate of the European Central Bank during the default period plus three percentage points;

5. Dismisses by thirteen votes to four the remainder of the applicants' claim for just satisfaction.

JOINT DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGES COSTA, RESS, TÜRMEN, ZUPANČIČ AND STEINER

I. Introduction

We regret that we cannot adhere to the majority's view that there has been no violation of Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights in this case. We have reached our joint dissenting standpoint primarily from our reading of the current stage of development of the pertinent case-law. In addition, the close connection between human rights protection and the urgent need for a decontamination of the environment leads us to perceive health as the most basic human need and as pre-eminent. After all, as in this case, what do human rights pertaining to the privacy of the home mean if, day and night, constantly or intermittently, it reverberates with the roar of aircraft engines?

1. It is true that the original text of the Convention does not yet disclose an awareness of the need for the protection of environmental human rights[1]. In the 1950s, the universal need for environmental protection was not yet apparent. Historically, however, environmental considerations are by no means unknown to our unbroken and common legal tradition[2] whilst, thirty-one years ago, the Declaration of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment stated as its first principle:

> "... Man has the fundamental right to freedom, equality and adequate conditions of life, in an environment of quality that permits a life of dignity and well-being ..."[3]

[1] . The idiom "environmental protection" appears in fifty-seven of our cases. The phrase "environmental human rights" appears for the first time in the majority judgment.

[2] . For example, the extraordinarily sensitive doctrine concerning environmental nuisances goes back to Roman law. Roman law classified these nuisances as immissiones in alienum. Dig.8.5.8.5 Ulpianus 17 ad ed.; see http://www.thelatinlibrary.com/justinian/digest8.shtml

[3] . Declaration of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment, 1972; see http://www.unep.org/Documents/Default.asp?DocumentID=97&ArticleID=1503. It is interesting that from the very beginning environmental protection has been linked to personal well-being (health). See note 3, p. 45.

The European Union's Charter of Fundamental Rights (even though it does not at present have binding legal force) provides an interesting illustration of the point. Article 37 of the Charter provides:

> "A high level of environmental protection and the improvement of the quality of the environment must be integrated into the policies of the Union and ensured in accordance with the principle of sustainable development."

These recommendations show clearly that the member States of the European Union want a high level of protection and better protection, and expect the Union to develop policies aimed at those objectives. On a broader plane the Kyoto Protocol makes it patent that the question of environmental pollution is a supra-national one, as it knows no respect for the boundaries of national sovereignty[1]. This makes it an issue par excellence for international law – and a fortiori for international jurisdiction. In the meanwhile, many supreme and constitutional courts have invoked constitutional vindication of various aspects of environmental protection – on these precise grounds[2]. We believe that this concern for environmental protection shares common ground with the general concern for human rights.

II. Development of the case-law

2. As the Court has often underlined: "The Convention is a living instrument, to be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions" (see, among many other authorities, Airey v. Ireland, judgment of 9 October 1979, Series A no. 32, pp. 14-16, § 26, and Loizidou v. Turkey (preliminary objections), judgment of 23 March 1995, Series A no. 310, pp. 26-27, § 71). This "evolutive" interpretation by the Commission and the Court of various Convention requirements has generally been "progressive", in the sense that they have gradually extended and raised the level of protection afforded to the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Convention to develop the "European public order". In the field of environmental human rights, which was practically unknown in 1950, the Commission and the Court have increasingly taken the view that Article 8 embraces the right to a healthy environment, and therefore to protection against pollution and nuisances caused by harmful chemicals, offensive smells, agents which precipitate respiratory ailments, noise and so on.

3. In previous cases concerning protection against aircraft noise the Commission did not hesitate to rule that Article 8 was applicable and declared complaints of a violation of that provision admissible – in Arrondelle and Baggs, for example. In Arrondelle v. the United Kingdom (no. 7889/77, Commission decision of 15 July 1980, Decisions and Reports (DR) 19, p. 186) the applicant's house was just over one and a half kilometres from the end of the runway at Gatwick Airport. In Baggs v. the United Kingdom (no. 9310/81, Commission decision of 16 October 1985, DR 44, p. 13) the applicant's property was 400 metres away from the south runway of Heathrow Airport. These two applications, which were declared admissible, ended with friendly settlements. While that does not mean that there was a violation of the Convention, it does show that the respondent Government accepted at that time that there was a real problem. And it was for purely technical reasons that the Court itself, in Powell and Rayner v. the United Kingdom (judgment of 21 February 1990, Series A no. 172), which also concerned flights in and out of Heathrow, refused to look into the Article 8 issue.

4. The Court has given clear confirmation that Article 8 of the Convention guarantees the right to a healthy environment: it found violations of Article 8, on both occasions unanimously, in López Ostra v. Spain (judgment of 9 December 1994, Series A no. 303-C) and Guerra and Others v. Italy (judgment of 19 February 1998, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1998-I). The first of those cases concerned nuisances (smells, noise and fumes) caused by a waste-water treatment plant close to the applicant's home which had affected her daughter's health. The other concerned harmful emissions from a chemical works which presented serious risks to the applicants, who lived in a nearby municipality.

5. The Grand Chamber's judgment in the present case, in so far as it concludes, contrary to the Chamber's judgment of 2 October 2001, that there was no violation of Article 8, seems to us to deviate from the above developments in the case-law and even to take a step backwards. It gives precedence to economic considerations over basic health conditions in qualifying the applicants' "sensitivity to noise" as that of a small minority of people (see paragraph 118 of the judgment). The trend of playing down such sensitivity – and more specifically concerns about noise and disturbed sleep – runs counter to the growing concern over environmental issues all over Europe and the world. A simple comparison of the above-mentioned cases (Arrondelle, Baggs and Powell and Rayner) with the present judgment seems to show that the Court is turning against the current.

III. The positive obligation of the State

6. The Convention protects the individual against direct abuses of power by the State authorities. Typically, the environmental aspect of the individual's human rights is not threatened by direct government action. Indirectly, however, the question is often whether the State has taken the necessary measures to protect health and privacy. Even assuming it has, direct State action may take the form of permitting, as here, the operation of an airport under certain conditions. The extent of permissible direct State interference and of the State's positive obligations is not easy to determine in such situations, but these difficulties should not undermine the overall protection which the States have to ensure under Article 8.

7. Thus, under domestic law, the regulatory power of the State is involved in protecting the individual against the macroeconomic and commercial interests that cause pollution. The misleading variation in this indirect juxtaposition of the individual and the State therefore derives from the fact that the State is under an obligation to act and omits to do so (or does so in violation of the principle of proportionality). In this respect, we have come a long way from the situation considered by this Court in Powell and Rayner (cited above, pp. 9-10, § 15), in which the Noise Abatement Act specifically exempted aircraft noise from its protection. The issue in the context of domestic law is, therefore, whether the State has done anything or enough.

8. At least since Powell and Rayner (p. 18, § 41), the key issue has been the positive obligation of the State.

9. The majority tries to distinguish the present case from Dudgeon v. the United Kingdom (judgment of 22 October 1981, Series A no. 45), which dealt with the sexual intimacy aspect of the applicant's private life. In Dudgeon (p. 21, § 52) it is said: “The present case concerns a most intimate aspect of private life. Accordingly, there must exist particularly serious reasons before interferences on the part of the public authorities can be legitimate for the purposes of paragraph 2 of Article 8.” The majority judgment differentiates this case from Dudgeon by saying: “the sleep disturbances relied on by the applicants did not intrude into an aspect of private life in a manner comparable to that of the criminal measures considered in Dudgeon to call for an especially narrow scope for the State's margin of appreciation” (see paragraph 123 of the judgment).

10. It is logical that there be an inverse relationship between the importance of the right to privacy in question on the one hand and the permissible intensity of the State's interference on the other hand. It is also true that sexual intimacy epitomises the innermost concentric circle of private life where the individual should be left in peace unless he interferes with the rights of others. However, it is not logical to infer from this that the proportionality doctrine of inverse relationship between the importance of the right to privacy and the permissible interference should be limited to sexual intimacy. Other aspects of privacy, such as health, may be just as “intimate”, albeit much more vital.

11. Privacy is a heterogeneous prerogative. The specific contours of privacy can be clearly distinguished and perceived only when it is being defended against different kinds of encroachments. Moreover, privacy is an aspect of the person's general well-being and not necessarily only an end in itself. The intensity of the State's permissible interference with the privacy of the individual and his or her family should therefore be seen as being in inverse relationship with the damage the interference is likely to cause to his or her mental and physical health. The point, in other words, is not that the sexual life of the couple whose home reverberates with the noise of aircraft engines may be seriously affected. The thrust of our argument is that "health as a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being" is, in the specific circumstances of this case, a precondition to any meaningful privacy, intimacy, etc., and cannot be unnaturally separated from it[1]. To maintain otherwise amounts to a wholly artificial severance of privacy and of general personal well-being. Of course, each case must be decided on its own merits and by taking into account the totality of its specific circumstances. In this case, however, it is clear that the circles of the protection of health and of the safeguarding of privacy do intersect and do overlap.

12. We do not agree with the majority's position taken in paragraph 123 of the Grand Chamber judgment and especially not with the key language in fine where the majority considers: "Whilst the State is required to give due consideration to the particular interests the respect for which it is obliged to secure by virtue of Article 8, it must in principle be left a choice between different ways and means of meeting this obligation. The Court's supervisory function being of a subsidiary nature, it is limited to reviewing whether or not the particular solution adopted can be regarded as striking a fair balance." When it comes to such intimate personal situations as the constant disturbance of sleep at night by aircraft noise there is a positive duty on the State to ensure as far as possible that ordinary people enjoy normal sleeping conditions. It has not been demonstrated that the applicants are capricious, and even if their "sensitivity to noise" and "disposition to be disturbed by noise" may be called "subjective", the Court agreed that they were affected in their ability to sleep "considerably ... by the scheme at issue" (see paragraph 118 of the judgment).

13. It is significant in this respect that under Article 3 sleep deprivation may be considered as an element of inhuman and degrading treatment or even torture[2]. Already, in the inter-State case of Ireland v. the United

1 . WHO definition of health, see http://www.who.int/about/definition/en/.

2 . In Selmouni v France, judgment of 28 July 1999, § 97, we decided to adhere to the definition of torture given in Article 1 of the United Nations Convention against Torture. It therefore makes sense to take into account that excessive noise may in fact amount to "severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental". See, for example, paragraph 257 referring to "sounding of loud music for prolonged periods, sleep

Kingdom (judgment of 18 January 1978, Series A no. 25, p. 41, § 96), the Court held, inter alia, that "... holding the detainees in a room where there was a continuous loud and hissing noise ..." constituted a practice of inhuman and degrading treatment[1]. In the light of the subsequent development of our case-law in Selmouni v. France ([GC], no. 25803/94, § 97, ECHR 1999-V), the same treatment would now most probably be considered as torture. The present case does not involve torture or inhuman and degrading treatment, and we do not suggest that the complaint could possibly be reclassified under Article 3 of the Convention. Nevertheless, we think that the problem of noise, when it seriously disturbs sleep, does interfere with the right to respect for private and, under specific circumstances, family life, as guaranteed by Article 8, and may therefore constitute a violation of said Article, depending in particular on its intensity and duration.

14. We also find it inconsistent that the judgment (in paragraph 126) should take into account "serious passenger discomfort" whereas it downgrades (see paragraph 118) the discomfort of all the residents, who are exposed to aircraft noise to a "subjective element [of] a small minority of people being more likely than others to be woken or otherwise disturbed in their sleep ...". We do not find it persuasive to engage in the balancing exercise employing the proportionality doctrine in order to show that the abstract majority's interest outweighs the concrete "subjective element of a small minority of people". According to the World Health Organisation (WHO) Guidelines[2], measurable effects of noise on sleep start at noise levels of about 30 dBLA. These criteria are objective. They show that this susceptibility to noise is not "subjective" in the sense of being due to over-sensitivity or capriciousness[3]. Indeed, one of the important functions of human rights protection is to protect "small minorities" whose "subjective element" makes them different from the majority.

deprivation for prolonged periods" in "Concluding observations of the Committee against Torture: Israel. 09.05.97. A/52/44, paras. 253-260. (Concluding Observations/Comments) at http://www.unhchr.ch/tbs/doc.nsf/9c663e9ef8a0d080c12565a9004db9f7/69b6685c93d9f25180256498005063da?OpenDocument.

1. Similar considerations played a role in Kalashnikov v. Russia, no. 47095/99, ECHR 2002-VI.

2. Guidelines for Community Noise – Chapter 4 at http://www.who.int/environmental _information/Noise/Commnoise4.htm; see also Environmental Protection Agency of Ireland at http://www.epa.ie/Noise/default.htm.

3. The guidelines are based on a combination of values of 30 dBLA and 45 dBLA maximum. To protect sensitive persons, a still lower guideline value would be preferred when the background level is low. In the case before the Court, however, almost all the applicants have suffered from night noise events in excess of 80 dBLA and in one case as high as 90 dBLA max. It is noteworthy that the judgment in its assessment did not take into account these international standards concerning the effects noise has on sleep, although the relevant data were available in the file.

15. According to the Consultation Paper published by the government in November 1998, "any value attached to a marginal night flight had to be weighed against the environmental disadvantages. These could not be estimated in monetary terms, but it was possible, drawing on a 1992 sleep study, to estimate the numbers of people likely to be awakened". The 1992 sleep study was limited to sleep disturbances and did not even take into account the problems of those who had been unable to get to sleep in the first place. It is noteworthy that the government's claims in respect of the country's economic well-being are based on reports prepared by the aviation industry. The government did not make any serious attempt to assess the impact of aircraft noise on the applicants' sleep. When the 1993 Scheme was introduced, only very limited research existed on the nature of sleep disturbance and prevention. In this respect, we agree with the findings in the Chamber's judgment (paragraphs 103-06). Nor has the government really shown that it has explored all the alternatives, such as using more distant airports.

16. In principle, the general reference to the economic well-being of the country is not sufficient to justify the failure of the State to safeguard an applicant's rights under Article 8. In Berrehab v. Netherlands (judgment of 21 June 1988, Series A no. 138), for example, the Court found that the actions of the authorities could not be justified by the alleged economic well-being of the Netherlands. In López Ostra (cited above), too, the Court held, after examining the Government's argument, that "... the State did not succeed in striking a fair balance between the interests of the town's economic well-being ...and the applicant's effective enjoyment of her right to respect for her home and her private and family life" (p. 56, § 58).

17. Although we might agree with the judgment when it states: "the Court must consider whether the State can be said to have struck a fair balance between those interests [namely, the economic interests of the country] and the conflicting interests of the persons affected by noise disturbances" (see paragraph 122 of the judgment), the fair balance between the rights of the applicants and the interests of the broader community must be maintained. The margin of appreciation of the State is narrowed because of the fundamental nature of the right to sleep, which may be outweighed only by the real, pressing (if not urgent) needs of the State. Incidentally, the Court's own subsidiary role, reflected in the use of the "margin of appreciation", is itself becoming more and more marginal when it comes to such constellations as the relationship between the protection of the right to sleep as an aspect of privacy and health on the one hand and the very general economic interest on the other hand.

18. As stated above, reasons based on economic arguments referring to "the country as a whole" without any "specific indications of the economic cost of eliminating specific night flights" (see paragraph 126 of the judgment) are not sufficient. Moreover, it has not been demonstrated by the respondent State how and to what extent the economic situation would in fact deteriorate if a more drastic scheme – aimed at limiting night flights, halving their number or even halting them – were implemented.

IV. Realistic assessment under Article 41

19. Finally, and in view of the powers of the Court under Article 41 and the alleged importance of the macroeconomic interests at stake, indemnification of the "small minority" should be less of a problem rather than more. The applicants' rights could have been treated much more realistically than they were by the majority. In other words, the issue could have been circumscribed to the "small minority's" entitlement to just satisfaction for the real pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage incurred. Since we do not believe that the "subjective element" referred to in paragraph 118 of the judgment is simply a euphemism for "capricious hyper-sensitivity", the applicants in our opinion ought to have been awarded just satisfaction.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE Sir Brian KERR

In Christine Goodwin v. the United Kingdom ([GC], no. 28957/95, § 113, ECHR 2002-VI), the Grand Chamber held that "Article 13 cannot be interpreted as requiring a remedy against the state of domestic law, as otherwise the Court would be imposing on Contracting States a requirement to incorporate the Convention". That ruling relates to the "state of domestic law", and seems to me to go beyond the traditional view that Article 13 does not guarantee a remedy against "legislation" (as in, for example, James and Others v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 21 February 1986, Series A no. 98, p. 47, § 85). It corresponds closely to the ideas I expressed on Article 13 in my dissenting opinion to the Chamber's judgment of 2 October 2001.

I would here wish simply to record that it is my view, given the nature of the applicants' complaints, the state of domestic law at the time and the role of Article 13 in the Convention structure, that there has been no violation of Article 13 in this case.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

COURT (CHAMBER)

CASE OF HOKKANEN v. FINLAND

(Application no. 19823/92)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

23 September 1994

In the case of Hokkanen v. Finland[*],

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Court, as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr R. RYSSDAL, President,
Mr Thór VILHJÁLMSSON,
Mr C. RUSSO,
Mr J. DE MEYER,
Mr I. FOIGHEL,
Mr R. PEKKANEN,
Mr J.M. MORENILLA,
Mr J. MAKARCZYK,
Mr K. JUNGWIERT,

and also of Mr M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr H. PETZOLD, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 25 March and on 24 August 1994,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 9 December 1993, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 para. 1 and Article 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47) of the Convention. It originated in an application (no. 19823/92) against the Republic of Finland lodged with the Commission under Article 25 (art. 25) by Mr Teuvo Hokkanen, a Finnish national, on his own behalf and on that of his daughter, Ms Sini Hokkanen, also a Finnish national, on 10 April 1992. The application was however declared inadmissible in respect of Sini (see paragraph 50 below).

The Commission's request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) and to the declaration whereby Finland recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46)[]. The object of the request was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Articles 6 para. 1, 8 and 13 (art. 6-1, art. 8, art. 13) of the Convention as well as Article 5 of Protocol No. 7 (P7-5).

[*] The case is numbered 50/1993/445/524. The first number is the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court in the relevant year (second number). The last two numbers indicate the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court since its creation and on the list of the corresponding originating applications to the Commission.

[] Note by the Registrar. The declaration dates from 10 May 1990, which is also the date of ratification by Finland of the Convention.

2. In response to the enquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 para. 3 (d) of the Rules of Court, the applicant stated that he wished to take part in the proceedings and designated the lawyer who would represent him (Rule 30).

3. The Chamber to be constituted included ex officio Mr R. Pekkanen, the elected judge of Finnish nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr R. Ryssdal, the President of the Court (Rule 21 para. 3 (b)). On 7 January 1994, in the presence of the Registrar, the President drew by lot the names of the other seven members, namely Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr C. Russo, Mr J. De Meyer, Mr I. Foighel, Mr J.M. Morenilla, Mr J. Makarczyk and Mr K. Jungwiert (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 para. 4) (art. 43).

4. As President of the Chamber (Rule 21 para. 5), Mr Ryssdal, acting through the Registrar, consulted the Agent of the Finnish Government ("the Government"), the applicant's lawyer and the Delegate of the Commission on the organisation of the proceedings (Rules 37 para. 1 and 38). Pursuant to the order made in consequence on 26 January 1994, the Registrar received the applicant's and the Government's memorials on 21 February 1994. On 18 March the Secretary to the Commission indicated that the Delegate did not wish to file a memorial in reply.

5. On 22 February 1994, following a request from Sini Hokkanen and her maternal grandparents, Mr Reino and Mrs Sinikka Nick, the President, having consulted the Chamber on the same date, granted Mr and Mrs Nick, but not Sini Hokkanen, leave to submit written observations (Rule 37 para. 2) on any facts which they considered had been dealt with inaccurately in the Commission's report of 22 October 1993. On 8 March the Registrar received their observations.

6. On various dates between 17 February and 16 March 1994 the Commission produced a number of documents, which the Registrar had requested from it on the President's instructions.

7. In accordance with the President's decision, the hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 21 March 1994. The Court had held a preparatory meeting beforehand.

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government

Mr T. GRÖNBERG, Ambassador,
Director General for Legal Affairs, Ministry for Foreign Affairs, Agent,
Mr A. KOSONEN, Legal Adviser,
Ministry for Foreign Affairs, Co-Agent,
Mr M. HELIN, Adviser on Legislation,

Ministry of Justice, Adviser;
- for the Commission
Mrs J. LIDDY, Delegate;
- for the applicant
Mr H. SALO, Lawyer, Counsel,
Mr J. KORTTEINEN, Lawyer,
Mr A. ROSAS, Law Professor at Åbo Akademi, Advisers.

The Court heard addresses by Mrs Liddy, Mr Salo, Mr Rosas and Mr Grönberg, and also replies to its questions.

AS TO THE FACTS

I. PARTICULAR CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

A. Events leading to the first set of custody proceedings

8. Mr Hokkanen, a Finnish citizen, was born in 1953. He lives at Tuusula.

He has a daughter, Sini, who was born in September 1983. Following the death in April 1985 of Mrs Tuula Hokkanen (the child's mother, to whom the applicant had been married since 11 June 1983), Sini was looked after by her maternal grandparents, Mr Reino and Mrs Sinikka Nick (hereinafter referred to as "the grandparents"). According to the applicant, he had agreed to this as a provisional arrangement so that he could deal with various problems caused by his wife's death, including the reorganisation of his farming activities.

In late 1985 the grandparents informed the applicant that they did not intend to restore Sini to him. Efforts, involving the Social Welfare Board (sosiaalilautakunta, socialnämnden) of Tuusula, were made to achieve reconciliation between the applicant and the grandparents, but to no avail.

9. On 2 May 1986 the County Administrative Board (lääninhallitus, länsstyrelsen) of Uusimaa as the competent Chief Bailiff (ulosotonhaltija, överexekutor; see paragraph 44 below) rejected a request by the applicant to have Sini returned in accordance with section 8(2) of the 1975 Act on the Enforcement of Decisions concerning Custody of and the Right of Access to Children (laki 523/75 lapsen huollosta ja tapaamisoikeudesta annetun päätöksen täytäntöönpanosta, lag 523/75 om verkställighet av beslut som gäller vårdnad om barn och umgängesrätt - "the 1975 Act"). It observed that the applicant had consented to the arrangement leaving Sini in the care of the grandparents. In view of the time which had elapsed since she had moved to them and of the little contact Sini had had with the applicant, returning her could be contrary to her own interests; both parties should therefore institute custody proceedings before the District Court (kihlakunnanoikeus, häradsrätten) of Tuusula. They did so.

B. First set of custody proceedings

1. Proceedings before the District Court

10. Following a hearing on 16 July 1986, the District Court ordered provisionally that Sini should remain with her grandparents; at the same time it granted the applicant access rights, according to which Sini was to stay with him every fourth weekend and, from 8 August 1986, every fourth week.

11. On 30 September 1986 the County Administrative Board ordered the grandparents to respect the applicant's visiting rights on pain of an administrative fine (uhkasakko, vite) of 2,000 Finnish marks each. However, they did not comply.

12. On 31 October 1986 the District Court held a further hearing. It adjourned the case and again provisionally granted the applicant access rights: as from 5 November he could visit his daughter at her grandparents' home for two hours every Wednesday and six hours every Sunday and, as from 1 December, she was to visit him at the same times and for the same periods at his home. The grandparents refused to comply with these arrangements.

13. On 21 January 1987 the County Administrative Board rejected a request from the applicant asking it to enforce the right of access granted to him by the District Court on 16 July 1986. It observed that the District Court, in its decision of 31 October 1986, had varied his right of access. The County Administrative Board was therefore of the view that its decision of 30 September 1986 that the grandparents would be liable to pay fines should they fail to comply with the access order (see paragraph 11 above) no longer applied.

14. By judgment of 26 January 1987, the District Court confirmed the applicant's custody and ordered that Sini be handed over to him. It took into account, among other things, a report of 22 January 1987 by the Child Guidance Centre (kasvatusneuvola, uppfostrings- rådgivningen - "the Centre") of Central Uusimaa.

15. On 10 March 1987 the County Administrative Board ordered the grandparents to comply with the District Court's judgment of 26 January on pain of a fine of 8,000 marks each should they fail to do so. The grandparents persisted in not complying.

2. Appeal by the grandparents to the Court of Appeal and measures taken by the County Administrative Board

16. On 6 May 1987, on an appeal by the grandparents, the Court of Appeal (hovioikeus, hovrätten) of Helsinki upheld the District Court's judgment of 26 January. On 23 June it dismissed their appeal against the County Administrative Board's decision of 10 March.

17. On 7 May 1987 the County Administrative Board had again ordered the grandparents to return Sini to the applicant within a week and to pay 2,000 marks each of the fines imposed on them previously. The Board further ordered that, in the event of the grandparents' failure to return her, the Bailiff should use coercion to ensure that she was so returned.

3. Appeal by the grandparents to the Supreme Court

18. On 30 July 1987 the Supreme Court (korkein oikeus, högsta domstolen) granted the grandparents leave to appeal against the Court of Appeal's judgments of 6 May and 23 June 1987. It ordered a stay, or alternatively suspension, of both judgments (see paragraph 16 above).

The Supreme Court, in two separate judgments of 17 May 1988, dismissed the appeal and lifted the two decisions staying execution.

19. The grandparents asked the local Social Welfare Board to investigate whether execution of the Supreme Court's judgments would be in Sini's interests. The Board referred the matter to the National Social Welfare Board (sosiaalihallitus, socialstyrelsen).

At the same time, the grandparents requested the Supreme Court to stay the execution of, and annul, its judgments of 17 May 1988, which it refused to do on 13 September.

C. Requests by the applicant to the police and complaint to the Chancellor of Justice

20. In the meantime, on 13 and 18 May 1987, the applicant had asked the District Chief of Police of Järvenpää to execute the County Administrative Board's decision of 7 May (see paragraph 17 above). On 28 May the authorities discovered that the grandparents had moved Sini and that her whereabouts were unknown. The Järvenpää police then contacted their counterpart in Mäntyharju, where the grandparents had a summer home. Subsequently Sini was found to be with her grandparents at their summer home. On 10 June the applicant requested the Chief of Police of Mäntyharju to return her, but the latter official refused to do so, finding it contrary to the child's interests to interrupt her summer vacation.

21. On 29 May 1987 the applicant complained to the Chancellor of Justice (oikeuskansleri, justitiekanslern), alleging that the authorities had failed to take sufficient action to find and return Sini. The Chancellor replied on 6 July 1988 that he did not consider that any measures were called for in view of, firstly, the steps taken to execute the County Administrative Board's decision of 7 May 1987; secondly, the Supreme Court's subsequent decision to stay the execution of the Court of Appeal's judgments of 6 May and 23 June 1987 (see paragraphs 16 and 18 above) and, thirdly, the grandparents' request for a stay and annulment in respect of the Supreme Court's judgments of 17 May 1988 (see paragraph 19 above).

D. Second set of custody proceedings

1. Administrative proceedings

22. On 30 May 1990 the National Social Welfare Board recommended that the Social Welfare Board in Tuusula take steps to have custody of Sini transferred from Mr Hokkanen to the grandparents, to obtain access for the applicant and to have a person other than him appointed Sini's guardian.

On 25 July 1990, at the Social Welfare Board's request, the Guardianship Board (holhouslautakunta, förmyndarenämnden) of Tuusula submitted an opinion on the above matter, stating that the applicant had performed his duties as a guardian in a satisfactory manner. It did not consider the transfer of custody and guardianship advisable and concluded that he should continue as Sini's custodian and guardian.

2. Proceedings before the District Court and applicant's requests for enforcement of his right of access

23. On 13 August 1990 the Social Welfare Board of Tuusula asked the District Court to transfer custody to the grandparents. The Board noted that the applicant was a fit person to bring Sini up and was able to offer her a good home environment. The Board placed emphasis on the fact that since 1985 she had been living with the grandparents, with whom she had close relations. In view of the fact that Sini had not met her father for many years it was necessary for their meetings in the autumn of 1990 to be well prepared and that they should take place in a neutral environment. It also recommended that the applicant remain Sini's guardian.

24. On 19 September 1990 the District Court held a hearing but adjourned the case until 14 November after deciding to obtain an opinion from the Guardianship Board. The Board submitted a report on 31 October, recommending that the applicant cease to be the child's guardian.

At the hearing scheduled for 14 November 1990 the District Court again adjourned the case, this time until 8 May 1991, pending an opinion from the Child Guidance Centre of Central Uusimaa. On 7 May 1991 the Child and Family Guidance Centre (perhe- ja kasvatusneuvola, familje - och uppfostringsrådgivningen) of Tuusula, which had taken over the former's functions, confirmed the views expressed by that Centre in its opinion of 22 January 1987 (see paragraph 14 above). It observed that the grandparents had refused to allow Sini to be subjected to an examination (requested by the National Board of Social Welfare) and to participate in related interviews. It also referred to a statement of 13 December 1989 by a working group of the Lastenlinna Children's Hospital that, although Sini related to the grandparents as her psychological parents, there were no psychological obstacles as far as she was concerned to her meeting the applicant; on the contrary, such meetings were in her interests.

25. During the proceedings before it the District Court had, on 14 November 1990, provisionally ordered that Sini remain with the grandparents and granted the applicant certain rights of access: in December 1990 and January 1991 he was to be permitted to meet his daughter for six hours on the first Sunday of the month at a place chosen by the Board and in the presence of one of its officials; as from January they were in addition to meet from Saturday noon to Sunday noon on the third weekend of the month and, as from February, also the first weekend.

However, the grandparents would not allow the applicant to meet the child outside their home. On 20 December 1990 he asked the County Administrative Board to take enforcement measures. He renewed this request on 31 January 1991.

26. On 28 March 1991 the Board ordered the grandparents to comply with the District Court's provisional order of 14 November 1990 and decided that failure to do so would make them liable to pay an administrative fine of 5,000 marks each. The grandparents persisted in their refusal to comply. The applicant did not request the enforcement of the fines, such a request being a legal condition for their imposition.

27. The District Court, by judgment of 8 May 1991, rejected the Social Welfare Board's request to transfer custody and guardianship. It moreover noted that its provisional access order of 14 November 1990 no longer applied.

3. Appeals to the Court of Appeal and refusal of leave to appeal by the Supreme Court

28. On 24 July 1991, on separate appeals by the grandparents and the Social Welfare Board, the Court of Appeal ordered a stay of execution of the District Court's judgment of 8 May 1991 (see paragraph 24 above).

29. By judgment of 25 September 1991 the Court of Appeal, by a majority, held that the applicant should remain Sini's guardian but transferred custody to the grandparents, finding that the fact that she had lived with them since 30 April 1985 militated strongly in favour of her remaining in their care. It referred to the above-mentioned opinion of 13 December 1989 by the Children's Hospital (see paragraph 24 above), according to which she had strong ties of security, confidence and affection with her grandparents and perceived their home as her own. No substantial changes should be made to this situation. She should be able to meet the applicant and develop a normal relationship with him. In view of her low age (eight at the time) and the fact that she had not been in a position to form her views independently, the Court of Appeal considered that no significant importance could be attached to Sini's own wish not to see the applicant, mentioned in the Child and Family Guidance Centre's opinion of 7 May 1991 (see paragraph 24 above).

The judgment prescribed the following access arrangements: during the first three months the applicant and his daughter were to meet for four hours one Saturday each month, at a place chosen by the Tuusula Social Welfare Office, in the presence of one of its officers and, after that, every other weekend between Saturday noon and Sunday noon. She was to spend Christmas with her grandparents and two weeks of the following summer with the applicant; subsequently her stays during holidays should alternate between the applicant and the grandparents.

30. On 19 December 1991 the Court of Appeal quashed the County Administrative Board's order of 28 March 1991 requiring the grandparents to comply with the District Court's provisional order of 14 November 1990 regarding access (see paragraph 25 above). The Court of Appeal had regard to the lower court's decision of 8 May 1991 (see paragraph 27 above), which in effect revoked its decision of 14 November 1990.

31. On 21 January 1992 the Supreme Court refused the applicant leave to appeal.

E. Further proceedings regarding access

1. Request for enforcement to the local Social Welfare Board

32. On 25 June 1992 the Social Welfare Board of Järvenpää replied to an enforcement request by the applicant. It observed that the Child and Family Guidance Centre of Järvenpää had offered the grandparents "an opportunity to obtain assistance and to discuss the matter concerning visiting rights" but they had refused to contact the Centre. The latter had, in a letter to the Board of 16 June 1992, stated that in those circumstances "nothing else could be done by the Centre".

2. Request for enforcement to the County Administrative Board and the ensuing court proceedings

33. In the meantime, on 22 June 1992 the applicant asked the County Administrative Board to take steps to execute the Court of Appeal's judgment of 25 September 1991 (see paragraph 29 above). He referred to the fact that in 1991 all three meetings planned between him and Sini had failed to take place, as the grandparents had refused to bring her. They had moreover declined to respond to attempts to arrange further meetings.

34. On 23 June 1992 the County Administrative Board gave an interim decision ordering the applicant to communicate the documents in the case to the grandparents in order to enable them to comment on his request to the Board. This they did on 21 July. The decision further indicated that the case would be struck off the list if the applicant did not renew his enforcement request within a year.

On 10 November 1992 the applicant renewed his request of 22 June to the County Administrative Board. Following this, the Board, as required by the relevant legislation, referred the matter to the conciliator for mediation (see paragraph 45 below). The latter submitted a report to the Board on 2 December and the applicant filed his comments on 7 December.

35. On 31 December 1992 the County Administrative Board ordered the grandparents to comply with the Court of Appeal's decision of 25 September 1991, on pain of having to pay an administrative fine of 5,000 marks.

On the other hand, the Board dismissed a request by the applicant for Sini to be transferred to him; such a measure could only be taken in enforcement of a custody order. However, it noted that the grandparents had totally refused to co-operate in attempts to arrange for the applicant to meet his daughter. Bearing in mind her age and the grandparents' strong influence over her, she could not be considered sufficiently mature for her views to be taken into account.

The County Administrative Board had regard also to the conciliator's above-mentioned report (see paragraph 34 above), submitted by the Social Welfare Board of Järvenpää. According to that report the grandparents had agreed to allow the applicant to see Sini in their own home, whilst the applicant had categorically refused to have anything to do with them. The conciliator in question had met Sini only in the grandparents' presence in their home on 27 November 1992. On being questioned about her father she had been very reserved but had said that she objected to seeing him. The conciliator was of the view that Sini's wishes in this regard should be taken into consideration.

36. The grandparents refused to bring Sini to a meeting with the applicant which the Social Welfare Board of Järvenpää had arranged to take place on 3 April 1993.

37. By judgment of 21 October 1993 the Court of Appeal, referring to section 6 of the 1975 Act (see paragraph 47 below), upheld an appeal lodged by the grandparents against the County Administrative Board's decision of 31 December 1992 (see paragraph 35 above). The Court of Appeal noted that, according to a medical report of 8 September 1992 by Dr Arajärvi, Sini was physically and mentally healthy and a psychological test had shown that she was clearly of above average intelligence for a twelve-year-old; she should not therefore be forced to meet the applicant but be allowed to decide for herself. Moreover, the conciliator's report (see paragraphs 34 and 35 above) stated that she had clearly and consistently refused to meet the applicant and was sufficiently mature for her wishes to be taken into account. The judgment concluded that in view of the child's maturity, access could not be enforced against her wishes and lifted the fines imposed on the grandparents.

On 4 February 1994 the Supreme Court refused the applicant leave to appeal.

F. Contacts between the applicant and Sini

38. The applicant visited Sini in the grandparents' home on a few occasions until 1986. The last time he met her was on 14 January 1987.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW

A. Custody and access

39. Custody of children is governed by the 1983 Act on Custody and Access Rights with regard to Children (laki 361/83 lapsen huollosta ja tapaamisoikeudesta, lag 361/83 ang. vårdnad om barn och umgängesrätt - "the 1983 Act"). Section 1 provides that the aim of such custody is to ensure the child's balanced development and well-being, regard being had to the latter's special needs and wishes, as well as to encourage a close relationship between the child and the parents. The custodian represents the child in his or her personal matters, unless the law provides otherwise (section 4).

40. The parents, or any other person to whom care of the child has been entrusted, are his or her custodians (section 3). Parents who are married to each other at the time of the child's birth are the latter's custodians (section 6).

41. The District Court may order that custody of a child be entrusted to one or more persons together with, or instead of, the parents (section 9 para. 1). It may transfer custody from the parents to other persons only if, from the child's point of view, there are particularly strong reasons for doing so (section 9 para. 2).

The District Court is moreover empowered to decide on access (section 9). The aim of access is to secure a child's right to maintain contacts with a parent with whom he or she is not living (section 2).

In deciding on matters of custody and access the competent court must take into account the wishes and interests of the child in accordance with the following considerations: primary emphasis must be placed on the interests of the child and particular regard should be had to the most effective means of implementing custody and access rights in the future (section 9 para. 4 and section 10 para. 1); the child's views and wishes must, if possible and depending on its age and maturity, be obtained if the parents are unable to agree on the matter or if the child is being cared for by a person other than its custodian or if it is otherwise deemed necessary in the latter's interests; the consultation must be carried out in a tactful manner, taking into account the child's maturity and without causing harm to its relations with the parents (section 11).

42. Pending court decisions on matters of custody and access, the competent court may issue an interim order as to where the child should live, access arrangements and, in special circumstances, custody (section 17 paras. 1 and 2).

43. A decision on custody, access or a child's place of residence is, unless it states otherwise, immediately enforceable (section 19).

B. Enforcement of custody and access rights

44. According to section 1 of the 1975 Act (for references, see paragraph 9 above), the Act applies to the enforcement of a court decision, including an interim order, regarding custody and access. It may also apply to the enforcement of an order that a child should live with a particular person or that it should be handed over to its custodian.

A request for enforcement may be submitted to the Chief Bailiff in the area where the child lives (section 2), which authority is vested in the County Administrative Board (section 1 of the 1895 Act on Enforcement - ulosotto laki 1895/37, utsökningslagen 1895/37).

45. Pursuant to section 4, as amended by Act no. 366/83, before ordering enforcement the Chief Bailiff must assign as a conciliator a person appointed by the Social Welfare Board or another suitable person to mediate between the parties with a view to enforcing the decision. Such mediation is aimed at persuading the person taking care of the child to comply voluntarily with his obligations under the relevant decision.

Conciliation may not be ordered if it is evident from previous attempts that it would be unsuccessful or, in the case of a custody decision, if immediate enforcement is in the child's interests and dictated by strong reasons.

46. The Chief Bailiff may impose an administrative fine in connection with an enforcement decision or, when the matter relates to the custody of a child or the handing over of a child to its custodian, he may order the Bailiff to transfer the child (section 5).

A fine as mentioned above must be fixed on the basis of the means of the person concerned (chapter 2, section 4 (b) para. 2, of the 1889 Penal Code).

If the fine cannot be collected, it must be converted into a prison sentence (section 5 para. 1, as amended by Act no. 650/86).

47. Enforcement must not take place against a child's own wishes if he or she is twelve years of age or is sufficiently mature for her wishes to be taken into account (section 6 of the 1975 Act, as amended by Act no. 366/83).

48. A decision by the Chief Bailiff under the 1975 Act may, unless otherwise stated therein, be enforced immediately (section 13 para. 1).

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

49. In his application (no. 19823/92) of 10 April 1992 to the Commission, Mr Teuvo Hokkanen, on his own and Sini's behalf, complained that, in breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention, the public authorities had failed to take appropriate measures to facilitate their speedy reunion. In this regard he also relied on Article 5 of Protocol No. 7 (P7-5) (right to equality of spouses in their relations with their children). He further complained that, contrary to Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention, he had not been given a fair and oral hearing before the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court in 1991 to 1992. In addition he alleged a breach of this provision in that the custody proceedings had not been concluded within a reasonable time and that the Supreme Court had failed to give reasons for its refusal of 21 January 1992 to grant leave to appeal. Finally, he complained that he had not been afforded an effective remedy as required under Article 13 (art. 13), in respect of the failure to take measures to facilitate reunion, the excessive length of the proceedings and the ineffectiveness of the administrative fines imposed upon the grandparents in view of their financial circumstances.

50. By decision of 9 February 1993, the Commission declared admissible the complaints made by Mr Hokkanen on his own behalf under Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention, Article 5 of Protocol No. 7 (P7-5) and, in so far as they concerned the length of the second set of custody proceedings, those relating to Article 6 para. 1 and Article 13 (art. 6-1, art. 13) of the Convention. It declared inadmissible the complaints lodged on Sini's behalf on the ground that Mr Hokkanen could not file an application for her as he was no longer her custodian at that time.

In its report of 22 October 1993 (Article 31) (art. 31), the Commission expressed the following opinion:

(a) by nineteen votes to two that there had been a violation of Article 8 (art. 8);

(b) unanimously that no separate issue arose under Article 5 of Protocol No. 7 (P7-5);

(c) by sixteen votes to five that there had been no violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1);

(d) by twenty votes to one that it was not necessary to examine the complaints under Article 13 (art. 13).

The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the concurring and dissenting opinions contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to this judgment*.

FINAL SUBMISSIONS MADE BY THE GOVERNMENT TO THE COURT

51. At the hearing on 21 March 1994 the Government confirmed the final submission in their memorial inviting "the Court to hold that there have been no violations of the Convention in the present case".

AS TO THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 (art. 8) OF THE CONVENTION

52. The applicant submitted that the Finnish authorities had failed to promote his speedy reunion with his daughter. They had allowed the grandparents to keep Sini in their care and prevent his access to her in defiance of court decisions and had transferred custody to them. He alleged a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention, which reads:

> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

The Government disputed this contention. The Commission upheld it in so far as it concerned the alleged non-enforcement of parental rights but did not state any opinion on the transfer of custody.

* Note by the Registrar. For practical reasons this annex will appear only with the printed version of the judgment (volume 299-A of Series A of the Publications of the Court), but a copy of the Commission's report is obtainable from the registry.

53. The Court notes from the outset that since the Convention entered into force with respect to Finland on 10 May 1990, it will, like the Commission, limit its examination to whether the facts occurring after that date disclosed a breach of the Convention (see, for instance, the Moreira de Azevedo v. Portugal judgment of 23 October 1990, Series A no. 189, pp. 17-18, para. 70; the Stamoulakatos v. Greece judgment of 26 October 1993, Series A no. 271, pp. 13-14, paras. 32-33). Events prior to 10 May 1990 will be taken into account merely as a background to the issues before the Court, in particular the large number of administrative and judicial actions taken by the applicant, the fact that all the decisions in his favour had been effectively resisted by the grandparents and that the embittered relationship between them and the applicant did not favour a co-operative approach to resolving the dispute.

A. Applicability of Article 8 (art. 8)

54. Sini was the child of a marriage and was thus ipso jure part of that "family" unit from the moment of birth and by the very fact of it. She lived with the applicant and her mother from her birth in September 1983, until she was handed over to her maternal grandparents after her mother's death in April 1985. After that the applicant met her on some occasions until January 1987. He was her custodian until September 1991 and remains her legal guardian. Since 1985 he has continuously sought to have access to her and to have her returned to him.

These links are undoubtedly sufficient to establish "family life" within the meaning of Article 8 (art. 8), which is thus applicable. Indeed applicability was not disputed before the Court.

B. Compliance with Article 8 (art. 8)

55. The essential object of Article 8 (art. 8) is to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities. There may in addition be positive obligations inherent in an effective "respect" for family life. Whilst the boundaries between the State's positive and negative obligations under this provision do not lend themselves to precise definition, the applicable principles are similar. In particular, in both contexts regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and the community as a whole, and in both contexts the State is recognised as enjoying a certain margin of appreciation (see the Keegan v. Ireland judgment of 26 May 1994, Series A no. 290, p. 19, para. 49).

The Court's role is not to substitute itself for the competent Finnish authorities in regulating custody and access issues in Finland, but rather to review under the Convention the decisions that those authorities have taken in the exercise of their power of appreciation (see, mutatis mutandis, the Handyside v, the United Kingdom judgment of 7 December 1976, Series A no. 24, p. 23, para. 50). In so doing, it must determine whether the reasons purporting to justify the actual measures adopted with regard to the applicant's enjoyment of his right to respect for family life are relevant and sufficient under Article 8 (art. 8).

In previous cases dealing with issues relating to the compulsory taking of children into public care and the implementation of care measures, the Court has consistently held that Article 8 (art. 8) includes a right for the parent to have measures taken with a view to his or her being reunited with the child and an obligation for the national authorities to take such action (see, for instance, the Eriksson v. Sweden judgment of 22 June 1989, Series A no. 156, p. 26, para. 71; the Margareta and Roger Andersson v. Sweden judgment of 25 February 1992, Series A no. 226-A, p. 30, para. 91; and the Olsson v. Sweden (no. 2) judgment of 27 November 1992, Series A no. 250, pp. 35-36, para. 90). In the opinion of the Court, this principle must be taken as also applying to cases such as the present where the origin of the provisional transfer of care is a private agreement.

56. The applicant and the Commission reasoned that a positive obligation for the Contracting State to take coercive measures was more called for where a child is in de facto care in defiance of the law and of court orders than after the termination of de jure care. The non-enforcement of the applicant's custody rights, as from 10 May 1990 until the transfer of the custody of Sini on 25 September 1991, as well as the non-enforcement of his visiting rights constituted a lack of "respect" for his "family life" in violation of Article 8 (art. 8). Notwithstanding the reasonable steps he had taken to have his parental rights enforced there was a striking lack of effective response. This fact, together with the length of the enforcement proceedings, had created a situation where his reunification with Sini had become difficult.

In addition, as regards the transfer of custody, the applicant contended that the Court of Appeal's judgment of 25 September 1991 conferred legitimacy on the illegal de facto care assumed by the grandparents. Although the grandparents had retained the child unlawfully, the length of time they had kept her was perceived by that court as an important justification for transferring custody. The measure further weakened the protection of his parental rights, notably as regards access to his daughter.

57. In the Government's submission a distinction should be drawn between, on the one hand, a parent's custody and visiting rights in respect of a child and, on the other hand, the enforcement of such rights. Although there may be plausible reasons for a parent to have custody and access rights, it does not necessarily follow that these should be enforced, especially if it would be incompatible with the interests and welfare of the child. That was the position under Finnish law, which viewed a parent's custody of a child as a right first and foremost in the interest of the well-being and balanced development of the child and not primarily for the benefit of the parent. They referred also to Article 3 of the 1989 United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, Article 19 para. 1 (b) of the 1980 European Convention on the Enforcement of Decisions Concerning Custody of Children and on Restoration of Custody of Children (European Treaty Series no. 105) and Articles 1 and 12 para. 3 of the 1980 Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (done at the Hague on 25 October 1980). The Government therefore disagreed with the contention of the applicant and the Commission that forcible measures should be more readily resorted to in the situation facing the applicant. At any rate, it would not have been appropriate to use coercion to implement his parental rights.

Whilst conceding that the applicant had not been able to exercise his access rights in the way specified in the relevant court decisions, the Government emphasised that this was due to the non-compliance by the grandparents with those decisions. The latter being private persons, the State was not directly responsible under international law for their acts or omissions.

In any event, the applicant's own conduct was open to criticism: he had not availed himself of the possibility of visiting Sini in the grandparents' home; he had failed to finalise the enforcement proceedings relating to the District Court's decision on access of 14 November 1990, by not requesting imposition of the fines indicated by the County Administrative Board on 28 March 1991; and for several months he had omitted to renew his request for enforcement of the access rights granted to him by the Court of Appeal on 25 September 1991 (see paragraphs 26 and 34 above).

The Government concluded that, in view of the difficult circumstances of the case, the national authorities had done everything that could reasonably be expected of them to facilitate reunion.

58. The Court recalls that the obligation of the national authorities to take measures to facilitate reunion is not absolute, since the reunion of a parent with a child who has lived for some time with other persons may not be able to take place immediately and may require preparatory measures being taken to this effect. The nature and extent of such preparation will depend on the circumstances of each case, but the understanding and co-operation of all concerned will always be an important ingredient. Whilst national authorities must do their utmost to facilitate such co-operation, any obligation to apply coercion in this area must be limited since the interests as well as the rights and freedoms of all concerned must be taken into account, and more particularly the best interests of the child and his or her rights under Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention. Where contacts with the parent might appear to threaten those interests or interfere with those rights, it is for the national authorities to strike a fair balance between them (see the above-mentioned Olsson (no. 2) judgment, pp. 35-36, para. 90).

What is decisive is whether the national authorities have taken all necessary steps to facilitate reunion as can reasonably be demanded in the special circumstances of each case (ibid.). The Court does not deem it necessary to deal with the applicant's and the Commission's general argument on an obligation under Article 8 (art. 8) to take forcible measures (see paragraph 56 above).

59. Turning to the particular facts the Court will deal first with the alleged non-enforcement of the applicant's access rights and then with the alleged non-enforcement of his custody rights and the transfer of custody to the grandparents.

1. Non-enforcement of access

60. As regards the alleged non-enforcement of access the Court notes that during the period under consideration the prevailing view of the Finnish authorities was, until the Court of Appeal's judgment of 21 October 1993, that it was in the child's best interest to develop contacts with the applicant, even if she might not wish to meet him. What is more, at least from the Supreme Court's judgments of 17 May 1988 until the Court of Appeal's judgment of 25 September 1991, the Finnish courts considered not only that the applicant was best suited as custodian but also that the child should return to live with him (see paragraphs 14, 16, 18 and 27 above). Arrangements for his access to the child were specified in the District Court's interim decision of 14 November 1990 and in the Court of Appeal's judgment of 25 September 1991 (see paragraphs 25 and 29 above). Since the grandparents failed to comply with the access arrangements set out in these decisions, the County Administrative Board, at the applicant's requests, ordered their enforcement subject to administrative fines being imposed upon them (see paragraphs 26 and 35 above); but these measures proved to be of no avail in face of the grandparents' persistent refusal to comply.

Against a background of ineffective court decisions and enforcement orders, the actions of the social welfare authorities consisted mainly of planning three meetings in 1991, taking steps to conciliate the applicant and the grandparents in late 1992; and arranging for one further meeting in the spring of 1993; none of which materialised (see paragraphs 33-36 above).

The difficulties in arranging access were admittedly in large measure due to the animosity between the grandparents and the applicant. Nonetheless the Court does not accept that responsibility for the failure of the relevant decisions or measures in actually bringing about contacts can be attributed to the applicant. Both the District Court's and the Court of Appeal's decisions regarding access had recognised the need to arrange meetings at a neutral place outside the grandparents' home (see paragraphs 23, 25 and 29 above). Whilst the grandparents consistently refused to comply with these decisions, the applicant actively sought their enforcement. The suggestion by the Government that the situation would have been any different had he requested the imposition of the administrative fines or not omitted for some time to renew his enforcement request is highly improbable (see paragraphs 26 and 34 above).

61. From the foregoing it cannot be said that, bearing in mind the interests involved, the competent authorities, prior to the Court of Appeal's judgment of 21 October 1993, made reasonable efforts to facilitate reunion. On the contrary, the inaction of the authorities placed the burden on the applicant to have constant recourse to a succession of time-consuming and ultimately ineffectual remedies to enforce his rights.

On the other hand, in the judgment of 21 October 1993 the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that the child had become sufficiently mature for her views to be taken into account and that access should therefore not be accorded against her own wishes (see paragraph 37 above). The Court sees no reason to call this finding into question.

62. Accordingly, the Court concludes that, notwithstanding the margin of appreciation enjoyed by the competent authorities, the non-enforcement of the applicant's right of access from 10 May 1990 until 21 October 1993 constituted a breach of his right to respect for his family life under Article 8 (art. 8). However, there has been no such violation in respect of the period thereafter.

2. Non-enforcement of custody rights and transfer of custody

63. It remains to be determined whether there was also a violation with respect to the non-enforcement of the applicant's custody rights and the subsequent transfer of the custody to the grandparents.

The Court observes that as of 10 May 1990, the child, who had been placed with her grandparents when she was one and a half years old, had been living with them for approximately five years. During this period she had very few contacts with her father, the applicant, and had not met him since early 1987 (see paragraph 38 above). On 30 May 1990, steps to have the custody transferred to the grandparents were recommended by the National Social Welfare Board (see paragraph 22 above) and, on 13 August 1990, the local Social Welfare Board instituted proceedings to this effect before the District Court. The Board's request was dismissed by it on 8 May 1991 but upheld by the Court of Appeal on 25 September 1991; leave to appeal was refused by the Supreme Court on 21 January 1992 (see paragraphs 23, 27, 29 and 31 above).

The Court is of the view that in such circumstances there were sufficient grounds to justify non-enforcement of the applicant's custody right pending the outcome of the custody proceedings.

64. Furthermore, as to the outcome of these proceedings, it is undisputed that the transfer of custody constituted an interference with the applicant's right to respect for family life under paragraph 1 of Article 8

(art. 8-1), that this interference was "in accordance with the law" and pursued the legitimate aim of protecting "the rights" of the child within the meaning of paragraph 2 (art. 8-2). The Court sees no reason to doubt that the transfer of custody was "necessary in a democratic society". The Court of Appeal's judgment, which was based on expert opinion, had regard to the length of the girl's stay with the grandparents, her strong attachment to them and her feeling that their home was her own (see paragraphs 29 and 31 above). These reasons were not only relevant but also sufficient for the purposes of paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2). The competent national authorities, which were in principle better placed than the international judge in evaluating the evidence before them (see, amongst many authorities, the above-mentioned Olsson v. Sweden (no. 2) judgment, pp. 35-36, para. 90), did not overstep their margin of appreciation in arriving at the decisions they did. Even taking into account the failure of the authorities to secure the applicant access to his child, the measure cannot be regarded as disproportionate to the legitimate aim of protecting her interests.

65. These aspects of the applicant's complaint do not therefore give rise to a separate breach of Article 8 (art. 8).

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 5 OF PROTOCOL No. 7 (P7-5)

66. Before the Commission the applicant maintained that the same facts as constituted the alleged violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention also gave rise to a breach of Article 5 of Protocol No. 7 (P7-5) (right to equality of spouses in their relations with their children). The Commission concluded that no separate issue arose under the latter provision.

The applicant did not pursue this complaint before the Court, which does not find it necessary to deal with the matter of its own motion.

III. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 6 PARA. 1 OF THE CONVENTION (art. 6-1)

A. Scope of the issues before the Court

67. The applicant complained under Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention that the second set of custody proceedings, in the first place, and, secondly, the ensuing enforcement proceedings exceeded a reasonable time. Thirdly, in the latter proceedings, he did not have a fair and impartial hearing before the Court of Appeal.

However, only the facts of the first complaint were declared admissible by the Commission. The Court will, in accordance with its established case-law, limit its examination to that complaint (see, for instance, the Helmers

v. Sweden judgment of 29 October 1991, Series A no. 212-A, p. 13, para. 25; and the above-mentioned Olsson (no. 2) judgment, pp. 29-30, para. 75).

B. Reasonableness of the length of the second set of custody proceedings

68. The applicant alleged a violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention, according to which:

> "In the determination of his civil rights and obligations ..., everyone is entitled to a ... hearing within a reasonable time by [a] tribunal ..."

Both the Government and the Commission disagreed with this contention.

69. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings is to be considered in the light of the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the conduct of the applicant and that of the relevant authorities. On the latter point, the importance of what is at stake for the applicant in the litigation has to be taken into account (see the Vallée v. France judgment of 26 April 1994, Series A no. 289-A, p.17, para. 34).

70. The applicant maintained that the proceedings had been unduly delayed by the fact that the District Court had twice suspended them for no pressing reasons, the second time for a period of six months. The extensive investigations requested by the District Court were unnecessary as they were based exclusively on material already available to it (see paragraphs 14 and 24 above). The authorities thus did not satisfy the requirement of exceptional diligence to be observed in such cases.

71. The Court finds that the relevant period to be taken into consideration started on 13 August 1990, when the Social Welfare Board made a request to the District Court for transfer of custody, and ended on 21 January 1992, when the Supreme Court refused leave to appeal (see paragraphs 23 and 31 above).

72. Although it is essential that custody cases be dealt with speedily, the Court sees no reason to criticise the District Court for having suspended the proceedings twice in order to obtain expert opinions on the issue before it.

As regards the six months' delay the difficulties which the social welfare authorities encountered as a result of the grandparents' refusal to allow Sini to be subjected to investigation and to take part in related interviews must not be overlooked (see paragraph 24 above). Irrespective of whether there were sufficient reasons for suspending the hearing for as long as six months, it has to be noted that the overall length of the proceedings was approximately eighteen months. In itself this is not excessive for proceedings comprising three judicial levels.

Having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, the Court, like the Commission, finds that the length of the second custody proceedings did not exceed a "reasonable time" and that there was thus no violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention.

IV. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 13 (art. 13) OF THE CONVENTION

73. The applicant complained that the non-enforcement of his custody and access rights and the length of the proceedings violated Article 13 (art. 13), which provides:

> "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in [the] Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

74. This complaint amounts in substance to the same as those made under Articles 6 and 8 (art. 6, art. 8). The Court, having regard to its findings above, shares the Commission's view that it is not necessary to examine this grievance.

V. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 50 (art. 50) OF THE CONVENTION

75. Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention reads:

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the ... Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. Non-pecuniary damage

76. The applicant sought 200,000 Finnish marks in compensation for non-pecuniary damage, attributable to the anxiety and distress he had felt as a result of the lack of enforcement of his parental rights and the transfer of custody.

The Government considered the amount excessive, whereas the Commission's Delegate did not comment.

77. The Court sees no reason to doubt that the applicant suffered distress as a result of the non-enforcement of his access rights and that sufficient just satisfaction would not be provided solely by the finding of a violation. Deciding on an equitable basis, as is required by Article 50 (art. 50), it awards him 100,000 marks for non-pecuniary damage. This figure is to be increased by any value-added tax that may be chargeable (see, for instance, the Observer and Guardian v. the United Kingdom judgment of 26 November 1991, Series A no. 216, p. 38, para. 84).

B. Costs and expenses

78. The applicant further claimed reimbursement of costs and expenses, totalling 229,906.47 marks and 2,770 French francs, in respect of the following items:

(a) 37,751.47 marks for legal fees and expenses in the domestic proceedings, of which 31,692.20 marks related to the period after the entry into force of the Convention in respect of Finland; in addition at least 15,000 marks which he would normally have been billed if invoices had not been reduced to meet his modest resources after the cessation of an insurance policy;

(b) 161,600 marks for 202 hours' work (at 800 marks per hour) by his lawyers in connection with the Strasbourg proceedings;

(c) 15,555 marks and 2,770 francs to cover expenses incurred by the appearance of three lawyers at the Court's hearing on 21 March 1994.

The applicant further asked the Court to add to any award made with regard to the above "all possible value-added taxes".

79. The Government maintained that only costs and expenses which had been necessarily incurred after 10 May 1990 (date of ratification of the Convention by Finland) should be taken into consideration and they objected to 15,000 marks being added to the domestic costs, the amount being based merely on hypothetical calculations. In their view the number of working hours and the hourly rate were excessive and representation of the applicant by one lawyer alone would have been sufficient. They also disagreed with the applicant's approach to including value-added taxes.

The Delegate of the Commission did not comment.

80. As to item (a), the Court recalls that an award may be made only in so far as the costs were actually and necessarily incurred in order to avoid or obtain redress for the non-enforcement of his right of access from 10 May 1990 until 21 October 1993. This does not include costs in connection with the proceedings before the Court of Appeal leading to its decision of the latter date. It does not appear that the applicant had a legal obligation to pay the additional 15,000 marks claimed. As these costs were not actually incurred, this part of the claim must also be rejected. In the light of the above, the Court awards him 15,000 marks for domestic costs together with any relevant value-added tax.

As regards item (b), the Court, deciding on an equitable basis, awards the applicant 120,000 marks, also to be increased by any relevant value-added tax, from which must be deducted the 8,070 French francs already received for legal fees from the Council of Europe by way of legal aid.

The applicant has moreover received 13,654.43 French francs in respect of item (c) and the Court does not find it necessary to make any further award under this head.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Holds unanimously that the non-enforcement of the applicant's right of access from 10 May 1990 until 21 October 1993 constituted a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention;

2. Holds by six votes to three that there was no such violation thereafter;

3. Holds by six votes to three that the non-enforcement after 10 May 1990 of his right of custody and the subsequent transfer of the custody to the grandparents did not constitute a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention;

4. Holds unanimously that it is not necessary to examine the applicant's complaint under Article 5 of Protocol No. 7 (P7-5);

5. Holds unanimously that the Court's examination under Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention is limited to the complaint concerning the length of the second set of custody proceedings and that there has been no violation of this provision;

6. Holds unanimously that it is not necessary to examine the applicant's allegations under Article 13 (art. 13) of the Convention;

7. Holds unanimously that Finland is to pay to the applicant, within three months and together with any value-added tax that may be chargeable, 100,000 (hundred thousand) Finnish marks for non-pecuniary damage, and, for legal fees and expenses, 135,000 (one hundred and thirty-five thousand) marks less 8,070 (eight thousand and seventy) French francs to be converted into Finnish marks at the rate applicable on the date of delivery of the present judgment;

8. Dismisses unanimously the remainder of the claim for just satisfaction.

Done in English and in French, and delivered at a public hearing in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 23 September 1994.

PARTLY DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DE MEYER, JOINED BY JUDGES RUSSO AND JUNGWIERT

(Translation)

In our opinion, there has been a breach of the applicant's right to respect for his family life both as regards custody and as regards access, and in respect of the latter since 21 October 1993 as well as before then.

Over many years the Finnish authorities were faced with and tolerated the prolongation of a situation which they had on many occasions noted to be unlawful and which they were accordingly under a duty to bring to an end[*]. On each occasion they yielded in the face of the grandparents' persistent obstination and thus enabled them to create a fait accompli which the authorities eventually resigned themselves to endorsing as regards both custody and access.

Having thus brought upon themselves this capitulation on both fronts, they may well have thought that matters had got to such a point that it was no longer in the child's interests to go on trying to remedy the situation.

The fact remains nevertheless that ultimately the authorities deprived the applicant of the exercise of rights which naturally vested in him as father, although they had previously recognised on numerous occasions that he should not be denied them[].

Far from stopping the infringement of these rights, they thus permanently put a seal on it.

[*] No distinction needs to be made between the various authorities which intervened in the case; they all engage the respondent State's responsibility.

Having deliberated in private on 26 October 1989 and 27 March 1990,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 16 March 1989, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 § 1 and Article 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47) of the Convention. It originated in an application (no. 11105/84) against the French Republic lodged with the Commission under Article 25 (art. 25) by two nationals of that State, Mr Jacques Huvig and his wife Mrs Janine Huvig-Sylvestre, on 9 August 1984.

The Commission's request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) and to the declaration whereby France recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46). The object of the request was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Article 8 (art. 8).

2. In response to the enquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 § 3 (d) of the Rules of Court, the applicants stated that they wished to take part in the proceedings and designated the lawyer who would represent them (Rule 30).

[*] Note by the Registrar: The case is numbered 4/1989/164/220. The first number is the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court in the relevant year (second number). The last two numbers indicate the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court since its creation and on the list of the corresponding originating applications to the Commission.

3. On 30 March 1989 the President of the Court decided, under Rule 21 § 6 and in the interests of sound administration of justice, that a single Chamber should be constituted to consider both the instant case and the Kruslin case[*].

The Chamber thus constituted included ex officio Mr L.-E. Pettiti, the elected judge of French nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr R. Ryssdal, the President of the Court (Rule 21 § 3 (b)). On the same day, 30 March 1989, in the presence of the Registrar, the President drew by lot the names of the other five members, namely Mrs D. Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F. Gölcüklü, Mr F. Matscher, Mr B. Walsh and Sir Vincent Evans (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 § 4) (art. 43).

4. Mr Ryssdal assumed the office of President of the Chamber (Rule 21 § 5) and, through the Registrar, consulted the Agent of the French Government ("the Government"), the Delegate of the Commission and the lawyer for the applicants on the need for a written procedure (Rule 37 § 1). In accordance with his orders and instructions, the Registrar received the Government's memorial on 18 August 1989; the applicants' representative and the Delegate of the Commission informed the Registrar on 11 July and 19 October respectively that they would not be filing memorials.

On 13 September and 10 October 1989 the Commission provided the Registrar with various documents he had asked for on the President's instructions.

5. Having consulted, through the Registrar, those who would be appearing before the Court, the President had directed on 21 June 1989 that the oral proceedings should open on 24 October 1989 (Rule 38).

6. The hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on the appointed day. The Court had held a preparatory meeting immediately beforehand.

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government

Mr J.-P. PUISSOCHET, Head of the Department of Legal Affairs, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Agent,

Mrs I. CHAUSSADE, magistrat, on secondment to the Department of Legal Affairs, Ministry of Foreign Affairs,

Miss M. PICARD, magistrat,
on secondment to the Department of Legal Affairs, Ministry of Foreign Affairs,

Mr M. DOBKINE, magistrat, Department of Criminal Affairs and Pardons, Ministry of Justice, [*] Note by the Registrar: Case no. 7/1989/167/223.

Mr F. LE GUNEHEC, magistrat,
Department of Criminal Affairs and Pardons, Ministry of Justice, Counsel;

- for the Commission
Mr S. TRECHSEL, Delegate.

By letter of 11 July 1989 counsel for the applicant had informed the Registrar that he would not be attending the hearing.

The Court heard addresses by Mr Puissochet for the Government and by Mr Trechsel for the Commission, as well as their answers to a question it put.

AS TO THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

7. Mr Jacques Huvig and his wife Janine, née Sylvestre, currently live at Grau-du-Roi (Gard). Before he retired, Mr Huvig, with his wife's assistance, ran a wholesale fruit-and-vegetable business at Varennes-sur-Amance and Montigny-le-Roi (Haute-Marne).

8. On 20 December 1973 the Director of the Haute-Marne Tax Office lodged a complaint against the applicant and two other persons alleging tax evasion, failure to make entries in accounts and false accounting.

A judicial investigation was begun on 26 December by an investigating judge at Chaumont, assigned by the President of the Chaumont tribunal de grande instance.

Mr and Mrs Huvig's home was searched as were their business premises, pursuant to a warrant issued on 14 March 1974 by the investigating judge. The latter also issued a warrant to the gendarmerie at Langres (Haute-Marne) on 4 April requiring them to monitor and transcribe all Mr and Mrs Huvig's telephone calls - both business and private ones - on that day and the next day.

The telephone tapping took place from about 8 p.m. on 4 April 1974 until midnight on 5 April; on 6 April the second in command of the gendarmerie unit at Langres made a "summary report" on the tapping, which was subsequently brought to the knowledge of the applicants.

9. Mr Huvig was charged with tax evasion, forgery of private and business documents, failure to keep proper accounts, aiding and abetting misuse of company property and receiving funds derived from misuse of company property, and on 9 April he appeared before the investigating judge, who remanded him in custody; he was released on 11 June 1974.

Mrs Huvig, who from 20 March 1974 onwards was questioned several times as a witness, was charged on 13 May 1976 with aiding and abetting tax evasion and forgery of business documents.

10. On 23 December 1976 the investigating judge committed them for trial - with the other two persons mentioned above - at the Chaumont tribunal de grande instance, in Mr Huvig's case on charges of forgery, uttering, aiding and abetting misuse of company property, aiding and abetting tax evasion, aiding and abetting fraud, receiving funds derived from misuse of company property, and false or incomplete accounting, and in Mrs Huvig's case on charges of aiding and abetting forgery, aiding and abetting tax evasion and aiding and abetting improper keeping of accounts.

They raised as a preliminary issue several pleas of nullity, one of which related to the telephone tapping carried out on 4 and 5 April 1974. On 26 January 1982 the court ordered that these pleas should be heard as part of the main trial, and on 30 March 1982 it rejected them. Of the telephone tapping it said:

> "This investigative measure, even if it must remain an exceptional one, is within the investigating judge's powers as part of his inquiries during an investigation;
> No infringement of the rights of the defence has been substantiated, especially as in the instant case the results were unusable and did not serve as a basis for the prosecution ..."

In the same judgment it was held that the various offences with which the applicants were charged had been made out, except that of aiding and abetting fraud in Mr Huvig's case; in consequence, Mr Huvig was sentenced to eight months' imprisonment, six months of which were suspended, and Mrs Huvig to two months suspended.

11. The defendants, the civil party seeking damages and the prosecution appealed to the Dijon Court of Appeal.

The defence again raised the pleas of nullity that had been put forward unsuccessfully at the original trial. The Court of Appeal rejected all of them on 17 March 1983. As regards the impugned telephone tapping, it gave the following reasons for its decision:

> "[According to Mr Huvig, the investigating judge] infringed the rights of the defence and the guarantees afforded by law to all accused persons, seeing that, even though he had not yet had his first interview with the investigating judge (which took place on 9 April 1974 ...), he nonetheless had to be regarded as having already been charged, since the public prosecutor's application of 20 December 1973 was directed against him among others;
> But, as the trial court rightly pointed out, this investigative measure, while it must remain an exceptional one, is one of the prerogatives of an investigating judge carrying out inquiries as part of an investigation he is conducting;
> The Court has been able to check and satisfy itself that this operation, which to be effective must be carried out without the knowledge of the person suspected - or even charged -, was carried out on the investigating judge's authority and under his supervision, without any subterfuge or ruse being employed;

The operation, moreover, lasted only 28 hours ..., did not yield anything usable and did not serve as a basis for the prosecution;

Nothing enables it to be established that the procedure thus followed had the result of jeopardising the exercise of the rights of the defence, since it must be borne in mind that Mr Huvig had not at that stage been officially charged by the investigating judge and that Article 81 of the Code of Criminal Procedure empowers the latter to take all investigative measures he deems useful for establishing the truth ...;

At the same time the Dijon Court of Appeal upheld the judgment under appeal as to the finding that the defendants were guilty but increased the sentences passed on them by the trial court, sentencing the applicant to two years' imprisonment, twenty-two months of which were suspended, and to a fine of 10,000 French francs, and his wife to six months suspended.

12. The applicants appealed to the Court of Cassation on points of law. In the first of their grounds of appeal the Court of Appeal's judgment was criticised for its failure to quash the investigating judge's warrant of 4 April 1974:

"Firstly, investigating judges are not empowered by Article 81 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to tap the telephone of anybody - whether it be a person charged with a criminal offence, a third party or a witness - and such a procedure is contrary to the law, since the Code of Criminal Procedure has regulated searches, the seizing of property and the taking of evidence from witnesses and has not conferred on investigating judges the power to tap the telephones of persons against whom there is substantial, consistent evidence of guilt, such a procedure being prohibited both by Articles 6 and 8 (art. 6, art. 8) of the Convention ... and by Article 9 of the Civil Code, Articles L. 41 and L. 42 of the Post and Telecommunications Code and Article 368 of the Criminal Code;

Secondly, an individual who has been personally proceeded against by the civil party seeking damages and in respect of whom ... the public prosecutor has requested that an investigation be commenced is a party to the proceedings and must consequently be regarded as a person charged with a criminal offence within the meaning of Article 114 of the Code of Criminal Procedure; such a person must, therefore, before any statement is taken by the investigating judge, be informed of the charges against him, of his right not to make any statement and of his right to the assistance of a lawyer; the investigating judge accordingly cannot, without infringing the rights of the defence, record such a person's telephone conversations without the person's knowledge;

Lastly, since what is at issue is a nullity that is absolute as a matter of public policy - unlawful telephone tapping being a criminal offence -, it is of little importance that the conversations recorded were not used as the basis for the prosecution."

On pages 6 and 7 of the supplementary pleadings there were references to the Klass and Others judgment of the European Court of Human Rights (6 September 1978, Series A no. 28).

The Criminal Division of the Court of Cassation dismissed the appeal on 24 April 1984. It rejected the foregoing ground in the following terms:

> "In the judgment [of the Dijon Court of Appeal] the plea that the investigation proceedings were null and void because of the nullity of the warrant issued by the investigating judge on 4 April 1974 ordering that Huvig's telephone conversations should be monitored was rejected on the grounds that this measure was within the contemplation of Article 81 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and that as, moreover, it had not served as a basis for the prosecution, it had not had the effect of jeopardising the exercise of the rights of the defence;
> As these reasons stand and seeing, furthermore, that it has not been found - nor even alleged by the appellants - that the investigative measure in question, which was carried out under the supervision of the investigating judge, entailed any subterfuges or ruses, the Court of Appeal did, without laying itself open to the objection raised in the ground of appeal, provide a legal basis for its decision;
> ..." (Recueil Dalloz Sirey (DS) 1986, jurisprudence, pp. 125-128)

II. THE RELEVANT LEGISLATION AND CASE-LAW

13. French criminal law adopts the principle that any kind of evidence is admissible: "unless otherwise provided by statute, any type of evidence shall be admissible to substantiate a criminal charge ..." (Article 427 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

There is no statutory provision which expressly empowers investigating judges to carry out or order telephone tapping, or indeed to carry out or order various measures which are nonetheless in common use, such as the taking of photographs or fingerprints, shadowing, surveillance, requisitions, confrontations of witnesses and reconstructions of crimes. On the other hand, the Code of Criminal Procedure does expressly confer power on them to take several other measures, which it regulates in detail, such as pre-trial detention, seizure of property and searches.

14. Under the old Code of Criminal Procedure the Court of Cassation had condemned the use of telephone tapping by investigating judges, at least in circumstances which it regarded as disclosing, on the part of a judge or the police, a lack of "fairness" incompatible with the rules of criminal procedure and the safeguards essential to the rights of the defence (combined divisions, 31 January 1888, ministère public c. Vigneau, Dalloz 1888, jurisprudence, pp. 72-74; Criminal Division, 12 June 1952, Imbert, Bull. no. 153, pp. 258-260; Civil Division, second section, 18 March 1955, époux Jolivot c. époux Lubrano et autres, DS 1955, jurisprudence, pp. 573-574, and Gazette du Palais (GP) 1955, jurisprudence, p. 249). Some trial courts and courts of appeal which had to deal with the issue, on the other hand, showed some willingness to hold that such telephone tapping was lawful if there had been neither "entrapment" nor "provocation"; this view was based on Article 90 of the former Code (Seine Criminal Court, Tenth Division, 13 February 1957, ministère public contre X, GP 1957, jurisprudence, pp. 309-310).

15. Since the 1958 Code of Criminal Procedure came into force, the courts have had regard in this respect to, among others, Articles 81, 151 and 152, which provide:

Article 81

(first, fourth and fifth paragraphs)

"The investigating judge shall, in accordance with the law, take all the investigative measures which he deems useful for establishing the truth.

If the investigating judge is unable to take all the investigative measures himself, he may issue warrants to senior police officers (officiers de police judiciaire) in order to have them carry out all the necessary investigative measures on the conditions and subject to the reservations provided for in Articles 151 and 152.

The investigating judge must verify the information thus gathered.

(as worded at the material time)

"An investigating judge may issue a warrant requiring any judge of his court, any district-court judge within the territorial jurisdiction of that court, any senior police officer (officier de police judiciaire) with authority in that jurisdiction or any investigating judge to undertake any investigative measures he considers necessary in places coming under their respective jurisdictions.

The warrant shall indicate the nature of the offence to which the proceedings relate. It shall be dated and signed by the issuing judge and shall bear his seal.

It may only order investigative measures directly connected with the prosecution of the offence to which the proceedings relate.

"The judges or senior police officers instructed to act shall exercise, within the limits of the warrant, all the powers of the investigating judge.

16. An Act of 17 July 1970 added to the Civil Code an Article 9 guaranteeing to everyone "the right to respect for his private life". It also added to the Criminal Code an Article 368, whereby:

"Anyone who wilfully intrudes on the privacy of others:

1. By listening to, recording or transmitting by means of any device, words spoken by a person in a private place, without that person's consent; shall be liable to imprisonment for not less than two months and not more than one year and a fine ... or to only one of these two penalties."

During the preparatory work, one of the vice-chairmen of the National Assembly's Statutes Committee, Mr Zimmermann, sought "certain assurances" that this enactment "[would] not prevent the investigating judge from issuing strictly within the limits of the law warrants to have telephones tapped, obviously without making use of any form of inducement and in compliance with all the legal procedures" (Journal officiel, National Assembly, 1970 proceedings, p. 2074). The Minister of Justice, Mr René Pleven, replied: "... there is no question of interfering with the powers of investigating judges, who are indeed empowered, in the circumstances laid down by law, to order tapping"; he added a little later: "when an official taps a telephone, he can only do so lawfully if he has a warrant from a judicial authority or is acting on the instructions of a minister" (ibid., p. 2075). Both Houses of Parliament thereupon passed the Bill without amending it on this point.

17. Article 41 of the Post and Telecommunications Code provides that any public servant or anyone authorised to assist with the performance of relevant official duties who breaches the secrecy of correspondence entrusted to the telecommunications service shall be liable to the penalties provided for in Article 187 of the Criminal Code - a fine, imprisonment and temporary disqualification from any public office or employment. Article 42 provides that anyone who, without permission from the sender or the addressee, divulges, publishes or uses the content of correspondence transmitted over the air or by telephone shall be liable to the penalties provided for in Article 378 of the Criminal Code (on professional confidentiality) - a fine or imprisonment.

General Instruction no. 500-78 on the telephone service - intended for Post and Telecommunications Authority officials - contains the following provisions, however, given here in the amended version of 1964 (Article 24 of Part III):

> "Postmasters and sub-postmasters are required to comply with any requests that ... calls to or from a specified telephone should be monitored by the relevant authority, made by:
> 1. An investigating judge (Arts. 81, 92 and 94 of the Code of Criminal Procedure) or any judge or senior police officer (officier de police judiciaire) to whom a judicial warrant has been issued (Art. 152);

The General Instruction was published in the official bulletin of the Ministry of Post and Telecommunications and was described by the Government as an "implementing regulation".

18. The striking development of various forms of serious crime - large-scale thefts and robberies, terrorism, drug-trafficking - appears in France to have led to a marked increase in the frequency with which investigating judges resort to telephone tapping. The courts have as a result given many more decisions on the subject than formerly; telephone tapping has not been held to be unlawful in itself, although the courts have occasionally shown some distaste for it (Paris Court of Appeal, Ninth Criminal Division, 28 March 1960, Cany et Rozenbaum, GP 1960, jurisprudence, pp. 253-254).

The vast majority of the decisions cited to the Court by the Government and the Commission, or of which the Court has had cognisance by its own means, are of later date than the facts of the instant case (April 1974) and have gradually provided a number of clarifications. These do not all stem from judgments of the Court of Cassation, and do not for the time being constitute a uniform body of case-law, because the decisions or reasons given in some of the cases have remained unique. They may be summarised as follows.

(a) Articles 81 and 151 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (see paragraph 15 above) empower investigating judges - and them alone, as far as judicial investigations are concerned - to carry out telephone tapping or, much more commonly in practice, to issue a warrant to that effect to a senior police officer (officier de police judiciaire) within the meaning of Article 16 (see, in particular, Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, 9 October 1980, Tournet, Bull. no. 255, pp. 662-664; 24 April 1984 - see paragraph 12 above; 23 July 1985, Kruslin, Bull. no. 275, pp. 713-715; 4 November 1987, Croce, Antoine et Kruslin, DS 1988, sommaires, p. 195; 15 February 1988, Schroeder, and 15 March 1988, Arfi, Bull. no. 128, pp. 327-335). Telephone tapping is an "investigative measure" which may sometimes be "useful for establishing the truth". It is comparable to the seizure of letters or telegrams (see, among other authorities, Poitiers Court of Appeal, Criminal Division, 7 January 1960, Manchet, Juris-Classeur périodique (JCP) 1960, jurisprudence, no. 11599, and Paris Court of Indictment Division, 27 June 1984, F. et autre, DS 1985, jurisprudence, pp. 93-96) and it similarly does not offend the provisions of Article 368 of the Criminal Code, having regard to the legislative history and to the principle that any kind of evidence is admissible (see paragraphs 13 and 16 above and Strasbourg tribunal de grande instance, 15 February 1983, S. et autres, unreported; Colmar Court of Appeal, 9 March 1984, Chalvignac et autre, unreported; Paris Court of Appeal, Indictment Division, judgment of 27 June 1984 previously cited and judgment of 31 October 1984, Li Siu Lung et autres, GP 1985, sommaires, pp. 94-95).

(b) The investigating judge can only issue such a warrant "where there is a presumption that a specific offence has been committed which has given rise to the investigation" which he is responsible for conducting and not in respect of a whole category of offences "on the off chance"; this is clear not only from Articles 81 and 151 (second and third paragraphs) of the Code of Criminal Procedure but also "from the general principles of criminal procedure" (see, among other authorities, Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, judgments of 23 July 1985, 4 November 1987 and 15 March 1988 previously cited).

The French courts do not seem ever to have held that telephone tapping is lawful only where the offences being investigated are of some seriousness or if the investigating judge has specified a maximum duration for it.

(c) "Within the limits of the warrant" that has been issued to him - if need be by fax (Limoges Court of Appeal, Criminal Division, 18 November 1988, Lecesne et autres, DS 1989, sommaires, p. 394) - the senior police officer exercises "all the powers of the investigating judge" (Article 152 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). He exercises these under the supervision of the investigating judge, who by the fifth paragraph of Article 81 is bound to "verify the information ... gathered" (see, among other authorities, Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, judgments of 9 October 1980, 24 April 1984, 23 July 1985, 4 November 1987 and 15 March 1988 previously cited).

The warrant apparently sometimes takes the form of a general delegation of powers, including - without its being expressly mentioned - the power to tap telephones (Court of Cassation, Civil Division, second section, judgment of 18 March previously cited, and Paris Court of Appeal, judgment of 28 March 1960 previously cited).

(e) Telephone tapping must not be accompanied by "any subterfuge or ruse" (see, among other authorities, Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, judgment of 9 October 1980, 24 April 1984, 23 July 1985, 4 November 1987, 15 February 1988 and 15 March 1988 previously cited) failing which the information gathered by means of it must be either deleted or removed from the case file (Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, judgments of 13 and 19 June 1989 previously cited).

(f) The telephone tapping must also be carried out "in such a way that the exercise of the rights of the defence cannot be jeopardised" (see, among other authorities, Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, judgments of 9 October 1980, 24 April 1984, 23 July 1985, 4 November 1987, 15 February 1988, 15 March 1988 and 19 June 1989 previously cited). In particular, the confidentiality of the relations between suspect or person accused and lawyer must be respected, as must, more generally, a lawyer's duty of professional confidentiality, at least when he is not acting in any other capacity (Aix-en-Provence Court of Appeal, Indictment Division, 16 June 1982 and 2 February 1983, Sadji Hamou et autres, GP 1982, jurisprudence, pp. 645-649, and GP 1983, jurisprudence, pp. 313-315; Paris Court of Appeal, Indictment Division, judgment of 27 June 1984 previously cited).

(g) With this reservation, it is permissible to tap telephone calls to or from a charged person (Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, judgments of 9 October 1980 and 24 April 1984 previously cited) or a mere suspect (judgments of the Strasbourg tribunal de grande instance, 15 February 1983, the Colmar Court of Appeal, 9 March 1984, and the Indictment Division of the Paris Court of Appeal, 27 June 1984, previously cited) or even a third party, such as a witness, whom there is reason to believe to be in possession of information about the perpetrators or circumstances of the offence (see, among other authorities, Aix-en-Provence Court of Appeal, judgment of 16 June 1982 previously cited).

(i) The senior police officer supervises the tape or cassette recording of the conversations and their transcription, where he does not carry out these operations himself; when it comes to choosing extracts to submit "for examination by the court", it is for him to determine "what words may render the speaker liable to criminal proceedings". He performs these duties "on his own responsibility and under the supervision of the investigating judge" (Strasbourg tribunal de grande instance, judgment of 15 February 1983 previously cited, upheld by the Colmar Court of Appeal on 9 March 1984; Paris Court of Appeal, judgment of 27 June 1984 previously cited).

(j) The original tapes are "exhibits", not "investigation documents", but have only the weight of circumstantial evidence; their contents are transcribed in reports in order to give them a physical form so that they can be inspected (Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, 28 April 1987, Allieis, Bull. no. 173, pp. 462-467).

(k) If transcription raises a problem of translation into French, Articles 156 et seq. of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which deal with expert opinions, do not apply to the appointment and work of the translator (Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, 6 September 1988, Fekari, Bull. no. 317, pp. 861-862 (extracts), and 18 December 1989, M. et autres, not yet reported).

(l) There is no statutory provision prohibiting the inclusion in the file on a criminal case of evidence from other proceedings, such as tapes and reports containing transcriptions, if they may "assist the judges and help to establish the truth", provided that such evidence is added under an adversarial procedure (Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, judgments of 23 July 1985 and 6 September 1988 previously cited).

(m) The defence must be able to inspect the reports containing transcriptions, to hear the original tape recordings, to challenge their authenticity during the judicial investigation and subsequent trial and to apply for any necessary investigative measures - such as an expert opinion - relating to their contents and the circumstances in which they were made (see, among other authorities, Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, 23 July 1985, previously cited; 16 July 1986, Illouz, unreported; and 28 April 1987, Allieis, previously cited).

(n) Just as the investigating judge supervises the senior police officer, he is himself supervised by the Indictment Division, to which he - exactly like the public prosecutor - may apply under Article 171 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Trial courts, courts of appeal and the Court of Cassation may have to deal with objections or grounds of appeal as the case may be - particularly by defendants but also, on occasion, by the prosecution (Court of Cassation, judgments of 19 June and 24 November 1989 previously cited) - based on a failure to comply with the requirements summarised above or with other rules which the parties concerned claim are applicable. A failure of this kind, however, would not automatically nullify the proceedings such that a court of appeal could be held to have erred if it had not dealt with them of its own motion; they affect only defence rights (Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, 11 December 1989, Takrouni, not yet reported).

19. Since at least 1981, parties have increasingly often relied on Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention - and, much less frequently, on Article 6 (art. 6) (Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, 23 April 1981, Pellegrin et autres, Bull. no. 117, pp. 328-335, and 21 November 1988, S. et autres) - in support of their complaints about telephone tapping; they have sometimes as in the instant case (see paragraph 12 above) - cited the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights.

Hitherto only telephone tapping carried out without a warrant, during the police investigation (see, among other authorities, Court of Cassation, judgments of 13 June and 24 November 1989 previously cited), or in unexplained circumstances (see, among other authorities, Court of Cassation, judgment of 19 June 1989 previously cited) or in violation of defence rights (Paris Court of Appeal, Indictment Division, judgment of 31 October 1984 previously cited) has been held by the French courts to be contrary to Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2) ("in accordance with the law") or to domestic law in the strict sense. In all other cases the courts have either found no violation (Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, judgments of 24 April 1984, 23 July 1985, 16 July 1986, 28 April 1987, 4 November 1987, 15 February 1988, 15 March 1988, 6 September 1988 and 18 December 1989 previously cited, and 16 November 1988, S. et autre, unreported, and the judgments of 15 February 1983 (Strasbourg), 9 March 1984 (Colmar) and 27 June 1984 (Paris) previously cited) or else ruled the plea inadmissible for various reasons (Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, judgments of 23 April 1981, 21 November 1988 and 11 December 1989 previously cited and the unreported judgments of 24 May 1983, S. et autres; 23 May 1985, Y. H. W.; 17 February 1986, H.; 4 November 1986, J.; and 5 February 1990, B. et autres).

20. While academic opinion is divided as to the compatibility of telephone tapping as carried out in France - on the orders of investigating judges or others - with the national and international legal rules in force in the country, there seems to be unanimous agreement that it is desirable and even necessary for Parliament to try to solve the problem by following the example set by many foreign States (see in particular Gaëtan di Marino, comments on the Tournet judgment of 9 October 1980 (Court of Cassation), JCP 1981, jurisprudence, no. 19578; Albert Chavanne, ‘Les résultats de l’audio-surveillance comme preuve pénale’, Revue internationale de droit comparé, 1986, pp. 752-753 and 755; Gérard Cohen-Jonathan, ‘Les écoutes téléphoniques’, Studies in honour of Gérard J. Wiarda, 1988, p. 104; Jean Pradel, ‘Écoutes téléphoniques et Convention européenne des Droits de l’Homme’, DS 1990, chronique, pp. 17-20). In July 1981 the Government set up a study group chaired by Mr Robert Schmelck, who was then President of the Court of Cassation, and consisting of senators and MPs of various political persuasions, judges, university professors, senior civil servants, judges and a barrister. The group submitted a report on 25 June 1982, but this has remained confidential and has not yet led to a bill being tabled.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

21. The applicants applied to the Commission on 9 August 1984 (application no. 11105/84). Mr Huvig relied on Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention and complained of the investigating judge's refusal to grant his application for an expert opinion on technical and financial matters; he ascribed this refusal to evidence improperly taken from a witness. He and his wife also complained under Article 6 § 3 (a) (art. 6-3-a) of the delay in charging them. Lastly, both alleged that the telephone tapping carried out on 4 and 5 April 1974 had contravened Article 8 (art. 8).

22. On 15 October 1987 the Commission declared the first complaint inadmissible as being manifestly ill-founded (under Article 27 § 2) (art. 27-2) and the second complaint inadmissible for failure to exhaust domestic remedies (under Articles 26 and 27 § 3) (art. 26, art. 27-3). The third and final complaint, however, it declared admissible, on 6 July 1988.

In its report of 14 December 1988 (made under Article 31) (art. 31) the Commission expressed the opinion by ten votes to two that there had been a breach of Article 8 (art. 8). The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the separate opinion contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to this judgment[*].

FINAL SUBMISSIONS TO THE COURT

23. At the hearing the Court was requested:

(a) by the Agent of the Government to "hold that in the instant case there ha[d] been no conduct disclosing a breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention"; and

(b) by the Delegate of the Commission to "find that there ha[d] been a violation of Article 8 (art. 8)".

AS TO THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 (art. 8)

24. Mr and Mrs Huvig claimed that in the instant case there had been a breach of Article 8 (art. 8), which provides:

[*] Note by the Registrar. For practical reasons this annex will appear only with the printed version of the judgment (volume 176-B of Series A of the Publications of the Court), but a copy of the Commission's report is obtainable from the registry.

"1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

The Government disputed that submission, while the Commission agreed with it in substance.

25. The telephone tapping complained of amounted without any doubt to an "interference by a public authority" with the exercise of the applicants' right to respect for their "correspondence" and their "private life" (see the Klass and Others judgment of 8 September 1978, Series A no. 28, p. 21, § 41, and the Malone judgment of 2 August 1984, Series A no. 82, p. 30, § 64). The Government did not dispute this.

Such an interference contravenes Article 8 (art. 8) unless it is "in accordance with the law", pursues one or more of the legitimate aims referred to in paragraph 2 (art. 8-2) and furthermore is "necessary in a democratic society" in order to achieve them.

A. "In accordance with the law"

26. The expression "in accordance with the law", within the meaning of Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2), requires firstly that the impugned measure should have some basis in domestic law; it also refers to the quality of the law in question, requiring that it should be accessible to the person concerned, who must moreover be able to foresee its consequences for him, and compatible with the rule of law.

1. Whether there was a legal basis in French law

27. It was a matter of dispute before the Commission and the Court whether the first condition was satisfied in the instant case.

The applicants said it was not. They submitted that there was no law in France governing the matter. France being a country of written law, case-law was a source only of law in general (droit), not of law in the statutory sense (loi). Furthermore, the courts had left the question of tapping private telephones to the unfettered discretion of investigating judges.

In the Government's submission, there was no contradiction between Article 368 of the Criminal Code and Article 81 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, at least not if regard was had to the drafting history of the former (see paragraph 16 above). The Code of Criminal Procedure, they argued, did not give an exhaustive list of the investigative means available to the investigating judge - measures as common as the taking of photographs or fingerprints, shadowing, surveillance, requisitions, confrontations between witnesses, and reconstructions of crimes, for example, were not mentioned in it either (see paragraph 13 above). The provisions added to Article 81 by Articles 151 and 152 were supplemented in national case-law (see paragraphs 15 and 18-19 above). By "law" as referred to in Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2) of the Convention was meant the law in force in a given legal system, in this instance a combination of the written law - essentially Articles 81, 151 and 152 of the Code of Criminal Procedure - and the case-law interpreting it.

The Delegate of the Commission considered that in the case of the Continental countries, including France, only a substantive enactment of general application - whether or not passed by Parliament - could amount to a "law" for the purposes of Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2) of the Convention. Admittedly the Court had held that "the word ‘law’ in the expression ‘prescribed by law’ cover[ed] not only statute but also unwritten law" (see the Sunday Times judgment of 26 April 1979, Series A no. 30, p. 30, § 47, the Dudgeon judgment of 22 October 1981, Series A no. 45, p. 19, § 44, and the Chappell judgment of 30 March 1989, Series A no. 152, p. 22, § 52), but in those instances the Court was, so the Delegate maintained, thinking only of the common-law system. That system, however, was radically different from, in particular, the French system. In the latter, case-law was undoubtedly a very important source of law, but a secondary one, whereas by "law" the Convention meant a primary source.

28. Like the Government and the Delegate, the Court points out, firstly, that it is primarily for the national authorities, notably the courts, to interpret and apply domestic law (see, among many other authorities, the Malone judgment previously cited, Series A no. 82, p. 36, § 79, and the Eriksson judgment of 22 June 1989, Series A no. 156, p. 25, § 62). It is therefore not for the Court to express an opinion contrary to theirs on whether telephone tapping ordered by investigating judges is compatible with Article 368 of the Criminal Code. For many years now, the courts - and in particular the Court of Cassation - have regarded Articles 81, 151 and 152 of the Code of Criminal Procedure as providing a legal basis for telephone tapping carried out by a senior police officer (officier de police judiciaire) under a warrant issued by an investigating judge.

Settled case-law of this kind cannot be disregarded. In relation to paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) of the Convention and other similar clauses, the Court has always understood the term "law" in its "substantive" sense, not its "formal" one; it has included both enactments of lower rank than statutes (see, in particular, the De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp judgment of 18 June 1971, Series A no. 12, p. 45, § 93) and unwritten law. The Sunday Times, Dudgeon and Chappell judgments admittedly concerned the United Kingdom, but it would be wrong to exaggerate the distinction between common-law countries and Continental countries, as the Government rightly pointed out. Statute law is, of course, also of importance in common-law countries. Conversely, case-law has traditionally played a major role in Continental countries, to such an extent that whole branches of positive law are largely the outcome of decisions by the courts. The Court has indeed taken account of case-law in such countries on more than one occasion (see, in particular, the Müller and Others judgment of 24 May 1988, Series A no. 133, p. 20, § 29, the Salabiaku judgment of 7 October 1988, Series A no. 141, pp. 16-17, § 29, and the Markt Intern Verlag GmbH and Klaus Beermann judgment of 20 November 1989, Series A no. 165, pp. 18-19, § 30). Were it to overlook case-law, the Court would undermine the legal system of the Continental States almost as much as the Sunday Times judgment of 26 April 1979 would have "struck at the very roots" of the United Kingdom's legal system if it had excluded the common law from the concept of "law" (Series A no. 30, p. 30, § 47). In a sphere covered by the written law, the "law" is the enactment in force as the competent courts have interpreted it in the light, if necessary, of any new practical developments.

In sum, the interference complained of had a legal basis in French law.

2. "Quality of the law"

29. The second requirement which emerges from the phrase "in accordance with the law" - the accessibility of the law - does not raise any problem in the instant case.

The same is not true of the third requirement, the law's "foreseeability" as to the meaning and nature of the applicable measures. As the Court pointed out in the Malone judgment of 2 August 1984, Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2) of the Convention "does not merely refer back to domestic law but also relates to the quality of the law, requiring it to be compatible with the rule of law". It

> "thus implies ... that there must be a measure of legal protection in domestic law against arbitrary interferences by public authorities with the rights safeguarded by paragraph 1 (art. 8-1) ... Especially where a power of the executive is exercised in secret, the risks of arbitrariness are evident ... Undoubtedly ..., the requirements of the Convention, notably in regard to foreseeability, cannot be exactly the same in the special context of interception of communications for the purposes of police investigations"

- or judicial investigations -

> "as they are where the object of the relevant law is to place restrictions on the conduct of individuals. In particular, the requirement of foreseeability cannot mean that an individual should be enabled to foresee when the authorities are likely to intercept his communications so that he can adapt his conduct accordingly. Nevertheless, the law must be sufficiently clear in its terms to give citizens an adequate indication as to the circumstances in which and the conditions on which public authorities are empowered to resort to this secret and potentially dangerous interference with the right to respect for private life and correspondence.

> ... [In its judgment of 25 March 1983 in the case of Silver and Others the Court] held that 'a law which confers a discretion must indicate the scope of that discretion', although the detailed procedures and conditions to be observed do not necessarily have to be incorporated in rules of substantive law (Series A no. 61, pp. 33-34, §§ 88-89). The degree of precision required of the 'law' in this connection will depend upon the particular subject-matter ... Since the implementation in practice of measures of secret surveillance of communications is not open to scrutiny by the individuals concerned or the public at large, it would be contrary to the rule of law for the legal discretion granted to the executive"

- or to a judge -

> "to be expressed in terms of an unfettered power. Consequently, the law must indicate the scope of any such discretion conferred on the competent authorities and the manner of its exercise with sufficient clarity ... to give the individual adequate protection against arbitrary interference." (Series A no. 82, pp. 32-33, §§ 67-68)

30. The Government submitted that the Court must be careful not to rule on whether French legislation conformed to the Convention in the abstract and not to give a decision based on legislative policy. The Court was therefore not concerned, they said, with matters irrelevant to Mr and Mrs Huvig's case, such as the fact that there was no requirement that an individual whose telephone had been monitored should be so informed after the event where proceedings had not in the end been taken against him. Such matters were in reality connected with the condition of "necessity in a democratic society", fulfilment of which had to be reviewed in concrete terms, in the light of the particular circumstances of each case.

31. The Court is not persuaded by this argument. Since it must ascertain whether the interference complained of was "in accordance with the law", it must inevitably assess the relevant French "law" in force at the time in relation to the requirements of the fundamental principle of the rule of law. Such a review necessarily entails some degree of abstraction. It is none the less concerned with the "quality" of the national legal rules applicable to Mr and Mrs Huvig in the instant case.

32. Tapping and other forms of interception of telephone conversations represent a serious interference with private life and correspondence and must accordingly be based on a "law" that is particularly precise. It is essential to have clear, detailed rules on the subject, especially as the technology available for use is continually becoming more sophisticated.

Before the Commission (supplementary observations of 17 October 1988, pages 4-7, summarised in paragraph 31 of the report) and, in a slightly different form, before the Court, the Government listed seventeen safeguards which they said were provided for in French law (droit). These related either to the carrying out of telephone tapping or to the use made of the results or to the means of having any irregularities righted, and the Government claimed that the applicants had not been deprived of any of them.

33. The Court does not in any way minimise the value of several of the safeguards, in particular the need for a decision by an investigating judge, who is an independent judicial authority; the latter's supervision of senior police officers and the possible supervision of the judge himself by the Indictment Division (chambre d'accusation) of the Court of Appeal, by trial courts and courts of appeal and, if need be, by the Court of Cassation; the exclusion of any "subterfuge" or "ruse" consisting not merely in the use of telephone tapping but in an actual trick, trap or provocation; and the duty to respect the confidentiality of relations between suspect or accused and lawyer.

It has to be noted, however, that only some of these safeguards are expressly provided for in Articles 81, 151 and 152 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Others have been laid down piecemeal in judgments given over the years, practically all of them after the interception complained of by the applicants (April 1974). Some have not yet been expressly laid down in the case-law at all, at least according to the information gathered by the Court; the Government appear to infer them either from general enactments or principles or else from an analogical interpretation of legislative provisions - or court decisions - concerning investigative measures different from telephone tapping, notably searches and seizure of property. Although logical in itself, such "extrapolation" does not provide sufficient legal certainty in the present context.

34. Above all, the system does not for the time being afford adequate safeguards against various possible abuses. For example, the categories of people liable to have their telephones tapped by judicial order and the nature of the offences which may give rise to such an order are nowhere defined. Nothing obliges a judge to set a limit on the duration of telephone tapping. Similarly unspecified are the procedure for drawing up the summary reports containing intercepted conversations; the precautions to be taken in order to communicate the recordings intact and in their entirety for possible inspection by the judge (who can hardly verify the number and length of the original tapes on the spot) and by the defence; and the circumstances in which recordings may or must be erased or the tapes be destroyed, in particular where an accused has been discharged by an investigating judge or acquitted by a court. The information provided by the Government on these various points shows at best the existence of a practice, but a practice lacking the necessary regulatory control in the absence of legislation or case-law.

35. In short, French law, written and unwritten, does not indicate with reasonable clarity the scope and manner of exercise of the relevant discretion conferred on the public authorities. This was truer still at the material time, so that Mr and Mrs Huvig did not enjoy the minimum degree of protection to which citizens are entitled under the rule of law in a democratic society (see the Malone judgment previously cited, Series A no.

82, p. 36, § 79). Admittedly they suffered little or no harm from this, as the results of the impugned telephone tapping did not "serve as a basis for the prosecution" (see paragraphs 10-12 above), but the Court has consistently held that a violation is conceivable even in the absence of any detriment; the latter is relevant only to the application of Article 50 (art. 50) (see, inter alia, the Johnston and Others judgment of 18 December 1986, Series A no. 112, p. 21, § 42).

There has therefore been a breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention.

B. Purpose and necessity of the interference

36. Having regard to the foregoing conclusion, the Court, like the Commission (see paragraph 67 of the report), does not consider it necessary to review compliance with the other requirements of paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) in this case.

II. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 50 (art. 50)

37. By Article 50 (art. 50),

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the ... Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

In their written observations of February and September 1988 the applicants asked the Commission to "award them just compensation", but before the Court they did not seek either compensation or reimbursement of costs and expenses.

38. As these are not matters which the Court has to examine of its own motion (see, as the most recent authority, the Kostovski judgment of 20 November 1989, Series A no. 166, p. 18, § 46), it finds that it is unnecessary to apply Article 50 (art. 50) in this case.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY

1. Holds that there has been a breach of Article 8 (art. 8);

2. Holds that it is unnecessary to apply Article 50 (art. 50).

CASE OF JACUBOWSKI v. GERMANY

(Application no. 15088/89)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

In the case of Jacubowski v. Germany[*],

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Court, as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr R. RYSSDAL, President,
Mr R. BERNHARDT,
Mr B. WALSH,
Mr R. MACDONALD,
Mr R. PEKKANEN,
Mr M.A. LOPES ROCHA,
Mr L. WILDHABER,
Mr G. MIFSUD BONNICI,
Mr D. GOTCHEV,

and also of Mr M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr H. PETZOLD, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 24 November 1993 and 26 May 1994,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany ("the Government") and by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 19 February and 12 March 1993, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 para. 1 and Article 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47) of the Convention. It originated in an application (no. 15088/89) against Germany lodged with the Commission under Article 25 (art. 25) by a German national, Mr Manfred Jacubowski, on 11 April 1989.

The Government's application referred to Articles 32 and 48 (art. 32, art. 48); the Commission's request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) and to the declaration whereby Germany recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46). The object of the application and of the request was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Article 10 (art. 10) of the Convention.

2. In response to the enquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 para. 3 (d) of the Rules of Court, the applicant stated that he wished to take part in the proceedings and designated the lawyer who would represent him (Rule 30). The lawyer was given leave by the President to use the German language (Rule 27 para. 3).

3. The Chamber to be constituted included ex officio Mr R. Bernhardt, the elected judge of German nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr R. Ryssdal, the President of the Court (Rule 21 para. 3 (b)). On 27 February 1993, in the presence of the Registrar, Mr Bernhardt, the Vice-President, drew by lot the names of the other seven members, namely Mr B. Walsh, Mr R. Macdonald, Mr R. Pekkanen, Mr M.A. Lopes Rocha, Mr L. Wildhaber, Mr G. Mifsud Bonnici and Mr D. Gotchev (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 para. 4) (art. 43).

4. As President of the Chamber (Rule 21 para. 5), Mr Ryssdal, acting through the Deputy Registrar, consulted the Agent of the Government, the applicant's lawyer and the Delegate of the Commission on the organisation of the proceedings (Rules 37 para. 1 and 38). Pursuant to the order made in consequence, the Registrar received the Government's memorial on 16 July 1993 and the applicant's memorial on 19 July. On 30 July the Deputy Secretary to the Commission informed the Registrar that the Delegate would submit his observations at the hearing.

5. On 14 September 1993 the Commission produced the file on the proceedings before it, as requested by the Registrar on the President's instructions.

6. In accordance with the decision of the President, who had also given the Government's representatives leave to address the Court in German (Rule 27 para. 2), the hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 22 November 1993. The Court had held a preparatory meeting beforehand.

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government

Mr J. MEYER-LADEWIG, Ministerialdirigent,
Federal Ministry of Justice, Agent,
Mr A. VON MÜHLENDAHL, Ministerialrat,
Federal Ministry of Justice, Adviser;

- for the Commission

Mr J.A. FROWEIN, Delegate;

- for the applicant

Mr W. MEILICKE, Rechtsanwalt, Counsel,
Mr T. HEIDEL, Rechtsanwalt, Adviser.

The Court heard addresses by Mr Meyer-Ladewig, Mr von Mühlendahl, Mr Frowein and Mr Meilicke, and also replies to its questions.

AS TO THE FACTS

7. Mr Manfred Jacubowski lives in Bonn and is a journalist by profession. At the material time he was working as editor-in-chief of a news agency run by a commercial company, the Deutsche Depeschendienst GmbH, of which he was a founder member and manager. This company filed a petition in bankruptcy (Eröffnung des Konkursverfahrens) on 31 March 1983. A new company, the Deutsche Depeschendienst AG ("the ddp"), was created subsequently, and Mr Jacubowski became its sole director (Vorstand) and editor-in-chief on 3 May 1983.

8. Shortly afterwards, he instituted two different sets of proceedings. In the first (A) he sought to challenge his dismissal and in the second (B) he claimed the right to reply to a press release issued by his employer. At almost the same time, he became involved in a third set of proceedings (C) brought against him under the Unfair Competition Act of 7 June 1909 (Gesetz gegen den unlauteren Wettbewerb - "the 1909 Act").

A. The applicant's dismissal

9. For reasons connected with the applicant's financial management, the ddp's supervisory board (Aufsichtsrat) dismissed him without notice from all his duties on 17 July 1984. On 25 August it sent him another letter of dismissal on the ground that he had allegedly communicated inside information to third persons. Mr Jacubowski challenged the validity of the latter dismissal, which was renewed on 12 October. A further dismissal letter was sent to him on 28 October, after he had distributed a circular letter and newspaper cuttings among fellow professionals on 25 September (see paragraph 14 below). A final dismissal notice, based on new grounds, was sent to him on 12 February 1985.

10. At the end of legal proceedings instituted by the applicant, the Cologne Court of Appeal (Oberlandesgericht) held on 11 October 1988 that he had been validly dismissed on 28 October 1984.

According to the court, the distribution of the circular and cuttings was to be regarded as such a serious breach of Mr Jacubowski's duty of loyalty that it was not possible for the employer to continue his contract, nor could it reasonably be expected. By sending press articles to a large number of influential professionals and endorsing in the circular their objectively unfavourable statements about the ddp's competence and business situation, Mr Jacubowski had knowingly run the risk of causing the company considerable prejudice; such behaviour on the part of a leading employee was unacceptable and therefore not covered by the constitutional right to freedom of expression.

Furthermore, it could not be inferred from the circular that its main aim was to defend the applicant's reputation and honour; it contained neither any reference to the ddp's allegations nor any arguments in Mr Jacubowski's defence. The circular's last paragraph clearly showed that the sole purpose of the mailing had been to disseminate adverse comments on the applicant's former employer and to establish contact with the addressees.

11. Mr Jacubowski challenged this judgment in the Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof) and the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht), but on 26 June and 25 October 1989 respectively those courts declined to accept for adjudication his applications on the ground that they had no prospects of success.

B. The applicant's reply to his employer's press release

12. In the meantime, on 16 August 1984, the agency had published a press release concerning its own reorganisation. In this it also criticised the applicant's management in the following terms:

> "... after the private limited company ... had filed a petition in bankruptcy on 31 March 1983, the public limited company D. - again under the management of Manfred Jacubowski - started up on 20 April 1983 with a capital of one million DM. Jacubowski's unchanged business methods and his inappropriate behaviour to clients, together with the lack of any efficient, reliable editorial management meant that no advantage was taken of the opportunity to make a fresh start, and indeed they led to a loss of clients. Until this spring Jacubowski misled the supervisory board about vital aspects of the developments. In particular, liabilities incurred in the private company's period of existence were transferred to the public company, and this put the D. agency into financial difficulties again. Only the timely intervention of the former finance and accounting director, K., the current director, prevented more serious harm being done, so that today D. is once again on a sound financial footing. On 17 July - the date of the general meeting - Jacubowski was dismissed without notice on account of his business incompetence ... K. was appointed sole director."

13. On 29 August and 4 September 1984 the applicant requested the ddp to publish his reply (Gegendarstellung) to the press release, but without success. He then sought an interim injunction (einstweilige Verfügung) from the Bonn Regional Court (Landgericht), but this was refused on 17 September 1984, on the ground that the proposed reply was not limited to answering the allegations of fact in the press release (gegenteilige Tatsachenbehauptung) but gave a completely new version of the sequence of events (Auflistung), which had not been an issue in the ddp's press release.

On 11 October the Cologne Court of Appeal reversed the Regional Court's judgment and ordered the agency to accede to Mr Jacubowski's request, which it did a month later. In the reply then published the applicant answered in detail all the main accusations contained in the ddp's press release.

C. The proceedings under the Unfair Competition Act

14. In the meantime, on 25 September 1984, Mr Jacubowski had sent thirteen articles from newspapers with large circulations to forty newspaper publishers and newspaper, radio and television journalists who, as clients of the ddp, had received the press release of 16 August (see paragraph 12 above). These articles gave critical accounts of his dismissal, the circumstances surrounding it and the ddp's activities in general. They reported in particular that the ddp's financial position had worsened again since the bankruptcy in April 1983 (see paragraph 7 above) and that some of its clients were preparing to dispense with its services, mainly because of their poor standard and the lack of certain technical facilities.

He had appended a circular letter that read as follows:

> "The enclosed selection - which is inevitably incomplete - of articles on the Jacubowski v. D. case will undoubtedly throw light on certain matters that are still obscure, even though you may already be familiar with one or other of the accounts of the facts. Some of the facts are admittedly reported inaccurately, but they scarcely alter the picture as a whole. The pending court proceedings that members of D.'s staff affected by current developments at the agency and I have brought will ensure that all the details finally become clear.
> I should be glad to be able to meet you in person before too long, in order to discuss not only the past but also future developments in the German 'news market'. I will ask for an appointment in due course."

15. Shortly afterwards, on 11 March 1985, the applicant set up a "public-relations" agency.

16. In the meantime the E. company, which had acquired 25% of the ddp's capital, had applied for a restraining injunction (Unterlassung) against Mr Jacubowski. On 29 January 1986 the Düsseldorf Regional Court refused the application on the ground that E. had no legal interest (rechtliches Interesse).

17. On 11 December 1986, on an appeal by E., joined (Eintritt in den Rechtsstreit) by the agency, the Düsseldorf Court of Appeal refused to grant an injunction prohibiting the applicant from systematically criticising the ddp but ordered that he should desist from any further such mailings, on pain of a fine; it went on to hold that he would have to "compensate the [E. company] for all the damage that the acts [in question] ha[d] caused and [would] cause the [ddp]". The judgment was based on section 1 of the 1909 Act, which provides: "Any person who, in the course of business commits, for purposes of competition, acts contrary to accepted moral standards may be enjoined from further engaging in those acts and held liable for damages."

The court held that in his circular the respondent had repeated in his own name the allegations made in the attached articles. Admittedly, he had sought to correct assertions made about him in the press release that were possibly false but he had acted above all for purposes of competition in the course of business.

The court said, inter alia:

> "... the respondent sent his circular of 25 September 1984 for purposes of competition in the course of business.
> An action is said to be for purposes of competition where it is on the face of it apt to promote one person's sales to the detriment of another's and where it is carried out with a corresponding intention, although that intention need not be the only or the essential motive for the action (settled case-law, see Federal Court of Justice in GRUR 1952, p. 410 - Constanze I; Baumbach-Hefermehl, Wettbewerbsrecht, 14th edition, intro. to Unfair Competition Act, marginal notes 209 et seq., with further references).
> Remarks which, according to the witness Leisner, the respondent made several times show that even before sending out the circular the latter had planned to set up his own news agency after he left the employ of the [ddp]. The distribution of the circular referring to the enclosed adverse newspaper reports on, inter alia, the [ddp]'s activities as a news agency to current clients of the [ddp] and/or potential clients of both the [ddp] and the news agency that the respondent proposed to set up was apt to enhance the competitive position of the respondent's company and impair that of the [ddp]. Admittedly, the respondent's company did not then exist. However, for it to be held that there is a competitive relationship, it is sufficient that traders have, or at least will in the future have, the same potential clientele. This was the case as regards the respondent's company and the [ddp] ...
> Behind the respondent's conduct there was furthermore a ... competitive intention.
> Experience shows that the fact that activities are objectively apt to enhance one's own competitive position at the expense of another's is not the only basis for presuming a competitive intention ...
> In the present case such an intention is also apparent from the other facts that emerged during the proceedings. According to what he told the witness Leisner, the respondent had already been planning for a long time to set up his own agency in the event of his leaving the [ddp]'s service. In the middle of July 1984 the [ddp] had removed him from the post of director and in the middle of August [it] had terminated his contract of employment. The circular and newspaper cuttings were sent out about a month later to selected addressees, including - and this is not disputed - important clients of the [ddp]. A few months later the respondent's new agency was set up. This chronological sequence of events is a further indication of the respondent's intention to lower the [ddp] in the esteem of potential clients of both parties and thereby make it easier for his own agency to gain a foothold in the market in preparation for competition with the [ddp].
> The last paragraph of the circular likewise makes the competitive intention clear. It shows that the respondent intended to provoke discussion not only with a view to correcting assertions concerning himself that were possibly false, but also, at the very least, in order to promote his future activities as a competitor of the [ddp]. It is not apparent what else the respondent could have meant when he wrote that he wished to discuss 'not only the past but also future developments in the German "news market"'. By taking up these unfavourable comments on the [ddp] and distributing them anew as his own statements and assessments, he unnecessarily handicapped the [ddp] as a > competitor. In this connection it does not matter whether the unfavourable factual statements concerning the [ddp]'s activities were accurate and whether they justified the unfavourable assessments accompanying them. This is because even true statements may only be used to disparage a competitor where the person making them has sufficient reason to link his own competitive position with disparagement of the competitor and provided that the criticism does not in nature or degree exceed what is necessary (Federal Court of Justice in GRUR 1968, pp. 262 and 265 - Fälschung). It does not appear that there was any such reason to disparage the [ddp] by taking up the unfavourable comments on its activities in the Horizont article."

In short, Mr Jacubowski had needlessly handicapped (behinderte unnötig) a competitor and accordingly infringed section 1 of the 1909 Act.

18. On 26 November 1987 the Federal Court of Justice declined to accept for adjudication an appeal on points of law (Revision) by the applicant on the ground that it had no prospects of success.

19. Thereupon Mr Jacubowski applied to the Federal Constitutional Court, complaining in particular of an infringement of freedom of expression (Article 5 para. 1, first sentence, of the Basic Law). On 4 October 1988 the Federal Constitutional Court declined to accept the complaint for adjudication on the ground that it was unfounded.

It noted, firstly, that the prohibition in issue related solely to the applicant's chosen method of circulating his information. The information was, moreover, of a business nature, but this did not mean that it ceased to be an opinion whose expression was protected by Article 5 para. 1, first sentence, of the Basic Law. This provision therefore had to be weighed against section 1 of the 1909 Act, on which the prohibition had been founded.

The court went on:

> "In order for it to be determined how [freedom of expression and fair competition] are to be related to each other in the case of damaging comment by a competitor, the following points are decisive, having regard to earlier decisions of the Constitutional Court in cases involving a call for a boycott (see Constitutional Court Decisions [vol.] 62, 230 at 244 et seq., with further references).
> In the first place, the motives of the person concerned and, linked to them, the aim and purpose of the comment are crucial. If the comment is motivated not by personal interests of an economic nature, but by concern for the political, economic, social or cultural interests of the community, if it serves to influence public opinion, the appeal will probably qualify for the protection of Article 5 para. 1 of the Basic Law, even if private and, more particularly, economic interests are adversely affected as a result. Conversely, the importance of protecting the latter interests is the greater, the less the comment is a contribution to public debate on a major issue of public concern and the more it is immediately directed against those interests in the course of business and in pursuit of a self-serving goal (see Constitutional Court Decisions [vol.] 66, 116 at 139) such as improving one's own competitive position ...

> In the light of these facts, the distribution of the applicant's circular can hardly be regarded as an attempt to influence public opinion. Rather it was designed almost exclusively to promote his private business interests and to secure or improve his competitive position in the news market.
> It follows ... that the prejudice caused to the complainants by the distribution of the circular was disproportionate to the applicant's aim, stated in it, of clarifying his relationship with the ddp and 'current developments at the agency'. In principle, freedom of expression takes precedence over rights (Rechtsgüter) protected by ordinary laws in so far as the statement is part of the ongoing discussion of questions of public importance which is absolutely fundamental to a free democratic system. This condition is not satisfied where the statement is made to ensure that certain business interests prevail over others in the context of business competition. The fact that an interest is made to prevail by means which are in principle protected under Article 5 para. 1 of the Basic Law cannot therefore justify subordinating to it the other interest, which is in turn entitled to the protection of an ordinary law that places restrictions on freedom of expression, in this case section 1 of the Unfair Competition Act (see Constitutional Court Decisions [vol.] 62, 230 at 247 et seq.). It follows that the finding by the Court of Appeal that the applicant's distribution of the circular was contrary to accepted moral standards is not incompatible with Article 5 para. 1 of the Basic Law."

The Constitutional Court added that the fact that the impugned circular followed a press release directed against him which had been issued by the ddp (see paragraph 12 above) did not invalidate this conclusion, since in order to claim the protection of the Constitution, his response would have had to be intended to influence public opinion, which it was not.

20. On 30 November 1988 the Düsseldorf Regional Court dismissed a claim for damages brought by the ddp in reliance on the Court of Appeal's judgment of 11 December 1986 (see paragraph 17 above). It held that the ddp had insufficiently substantiated its claim and had failed to prove any causal link between the alleged damage and the distribution of Mr Jacubowski's circular.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

21. Mr Jacubowski applied to the Commission on 11 April 1989. Relying on Article 10 (art. 10) of the Convention, he complained of a breach of his right to freedom of expression.

22. The Commission declared the application (no. 15088/89) admissible on 3 December 1991. In its report of 7 January 1993 (made under Article 31) (art. 31), it expressed the unanimous opinion that there had been a violation of Article 10 (art. 10). The full text of the Commission's opinion is reproduced as an annex to this judgment[*].

AS TO THE LAW

ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 10 (art. 10)

23. The applicant complained of the court order of 11 December 1986, later confirmed on 26 November 1987 by the Federal Court of Justice, prohibiting him from continuing to distribute his circular of 25 September 1984 (see paragraphs 17-18 above). He alleged a violation of Article 10 (art. 10), which provides:

> "1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article (art. 10) shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.
> 2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary."

The order of 11 December 1986 had, he said, prevented further distribution of his reply of 25 September 1984 to a press release in which his former employer had openly put his professional abilities in question. He had tried unsuccessfully to have his reply published by the ddp itself, by applying firstly to the agency and then to the Bonn Regional Court (see paragraphs 12-13 above). These attempts having failed, he had had to resort to other means, without awaiting the judgment of the Cologne Court of Appeal, since his reputation was at stake. In any case, there had been nothing extreme about the circular in issue, which had merely approved in a few lines the substance of the attached articles from newspapers that had already been widely distributed.

24. The Government challenged it. In issuing an injunction consequent upon an act of unfair competition, the Düsseldorf Court of Appeal had done no more than exercise a discretion in commercial matters, as it was empowered to do under the doctrine of the margin of appreciation. Although it could not be regarded as the only possible one, its decision appeared at the very least defensible in the light of the wording of the circular of 25 September 1984, in which Mr Jacubowski had first of all broadly endorsed the criticisms of the ddp in the press cuttings he reproduced and then, in the last paragraph, expressed the intention, thinly disguised, of establishing business relations between the recipients of the circular and the new agency he was preparing to set up. Rather than defend himself, he had therefore clearly denigrated a competitor the better to be able to poach clients, and this was, moreover, shown by the appreciable difference in content between the circular and the reply eventually published after the judgment of 11 October 1984 (see paragraph 13 above).

In addition, the national courts had shown moderation in going no further than prohibiting any redistribution of the circular of 25 September 1984; the applicant still had complete freedom to voice his opinions in any other way.

25. The Court notes that the impugned measure was, without a doubt, an interference with Mr Jacubowski’s exercise of his freedom of expression. The fact that, in a given case, that freedom is exercised other than in the discussion of matters of public interest does not deprive it of the protection of Article 10 (art. 10) (see, mutatis mutandis, the Casado Coca v. Spain judgment of 24 February 1994, Series A no. 285-A, p. 16, para. 35).

The interference was "prescribed by law" and pursued a legitimate aim under the Convention, namely "the protection of the reputation or rights of others" (see, mutatis mutandis, the Barthold v. Germany judgment of 25 March 1985, Series A no. 90, pp. 21-23, paras. 44-51, and the markt intern Verlag GmbH and Klaus Beermann v. Germany judgment of 20 November 1989, Series A no. 165, pp. 17-19, paras. 27-31). It consequently remains to be ascertained whether the interference can be regarded as having been "necessary in a democratic society".

26. The Court has consistently held that a certain margin of appreciation is to be left to the Contracting States in assessing whether and to what extent an interference is necessary, but this margin goes hand in hand with European supervision covering both the legislation and the decisions applying it, even those given by an independent court.

Such a margin of appreciation appears essential in commercial matters, in particular in an area as complex and fluctuating as that of unfair competition. The Court must confine its review to the question whether the measures taken at national level are justifiable in principle and proportionate (see the markt intern Verlag GmbH and Klaus Beermann judgment previously cited, pp. 19-20, para. 33).

27. In the instant case the requirements of protecting the reputation and rights of others must be weighed against the applicant's freedom to distribute his circular and the newspaper cuttings.

All three of the national courts that considered the merits of Mr Jacubowski's course of action were unanimous in regarding it as an act of unfair competition in breach of "accepted moral standards", as in their view it had been mainly designed to draw the ddp's clients away to the new press agency that he set up shortly afterwards. Their judgments were based principally on the circular's wording, especially its last paragraph, in which, so they held, the sender clearly expressed his wish to establish personal business contacts with the addressees. The domestic courts further relied on testimony that, even before sending his circular, the applicant had planned to found his own news agency (see paragraphs 10, 15, 17 and 19 above). The evidence put before the Court does not undermine that conclusion.

28. All three domestic courts took into account the fact that Mr Jacubowski had been personally attacked in a press release issued by his former employer. However, in view of the aforementioned circumstances, they attached less importance to it than to what they regarded as the cardinal feature, namely the essentially competitive purpose of the exercise. In the reply he eventually published Mr Jacubowski responded in detail to the main accusations contained in the ddp's press release; but the content of his reply was substantially different from that of his circular (see paragraph 13 above).

29. Lastly, it should be emphasised that the impugned court order went no further than to prohibit distribution of the circular; the Düsseldorf Court of Appeal refused the ddp's application for an injunction prohibiting Mr Jacubowski from systematically criticising the ddp (see paragraph 17 above). He thus retained the right to voice his opinions and to defend himself by any other means. The interference complained of therefore cannot be regarded as disproportionate.

30. Accordingly, it cannot be said that the German courts overstepped the margin of appreciation left to national authorities and no breach of Article 10 (art. 10) has been made out.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

Holds by six votes to three that there has been no breach of Article 10 (art. 10).

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGES WALSH, MACDONALD AND WILDHABER

This is an important case in which admittedly the requirements of protecting the reputation and rights of others (of potential commercial competitors) must be weighed against the applicant's freedom to distribute his circular of 25 September 1984 along with the appended thirteen newspaper articles.

In our opinion, the majority judgment makes it appear as though this case involves simply a choice between two conflicting principles of equal weight. It relies too heavily on the findings of fact by the national courts. In so doing, it gives an excessive significance to the doctrine of the margin of appreciation.

In our view, freedom of expression is the guiding principle in the instant case. Exceptions to this fundamental principle must be interpreted narrowly (see, mutatis mutandis, the Sunday Times v. the United Kingdom (no. 1) judgment of 26 April 1979, Series A no. 30, p. 41, para. 65). The findings of fact by the national courts must be assessed with the proper respect due to them, but without excessive deference. It is crucial that the margin of appreciation which is left to national legislatures and courts must remain subject to an effective European supervision.

In the instant case, the applicant had been harshly attacked by his employer in a press release in which his professional abilities had been seriously questioned and he himself had been held responsible for the collapse of the Deutsche Depeschendienst GmbH. Shortly afterwards his dispute with the ddp culminated in his being dismissed without notice from all his duties. He accordingly had an obvious and pressing interest in trying to protect his impugned reputation without delay, especially as he was seeking a new job in the same sector and had to wait almost two months for his right to reply to be recognised and another month for his reply to be published (see paragraphs 12-13 of the judgment). There was a parallel public interest to learn whether the applicant would defend himself against his former employer.

In this situation, the applicant sent his circular of 25 September 1984. At the time he sent it, some six weeks had already elapsed since the ddp had issued its press release of 16 August 1984 (see paragraphs 12 and 14 of the judgment). He still did not know whether the courts would eventually grant him a right of reply. Given this situation, there was nothing extreme or improper in the circular at issue. On the contrary, he merely approved in a few lines the substance of thirteen articles from newspapers with a large circulation, which were already in the public domain. Subsequently, the Düsseldorf Court of Appeal ruled that the applicant should desist from any further such mailings, on pain of a fine, and that he would have to pay compensation for all actual or potential damage suffered by the ddp as a consequence of his action (see paragraph 17 of the judgment). In effect, the German Unfair Competition Act was interpreted so as to make unlawful the distribution of widely circulated newspaper articles, at a time when the applicant had no way to re-establish his impugned reputation and did not know whether any such way would be available to him in the foreseeable future. Thus the Düsseldorf Court of Appeal accepted that he had acted, among other reasons, in order to correct assertions about him that were "possibly false" (see paragraph 17 of the judgment).

Admittedly, in the eyes of the national courts, the injunction in issue was founded on the fact that in addition to defending himself the applicant had above all sought to "disparage" his former employer - "as a competitor" - to the recipients of the circular (see paragraph 17 of the judgment). The recipients of the circular, however, were among those who had also received the ddp's press release of 16 August 1984, in which the applicant had been attacked and to which he had finally secured the right to reply on 11 October 1984 (see paragraphs 12-13 of the judgment). The motives which prompted the applicant's action - protecting his reputation and securing his future career - appear both legitimate and intertwined. They are so intertwined, in fact, that he could not be expected to justify himself without making reference to both his past and his future professional career. Moreover, as we have stressed, he did not do so in an extreme or improper fashion, since he confined himself to sending out newspaper cuttings, to which he added only a few comments. To put it succinctly, he distributed newspaper articles which were already in the public domain, and added that they gave, on the whole, a fair picture.

We fail to see how it could have been proportionate to prevent him from doing this. The competitive element cannot be regarded as having played a preponderant role in the particular circumstances of the case. To accept in this case a preponderance of the competitive element amounts to reducing the principle of freedom of expression to the level of an exception and to elevating the Unfair Competition Act to the status of a rule. We cannot agree that this constitutes the proper way of exercising a European supervision.

Having deliberated in private on 26 January and 27 June 1996,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

Notes by the Registrar

1. The case is numbered 24/1995/530/616. The first number is the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court in the relevant year (second number). The last two numbers indicate the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court since its creation and on the list of the corresponding originating applications to the Commission.

2. Rules of Court B, which came into force on 2 October 1994, apply to all cases concerning the States bound by Protocol No. 9 (P9).

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") and by the Government of the Kingdom of Norway ("the Government") on 1 March and 3 April 1995 respectively, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 para. 1 and Article 47 of the Convention (art. 32-1, art. 47). It originated in an application (no. 17383/90) against Norway lodged with the Commission under Article 25 (art. 25) by a Norwegian citizen, Ms Adele Johansen, on 10 October 1990.

The Commission's request and the Government's application referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48); the request also referred to the declaration whereby Norway recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46). The object of the request and of the application was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Articles 6, 8 and 13 of the Convention (art. 6, art. 8, art. 13).

2. In response to the enquiry made in accordance with Rule 35 para. 3 (d) of Rules of Court B, the applicant stated that she wished to take part in the proceedings and designated the lawyer who would represent her (Rule 31).

3. The Chamber to be constituted included ex officio Mr R. Ryssdal, the elected judge of Norwegian nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr R. Bernhardt, the Vice-President of the Court (Rule 21 para. 4 (b)). On 5 May 1995, in the presence of the Registrar, Mr Bernhardt drew by lot the names of the other seven members, namely Mr R. Macdonald, Mr I. Foighel, Mr R. Pekkanen, Mr A.N. Loizou, Mr J.M. Morenilla, Mr P. Kuris and Mr U. Lohmus (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 para. 5) (art. 43).

4. As President of the Chamber (Rule 21 para. 6), Mr Bernhardt, acting through the Registrar, consulted the Agent of the Government, the applicant's lawyer and the Delegate of the Commission on the organisation of the proceedings (Rules 39 para. 1 and 40). Pursuant to the orders made in consequence on 6 June and 13 November 1995, the Registrar received the applicant's and the Government's memorials on 13 and 20 November 1995. On 20 December 1995 the Secretary to the Commission indicated that the Delegate did not wish to reply in writing.

5. On various dates between 10 January and 19 June 1996 the Registrar received a number of documents from the Government and the applicant, including particulars on the latter's Article 50 (art. 50) claims.

6. On 10 and 12 January 1996, the Registrar received from the Government a request that the memorials and appendices thereto not be made accessible to the public and that the hearing on 23 January be held in camera. The applicant and the Delegate of the Commission submitted their comments on 16 and 17 January. On 19 and 22 January the Government and the applicant accepted that the hearing be held in public subject, inter alia, to the non-disclosure of the identity of certain persons, including the applicant's daughter.

7. In accordance with the President's decisions, the hearing took place in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 23 January 1996, in public, in accordance with the terms indicated above. The Court had held a preparatory meeting beforehand.

There appeared before the Court:

(a) for the Government

Mr T. Stabell, Assistant Attorney-General
(Civil Matters), Agent,
Mr F. Elgesem, Attorney, Attorney-General's Office
(Civil Matters),
Ms T. Smith, Assistant Director-General, The Royal
Ministry of Child and Family Affairs,
Ms K. Ofstad, Adviser, The Royal Ministry of Child and Family Affairs, Advisers;

(b) for the Commission

Mrs G.H. Thune, Delegate;

(c) for the applicant

Mrs S. Moland, advokat, Counsel,
Mrs K. Næss, advokat, Adviser,
Mr A. Salomonsen, Assistant.

The Court heard addresses by Mrs Thune, Mrs Moland, Mrs Næss and Mr Stabell.

8. On 26 June 1996 the President decided that the Government's and the applicant's memorials, subject to changes to the former, be made accessible to the public but that those appendices thereto which related to the domestic proceedings not be made so accessible (see paragraph 6 above).

On the same date, he also decided to authorise the filing of the applicant's letters of 16 and 22 January 1996, with their enclosures, but to refuse that of the letter and enclosures received on 19 January (Rule 39 para. 1, third sub-paragraph, of Rules of Court B).

AS TO THE FACTS

I. Particular circumstances of the case

A. Background

9. The applicant, who was born at Laksevåg near Bergen, left home when she was 16. In 1977, when she was 17 years old, she gave birth to her son C. and they became dependent on assistance from the social welfare authorities. From 1980 onwards the applicant cohabited with a man who mistreated her and C. He was convicted of drug offences in 1983 and spent two years in prison. On many occasions the social welfare authorities assisted the applicant in the upbringing of C., but considerable problems as well as friction arose between those authorities and the applicant. In August 1988 C. began to receive treatment at the Child Psychiatric Department of Haukeland Hospital in Bergen. In January 1989 he was admitted to a special school adapted to his needs.

10. On 14 November 1989 C., who was then 12 years old, was provisionally taken into care under section 11 of the Child Welfare Act (Barnevernsloven) no. 14 of 17 July 1953 ("the 1953 Act"; see paragraph 33 below), as the circumstances of the case disclosed a danger to his health and development. The police assisted the child welfare authorities in enforcing the decision. After spending the period from November 1989 to early January 1990 at the Child Psychiatric Department of Haukeland Hospital, C. was placed in a children's home.

According to a statement of 10 January 1990 by the Chief Physician, Ms Guri Rogge, and the Deputy Chief Physician, Mr Arne Hæggernes, the applicant's and C.'s situation had been "rather chaotic" throughout the period during which they had been in contact with the hospital. When faced with difficulties, the applicant had broken off her contact with the system which had been set up to assist her. Her way of life had had a detrimental effect on C. and the fact that he had changed schools had created much insecurity.

11. In mid-November 1989 the applicant, who was pregnant, left

Bergen for Oslo. On 23 November she was given accommodation at the Oslo Crisis Centre, an institution for women who had been victims of domestic ill-treatment.

On the following day she went for an antenatal check-up at Markveien Medical Centre in Oslo. She stated to the doctor concerned that she had been taking valium, vival and paralgin during her pregnancy and that she had hardly eaten during the last fortnight. Because of her pregnancy and her state of health she was subsequently referred to Ullevål Hospital in Oslo. The doctors there considered her physical and mental state of health to be very poor, but refrained from contacting the child welfare authorities, fearing that she might injure herself if they did so.

B. Public-care measures in respect of the applicant's second child

12. On 7 December 1989 the applicant gave birth to her daughter S. In view of the applicant's difficult situation and the problems with regard to the upbringing of C., the child welfare authorities (barnevernet) at Røa in Oslo were contacted. At a meeting on 8 December 1989 between the applicant and her lawyer and the child welfare authorities the applicant's and S.'s situation was discussed.

On 13 December 1989 the Chairperson of the Client and Patient Committee of Røa, district 24 (klient- og pasientutvalget i bydel 24, Røa - "the Committee"), decided to take S. provisionally into care under section 11 of the Child Welfare Act (see paragraph 33 below) on the grounds that the applicant, because of her physical and mental state of health, was considered incapable of taking care of her daughter. The Chairperson considered that the child would be put at risk if the decision were not implemented immediately.

In reaching the above decision, the Chairperson had regard to the decision by the social welfare authorities in Bergen to take the applicant's son provisionally into care and their intention of doing so on a permanent basis, as well as their concern for the situation of the baby whom they considered taking into care immediately after birth. The Chairperson also took into account information provided by Markveien Medical Centre, by Ullevål Hospital and by those who had attended the meeting on 8 December 1989.

The applicant did not lodge any appeal against this provisional care decision.

13. On 19 December 1989, in accordance with the above decision, S. was placed in a short-term foster home linked to the Aline Child Care Centre. The applicant was allowed to visit her twice a week at the Centre. She did not challenge this access arrangement, which was not based on any formal decision.

14. The question of public care was brought before the Committee on 29 December 1989. The Committee obtained an expert opinion dated 13 February 1990 from Mr Knut Rønbeck, psychologist, which contained the following conclusion on the applicant's ability to take care of S.:

> "... On the surface, she appears to be a well-organised, friendly and charming young woman. On meeting her, it may therefore initially be difficult to understand that the child welfare authorities and mental health authorities have had such serious problems in achieving cooperation with her for the benefit of her son. If one approaches her more closely, however, a clear picture emerges of a woman with major unsolved mental problems which strongly affect her social functioning and her ability to care [for a child]. The problems are expressed in the form of anxiety and depression. Since her early youth, she has functioned fairly marginally from a social point of view. For many years, she lived with a man who she herself believes abused both her and her son, but without being able to break out of this relationship.

... Having regard to [the applicant's] history in respect of taking care of her child and due to her lack of knowledge of/denial of her own faults vis-à-vis her own and [C.'s] problems I regret that, as the expert in this case, I am not hopeful about her future ability to take care of her children, although she undoubtedly loves them and is attached to them. In addition to these points [I] must add that [the applicant] now realises that what the future holds in store is the prospect of being a mother on her own in Oslo where she lacks support from a social environment.

The child in this case [S.] is in a period of her life where the attachment to preferably stable persons ought to develop. It is of decisive importance for her personal development that she now gets the opportunity to attach herself to persons whom she may regard during her adolescence as stable and secure parents."

15. The applicant requested the appointment of a second expert. Since the child welfare authorities refused her request, the applicant herself engaged a psychologist, Mrs Lise Valla, who submitted her opinion on 17 April 1990. This concluded:

"... I cannot find that there are sufficient reasons for depriving [the applicant] of the care of her children [C.] and [S.].

In my view [the applicant] shows responsibility when it comes to considering the children's adolescence - and she is also a person who may learn from the mistakes she has made.

It is clear, however, that [the applicant] will need some practical assistance in the future. It is desirable that both she and [C.] receive therapy in order to manage the emotional gaps from the bad years - and I would consider it reasonable that the public authorities should provide this. Furthermore, [the applicant] ought to receive support so that she can improve her level of education."

The above opinion was based on available documents and meetings with the applicant and her son.

16. In the meantime the child welfare authorities at Røa continued their examination of the case. Their report to the Committee of 30 March 1990, based on, among other material, talks with the applicant, Mr Rønbeck's opinion and the case files of the child welfare authorities in Bergen and Oslo, stated that if S. were to be reunited with her mother, the child's mental health would be subjected to harm or serious danger and she would live under such conditions as described in section 16 (a) of the Child Welfare Act (see paragraph 32 below). The report recommended that S. be taken into compulsory care pursuant to section 19 of the Act, such measures being necessary in view of the applicant's inability to provide satisfactory care for her daughter and of the fact that the preventive care measures taken under section 18 of the Act in respect of her son C. had not been effective (see paragraphs 33-34 below). The report further recommended that S. be placed in a foster home with a view to adoption. Scientific experience in recent years had shown that remaining a long-term foster child instead of being adopted was disadvantageous for the child: the foster parents could at any time cancel the agreement or the parents might institute proceedings in order to be reunited with the child. Adoption had the advantage of clarifying the situation and of creating security and stability for the child and the adoptive parents. Moreover, the report stated that, in order to secure the child's development and its relationship with the persons who would permanently assume the care, it would be appropriate for the authorities to deprive the applicant of all her parental responsibilities (foreldreansvaret) pursuant to section 20 of the Act (see paragraph 35 below).

As regards the question of access, the report added:

"While the girl has been at the Child Care Centre [the applicant] has had access to her twice a week for one hour. Following transfer of the girl to an approved foster home with a view to adoption it is recommended that access be refused and the address kept secret.

[The applicant] has previously tried to disappear with her son in order to avoid the social welfare authorities and she did not inform the social welfare office/authorities when her son ran away from the children's home at Bergen in February 1990 in order to stay with her. Therefore, it is considered not unlikely that she would intervene in a disturbing manner in the foster home, and perhaps also try to take the girl with her.

It is considered important for this child to have quiet and stability in the new environment where she is placed. The social welfare authorities will accordingly recommend that [the applicant] be refused contact with the child and that the child's new address be kept secret.

Today the girl has no relationship with her mother and, therefore, it will not be necessary to phase out the access arrangement before the girl is transferred to the foster home."

17. On 2 May 1990 the Committee, chaired by a Mrs Justice Inger Kristine Moksnes of the Oslo City Court (byrett), examined the case. The applicant, assisted by a lawyer, called three witnesses and the child welfare authorities called one witness. Mr Rønbeck, the appointed expert, was heard, but not Mrs Valla, the expert engaged by the applicant herself. As the costs in respect of Mrs Valla's appearance were not covered by the State, she was not able to attend the hearing.

A request by the applicant's counsel to be assisted by Mr Reidar Larssen, a psychiatrist, as a representative was rejected by the Committee on the ground that the applicant was already represented. He was, however, allowed to appear as a witness and to attend the hearing thereafter with no right to address the Committee.

The opinions of Mr Rønbeck and Mrs Valla and the child welfare authorities' report of 30 March 1990 were available to the Committee.

On the basis of the information and evidence submitted to it the Committee decided on 3 May 1990, by four votes to two, to take S. into care; to deprive the applicant of her parental responsibilities (which as a result were transferred to the child welfare authorities); to place S. in a foster home with a view to adoption; to refuse the mother access as from the moment of the child's placement in the foster home and to keep the latter's address secret. In its decision the Committee stated:

> "With reference to the reports which have been submitted and the submissions made during this meeting, the Committee's majority, Mrs Ryberg, Mr Clausen, Mr Aasland and Mrs Moksnes, finds that [the applicant] has very little chance of acting satisfactorily in taking care of her daughter. The majority stresses that [the applicant] has had sole responsibility for the maintenance and care of her son, born in 1977. This task she has not managed and the social welfare authorities have taken this child into care. The [applicant] has received special assistance since 1977 and has lived off social security benefits since her son was 10 years old. She has only worked for short periods. She has not lived with the fathers of her two children but had for several years a cohabitant who ill-treated her and her son, both physically and mentally. He was part of the drugs scene in Bergen, as she was at one time. He is now in prison, serving a sentence for drug dealing. She has herself used drugs and alcohol and has had intoxication problems. It is unclear how big a problem this has been, but the Committee assumes that she has no intoxication problems at present. It is not quite clear, however, whether the problem has been solved also for the future.
> [The applicant] now maintains that she has broken with her former friend and her previous life. She has moved to Oslo and now appears to have a different lifestyle than the one in Bergen. She has made a few social contacts but these are dependent on circumstances and cannot be of decisive importance. She has vague plans for the future, although she expresses a wish to train as a nursing auxiliary.
> However, the majority is of the opinion that the decisive factor in this case must be that, according to the appointed expert, [the applicant] has serious unsolved mental problems which impair her social skills and her ability to take care [of children]. Although her son has had considerable mental problems she has not been able to cooperate with the authorities and has not understood the necessity of giving his needs priority over her own. She has not been able to understand that the boy needed help and has not been willing to accept assistance either. The majority fears that this attitude may lead to her daughter's needs not being met either if she remains with [the applicant]. The majority finds that the daughter will live in such conditions that the requirements of section 16 (a) of the Child Welfare Act are fulfilled.

In connection with taking her son into care a number of measures have been tried, and the majority therefore finds that measures under section 18 would be ineffective. The requirements for care under section 19 are accordingly fulfilled. The majority also finds that the requirements pursuant to section 20 of the Child Welfare Act are fulfilled. [The applicant] is not particularly motivated to accept treatment and there is little prospect of change in this respect. The majority accordingly finds that it would be in the interest of the child to be placed in a foster home with a view to adoption. The next few years will be crucial for the child and it is preferable that she should feel certain that she will not be moved. It is of decisive importance for the girl that she can now be attached to stable persons whom she may regard as stable and secure parents in her adolescence.

This is of decisive importance for the development of her personality. Therefore she ought not to be exposed to a foster-home agreement which may be revoked. She also ought to form close relationships with a small number of people and therefore ought to remain at a secret address pursuant to section 19 of the Child Welfare Act, so that [the applicant] no longer has access to her daughter when she is placed with foster parents."

18. The minority of the Committee found that the applicant's situation in life had improved since her removal from Bergen to Oslo and that she should thus be given the opportunity to take charge of the care of her daughter while staying at a special institution for that purpose.

19. After her daughter's birth the applicant moved to a flat in Oslo. During the spring of 1990, her son C. twice ran away from the children's home in Bergen to join her in Oslo and, on the second occasion, she indicated that she would not comply with the care decision. As C. did not want to return to Bergen and as the applicant considered that the social welfare authorities there did not do enough to help him, she decided to let C. stay in Oslo. She managed to get him admitted to a school there and she contacted a psychiatrist for support.

20. On 24 April 1990 it was decided to take C. permanently into care but on 19 June that care decision was lifted, notwithstanding the fact that his care situation was still considered to be detrimental to his physical and psychological development, a matter which continued to be of great concern to the authorities. The conflict between the authorities, on the one hand, and the applicant and her son, on the other, had made it impossible to implement the care decision without it being even more detrimental to the boy. The decision of 19 June was subsequently confirmed by the Hordaland County Governor (Fylkesmannen) on 13 March 1991. C. has lived with the applicant since May 1990.

C. Applicant's appeals against the care measures in respect of S.

21. On 25 May 1990 the applicant's lawyer received the minutes of the Committee's meeting of 2 May 1990 leading to its decision of 3 May 1990. As regards the taking into public care and the deprivation of her parental responsibilities, the applicant lodged an appeal on 28 May 1990 against the decision of 3 May with the County Governor for Oslo and Akershus. As far as the restrictions on access were concerned, she requested the County Governor to give the appeal suspensive effect (oppsettende virkning). She submitted that continuing access was decisive for maintaining contact between her and the child pending the appeal. The applicant also sent a copy of her appeal to the Committee, which on 28 June 1990 decided to uphold the decision of 3 May 1990 and to refer the case to the County Governor.

22. On 31 July 1990 the County Governor, referring to section 42 of the Public Administration Act (Forvaltningsloven) of 10 February 1967 decided not to give the appeal suspensive effect on the grounds that it would be in the girl's best interests if the decision of 3 May 1990 to terminate access were implemented as from the moment the child was placed in the foster home.

S. was placed with foster parents on 30 May 1990. The applicant has not had access to or seen her daughter since.

23. The applicant pursued her appeal against the care decision and the deprivation of parental responsibilities. As she was informed that her appeal to the County Governor of 28 May 1990 would remain pending for four to five months, she instituted proceedings in the Oslo City Court. She asked the court to set aside the Committee's decision of 3 May 1990, maintaining inter alia that it was crucial that her case be examined speedily, given that she had been refused access to her daughter. On 24 October 1990 the City Court dismissed (avviste) the application as such actions could only be instituted subsequent to a decision in the matter by the County Governor. On 17 January 1991 the High Court (Lagmannsretten) rejected an appeal by the applicant on the ground that the County Governor had in the meantime decided the case (see paragraph 24 below) and there was therefore no reason to deal with the appeal. A further appeal to the Supreme Court (Høyesterett) was rejected on 7 March 1991.

24. On 9 November 1990, after a meeting with the applicant and her lawyer, the County Governor for Oslo and Akershus upheld the Committee's decision concerning care and parental responsibilities.

25. On 13 November 1990 the applicant instituted proceedings against the Ministry of Child and Family Affairs (Barne- og familiedepartementet) in the Oslo City Court under Chapter 33 of the Code of Civil Procedure (tvistemålsloven, Law no. 6 of 13 August 1915 -see paragraph 38 below), asking for the care decision to be lifted and to be reunited with her daughter. In the alternative she requested that her parental responsibilities be restored.

On 20 December 1990 the defendant Ministry submitted observations in reply.

26. After consulting the parties, the City Court appointed two experts on 1 February 1991 to evaluate the applicant's ability to take care of her daughter and the consequences of revoking the care decision and/or restoring the applicant's parental responsibilities. The experts were requested to submit their opinions by 15 March 1991, which they did.

On 8 February 1991 the parties were informed that the case had been set down for 2 April 1991.

27. The City Court, sitting with one specially appointed judge, Mr Idar E. Pettersen, heard the case between 2 and 5 April 1991. Having heard the applicant, represented by counsel, a representative of the defendant Ministry, eleven witnesses and the two appointed experts, the City Court, in a judgment of 16 April 1991, upheld the taking into care and the deprivation of parental responsibilities. It gave the following reasons:

> "According to the Child Welfare Act the starting-point is that a child should grow up with his or her natural parents. The interests of the child may, however, warrant exceptions being made to this general rule as it cannot be interpreted so as to allow the child to be subjected to considerable harm.
> In reviewing a compulsory measure imposed under the Child Welfare Act the courts must as a starting-point rely on the circumstances obtaining at the time of passing judgment. The possible negative effects on the child of being returned from the foster parents to the natural parents must be taken into consideration. Regard must also be had to the fact that the Child Welfare Committee [barnevernsnemnda] and the County Governor may lawfully maintain a decision to take the child into care even if the circumstances on which the decision was based have later changed to such an extent that the conditions for intervention pursuant to the Child Welfare Act are no longer fulfilled.
> After hearing the evidence the Court finds that such material conditions [ytre betingelser] obtain as would allow the applicant today to give her daughter, born on 7 December 1989, an acceptable upbringing. In this respect there has been an improvement in the situation since the child welfare authorities took over the care of the daughter. [The applicant] now appears to be permanently settled in Oslo together with the father of her oldest child who also lives with her. It appears quite clear that the applicant has great concern for the child who has been taken from her. There can hardly be any doubt that it is her intention to arrange things as far as possible in order to assume the care of the child, if she were to be returned to the mother, to the best of her abilities. These being the facts in the present case, the Court must examine whether returning the child from the foster parents to her natural mother would entail a real danger of harm to the child.
> We have before us a case where the mother had the care taken away from her shortly after birth. The mother has since had very little contact with the child and is now a stranger to her.
> The experts appointed by the City Court are both in agreement that the child would be in a critical situation if returned. On this point, Mrs Seltzer, psychologist, states in her expert

> 'She is today in the middle of a phase of development of her personal autonomy which, in order for her to develop without complications, depends on secure conditions and stable emotional continuity. In the short term there can be no doubt that the child would react with sorrow and emotion if she were now to be removed from her foster home. In the long run it is likely that if she were removed at this stage of her development she would carry with her into her future life an experience of insecurity vis-à-vis other people, including those who represent close and dear relations.'

The experts stress that a return in these circumstances would entail a particular risk. This is so because [the child] has twice already in her short life experienced a removal from her natural mother, first shortly after birth and then at the age of seven months when she was moved from the [Child Care Centre] to her present foster parents. She would therefore be particularly sensitive to further changes.

The child now lives under secure and stimulating conditions with her foster family and, as the situation appears to the Court, it is considered that the foster parents can give her a safer upbringing than she would receive from her natural mother. Furthermore, in the Court's view there is a real danger that the mother will not be able to deal adequately ... with the return of her child in a crisis. The mother's history and previous contact with the public-support system indicate that when, in such a pressing and threatening situation, she needs help from that system, she will defend herself with fear and aggression. It was in particular Mr Reigstad, psychologist, who emphasised this. During his oral explanations to the Court he has maintained the views which he expressed in his written opinion but has also in his oral explanations submitted further details concerning the mother's personality. He is of the opinion that the mother makes a projective identification. This means that she has divided her world into two parts, one with friends and another with enemies. Towards those whom she recognises as friends she shows a secure and nice side of herself, whilst to those whom she considers to be against her she reacts with deep suspicion, fear and aggression. In Mr Reigstad's opinion, in such a situation the mother will consider the public-support system to be against her and will meet it with a correspondingly negative attitude. This will place an additional burden on the child and harm her permanently in the form of a split character.

The expert witnesses called by the mother have all had a very good impression of her. This goes for Mr Terje Torgersen, doctor, Mrs Lise Valla, psychologist, and Mr Reidar Larsen, psychiatrist. A common element for these persons is, however, that none of them have had a patient-doctor relationship with [the applicant]. Those who have been appointed by the child welfare authorities and the Court, Mr Knut Rønbeck, psychologist, Mrs Wenche Seltzer, psychologist and Mr Ståle Reigstad, psychologist, have all found the mother to be more complex. The Court considers that the appointed experts, on the basis of their terms of reference and their contacts with [the applicant] and others, have had the best opportunity to evaluate her as a person. The Court has therefore considerable hesitations about departing from [their assessment]. The Court has examined the [assessment] in the light of the other submissions in the case and, not least, the basic principles of the Act on the lifting of a care decision.

In the Court's view the experts have done a very thorough job. The conclusions are clear and appear well-founded. Their statements confirm and elaborate the overall impression which the Court has formed of the case. The Court, therefore, considering the case as a whole, will base its decision on the experts' assessment. In the Court's opinion, there is nothing in the case to suggest that it should depart from their assessment.

In the light of the above the Court finds that, because of the likely reactions of the child to changes to her environment, it would be a particularly demanding task for the mother to assume the care of her. In view of what is known about the mother's present situation and her history it is unlikely that she will be able to cooperate with the social assistance provided by society without friction. Accordingly, having regard to the concrete circumstances of the case as a whole, the Court reaches the conclusion that the County Governor's, and thus also the social welfare authorities', decision to take the child into care should be upheld.

The next question is whether the decision should be limited to the taking into care or should also cover parental responsibilities pursuant to section 20 of the Child Welfare Act. In this respect the Court points out that it is clear that section 20 has been applied with a view to adoption. The foster parents wish to adopt [the child] and in view of the information available to it the Court assumes that, unless the present decision is limited to taking into care, adoption will be the end result.

The Court considers that for it to apply ... section 20, it must be satisfied that this is necessary in order to secure proper care for the child. What is required will depend on the purpose of depriving the parents of their parental responsibilities and the situation in general. If the aim is to free the child for adoption, very weighty reasons are required. Section 20 may be applied with a view to adoption only in very special circumstances. It must be a condition that the parents will be unable to give the child appropriate care and that this would be a permanent situation. When parental responsibilities are taken away with a view to adoption the question arises whether the child and the natural parents should be permanently deprived of contact with each other, with the consequences for reunification which that entails.

In the Court's opinion a condition for the transfer of parental responsibilities with a view to adoption is that it is obvious that the child cannot in the foreseeable future be reunited with the parents. In the present case, both appointed experts have recommended to the Court that the child's placement in the foster home be made permanent. One of [them], [Mr] Reigstad, states in this respect:

> When considering this question in the present case we find, in addition to the general consideration that in such cases adoption is always an advantage for the child, concrete and real reasons militating in favour of adoption.
> The applicant's problems are in my view long-standing and well established in her overall character. They can be documented back to 1977 and have been almost constantly present during her entire adult life. It follows that she is unlikely to solve them in the foreseeable future and that the situation therefore has a certain permanent character.
> In addition, were the applicant to be given access to the foster home she would in all likelihood destroy the home's security and make it unsuitable as a foster home for the child. This must be seen in the light of the crusade the applicant has led over the last years against the child care authorities and of the fact that she has clearly stated that her aim is to get her daughter back. In addition, the fact that she earlier hid her son from the child care authorities in Bergen and was supported in this by her lawyers in Oslo on the whole gives very little reason for optimism in respect of her future cooperation with the foster home.
> I have therefore reached the conclusion that it would be in the interest of the daughter to remain in the foster home and that permission be granted to adopt her so that [the foster parents] also acquire the parental responsibilities.
> Having regard to my terms of reference, my conclusion is accordingly:
> Conclusion
> A. If the daughter were to be reunited with her natural mother there is a considerable danger that she would not recover from her separation crisis, which would cause her permanent harm. There are also objective grounds for doubting that the mother would be capable of ensuring that the daughter receives such necessary medical and psychological assistance as she needs. For these reasons I cannot recommend to the Court that the child and her natural mother be reunited.
> B. I assume that the aim of letting a natural mother keep her parental responsibilities in respect of a child placed in a foster home is to allow her access to the home and to participate in, or take, important decisions regarding the child. In the circumstances, access to the foster home or even lifting of the secrecy of the home's address would destroy the security of the foster parents and make the home unsuitable as a foster home. In both the short and the long run this would be detrimental to the child.

C. In my view the best solution from the child's point of view would be to deprive the mother of her parental responsibilities and to allow the foster family to adopt the child. This would secure the child a stable and appropriate upbringing and would bind the child to its new family without reservation.'

In this regard, the other expert, [Mrs] Seltzer, states:

`If the child remains in the foster home and the foster parents continue to act as the [child's] foster parents, I consider that it would be impractical and possibly complicating if a person other than the foster parents were to assume parental responsibilities. I consider also that it would be in the best interests of the child for her to belong, fully, formally and uninterruptedly to one place. In addition one cannot disregard the fact that an arrangement dividing the care and the parental responsibilities may create insecurity and represent a potential source of conflict between the adults, with the child in between. In certain circumstances it can also be difficult to manage the daily care in a satisfactory manner if the parental responsibilities are assumed by another party. If the Court nevertheless decides to split the daily care and parental responsibilities, this requires good cooperation between the parties, something which at present cannot be taken for granted having regard to the fact that the foster parents and the natural mother have not met each other. I recommend that the daily care and the parental responsibilities be entrusted to those who have the daily care of the child.'

Both experts, in their oral submissions to the Court, have stated that their views have been strengthened by the submissions made during the examination of the case.

As regards the question whether the mother would be able to give the child proper care on a permanent basis, [Mr] Reigstad states that the mother lacks today and will lack in the foreseeable future the necessary ability to do so. [Mr] Rønbeck was of the same opinion when he submitted his report in connection with the case. [Mrs] Seltzer for her part is of the opinion that today the mother is probably capable, in favourable and clear circumstances, of taking care of the child but the mother's situation is uncertain. She suggests therefore that it would be in the child's interests to stay where she is.

As the Court understands the expert evidence, it is obvious that the mother could not properly take care of the child on a permanent basis. Also as regards the question of parental responsibilities, the Court attaches decisive weight to the experts' assessment. The Court further agrees with the experts that allowing the [applicant] access to the foster home would entail a real danger of conflict between the foster parents and the natural mother. The Court refers in this connection to what has been said about the mother's ways of reacting. It follows that there are strong and real factors militating in favour of adoption. The special interests which might weigh against adoption in the present case cannot in the opinion of the Court be decisive. The Court here points out that the natural mother is a stranger to the child, who, as far as the Court has been informed, has not had any particular contact with the mother. After a general, concrete evaluation the Court has accordingly reached the conclusion that the decision concerning the transfer of parental responsibilities shall also be maintained."

28. On 28 May 1991 the applicant lodged an appeal with the Supreme Court. The defendant Ministry filed a reply on 19 June 1991. On 23 August 1991 the applicant was requested to submit further observations by 6 September 1991, which she did on 5 September 1991. On 19 September 1991 the Appeals Committee of the Supreme Court (Høyesteretts Kjæremålsutvalg) refused leave to appeal.

D. Subsequent developments

29. In the spring of 1991 the applicant moved to Nørreballe, Denmark. She now lives there with C.'s father. C. now lives near Copenhagen where he works. The applicant gave birth to a second daughter on 14 December 1991. According to the Danish authorities this child has developed well. A second son was born in 1993. The applicant's daughter S. is still living with her foster parents. No decision concerning her adoption has yet been taken.

A report of 30 January 1994 by Mrs An-Magritt Aanonsen, psychologist, which is favourable both to the applicant and to the foster parents, concluded:

"1. Both mother and child today seem to be doing well. The mother is cohabiting in a steady relationship with the father of three of her four children. She seems to give satisfactory care to her children and copes well with her everyday situation and has managed to handle problems which have arisen without any special help.

The child has formed a strong primary attachment to her foster parents who provide her with good conditions for growing up and who appear genuinely fond of her and very committed.

2. In the previous section, I discussed the consequences of establishing a right of contact. Given the child's situation today it is not desirable to establish a right of access at present unless there is some change in the conditions of care placement. It is desirable for the child to have the greatest possible continuity and stability, something that is best achieved by permanent placement with her present carers.

3. I have also discussed above the consequences of establishing a right of access with respect to the child's care position and the importance this will have for her development. I have indicated a type of arrangement that it would be possible to introduce without any consequences for the care situation.

In conclusion, I would stress that one thing we know today is that it is important for a child's development for him or her to have stability, continuity and carers who take responsibility for and are fond of it and help it affirm itself as a person. It is in the child's interest that the carers should be confident that it is they who take decisions about important events in the child's life. This must be taken into account if a right of access or visit is established."

II. Relevant domestic law

A. The 1953 Child Welfare Act

1. Compulsory care measures

30. The public-care measures at issue in the present case were based on provisions set out in the Child Welfare Act of 17 July 1953 ("the 1953 Act"), which was replaced by new legislation on 1 January 1993 (see paragraphs 41-45 below).

31. The principle underlying the 1953 Act, which was applicable in this case, was that, generally speaking, it was in the best interests of a child for it to be cared for by its natural parents. If the child had been taken into care, the best solution would in principle be for the natural parents to remain in contact with it and retain parental responsibilities.

32. Under section 16 (a) of the 1953 Act, protective measures could be taken if a child lived in such conditions that its physical and mental health was likely to be impaired or was seriously endangered. It was established case-law (see the Supreme Court's judgment of 6 November 1986, Norsk Retstidende ("NRt") 1986, p. 1189, and judgment of 21 January 1987, NRt 1987, p. 52) that such a measure could be taken not only where such harm had materialised but also where there was a clear risk of harm. Consequently, under this provision, a child could be taken into care immediately after birth.

33. Section 18 of the Act provided for several preventive measures (forebyggende tiltak), such as placing the child's home under supervision, furnishing financial assistance, ensuring placement in a kindergarten or a school, or providing care and treatment.

If such preventive measures were considered to be ineffective or had proved to be of no avail and leaving the child in its current situation pending care proceedings would entail a risk of harm to the child, section 11 of the Act empowered the Health and Social Board (helse- og sosialstyret), hereinafter "the Board", or if necessary its chairperson, to take a child into care on a provisional basis. Where such an interim measure had been taken, the case had to be brought before the Board, often represented by its Client and Patient Committee. Provided that the requirements of section 16 were fulfilled, the Board or the Committee could decide to take the child into public care (overta omsorgen) pursuant to section 19 of the Act. In practice the child was usually transferred to a suitable child care centre or a foster family.

34. The 1953 Act did not contain any provision expressly empowering the authorities to restrict the parents' access to their child where the child had been taken into public care. However, according to an authoritative interpretation of section 19 by the Ministry of Justice, Department of Legislation (Justisdepartementets lovavdeling), the Board or the Committee could also determine the extent of the parents' right of access and whether or not the address of the foster family should be kept secret (see the Department's statements of 28 October 1964 and 14 March 1966).

35. Where the Board or the Committee had decided to take a child into care in accordance with the above rules they could also decide, pursuant to section 20 of the Act, to deprive the natural parents of their parental responsibilities. Section 20 did not set out the circumstances in which such a measure could be taken but, according to the Supreme Court's case-law, it should be supported by weighty reasons. A decision to deprive the natural parents of their parental responsibilities could not be taken unless the long-term consequences of alternative arrangements were considered (see the Supreme Court's judgments of 20 December 1990, NRt 1990, p. 1274, and of 23 May 1991, NRt 1991, p. 557). Measures under section 20 were often taken with a view to adoption by the foster parents. Adoption represented a final break in the legal relations between the child and its natural parents.

The notion of parental responsibilities, which is defined in Chapter 5 of the Child Act (Barnelova) no. 7 of 7 April 1981, comprises two elements: firstly a duty of care (omsut og omtanke), and secondly a duty and a right to decide, within certain limits, for the child in its personal matters (personlege tilhøve) (sections 30 to 33). The latter include decisions on the child's place of residence, general education, religious and civic education, medical and dental treatment, consent to marriage, adoption and employment (Lucy Smith and Peter Lødrup in Barn og Foreldre, 4th edition, Oslo 1993, pp. 67 and 71). In the present judgment the right of the parent to decide on the child's personal matters is referred to as "parental rights".

36. Compulsory care measures under the 1953 Act were to be lifted when the child was 21 years of age or when there were no longer any reasons to maintain the measures (section 48).

2. Administrative and judicial remedies against compulsory care measures

37. A decision by the Board or the Committee to take a child into care, to deprive the parents of their parental responsibilities or to restrict access under the 1953 Act could be appealed against to the County Governor by any person affected by the measure (sections 52 and 54 of the Act). Orders on access could in addition be appealed against to the Ministry of Child and Family Affairs (section 53 (2) of the 1953 Act).

38. Decisions by the County Governor under the 1953 Act regarding care decisions and the deprivation of parental responsibilities, but not access, could form the subject of an appeal to the City or District Court under a special procedure provided for in Chapter 33 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court had jurisdiction to review all aspects of the case (Article 482).

An appeal against a judgment by the City or District Court lay directly to the Supreme Court (Article 485). This was to give priority to the kind of cases to which Chapter 33 of the Code applied, as is illustrated by Article 478 of the Code which provided that the proceedings must be dealt with speedily.

39. On the other hand, appeals to the courts against decisions by the County Governor restricting access were governed by the ordinary procedure laid down in Chapter 30 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the general principles of judicial review of administrative decisions. Such review covered not only questions of fact and of law but also to some extent the exercise of administrative discretion (for a more detailed description, see the E. v. Norway judgment of 29 August 1990, Series A no. 181-A, pp. 18-19, paras. 40-42).

40. If an appeal by the natural parents to have the care terminated had been rejected, they were not entitled to apply for fresh review proceedings until one year after the prior decisions had become final (section 54 of the 1953 Act). However, no such right to review applied if the child had been adopted in the meantime, as adoption meant a definite break between the child and its natural parents.

B. The Child Welfare Services Act 1992

41. On 1 January 1993 the 1953 Act was replaced by the Child Welfare Services Act no. 100 of 17 July 1992 ("the 1992 Act"). Among other reforms the 1992 Act introduced a new adjudicating body in the child welfare administration, namely the County Social Welfare Board ("the County Board"), which was established in accordance with the Social Services Act (sosialtjenesteloven) no. 81 of 13 December 1991. The major reason for this change was to reinforce the legal protection of the parents and the child.

Like the 1953 Act, the 1992 Act stresses that "crucial importance shall be attached to framing measures which are in the child's best interest" (section 4-1).

42. Although the 1992 Act contains more detailed provisions, the conditions for compulsory care measures and deprivation of parental responsibilities are essentially the same as those that applied under the 1953 Act. The Supreme Court's case-law predating the 1992 Act remains applicable.

43. Under the 1992 Act the question of adoption of a child who has been taken into care is a separate issue. If the parents object to adoption, such a measure cannot be taken unless the County Board gives its consent. Under the more detailed provisions of the 1992 Act (section 4-20 (2) and (3)), the County Board may only give its consent if the parents will be permanently unable to provide the child with reasonable care, or if removing the child may lead to serious problems for him or her because of his or her attachment to the persons and the environment where he or she is living. In addition, an adoption must be in the child's best interest and the prospective adoptive parents must have been the child's foster parents and have shown themselves fit to bring up the child as their own. According to the preparatory works this implies that consent to adoption should not be given unless the child has lived in the foster home for some time.

44. Unlike the 1953 Act, the 1992 Act contains in section 4-19 (1) a provision to the effect that both the child and the parent have a right of access unless the County Board decides otherwise in the child's interests. The preparatory works of the new Act emphasise the importance of contact between the child and its parents.

45. The decisions of the County Board may be contested before the courts under the special provisions of Chapter 33 of the Code of Civil Procedure (section 9-10 of the Social Services Act). The system of judicial review of public-care decisions is amended on two major points.

Firstly, whereas judicial review of care decisions and deprivation of parental responsibilities under the 1953 Act presupposed a prior decision by the County Governor, an appeal against such decisions taken by the County Board under the 1992 Act lies directly to the City Court.

Secondly, whilst the special Chapter 33 review did not apply to access restrictions under the 1953 Act, it now does when such restrictions have been imposed under the 1992 Act (section 7-1).

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

46. In her application to the Commission of 10 October 1990 (no. 17383/90), Ms Johansen complained that there had been a violation of her right to respect for family life as guaranteed by Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8) on account of the order to take her daughter into public care, the deprivation of her parental rights, the termination of her access to her daughter, the excessive length of the proceedings and their lack of fairness. She also invoked Article 6 of the Convention (art. 6) (right to a fair hearing within a reasonable time). In addition, she complained that, contrary to Article 13 (art. 13), she had not been afforded an effective remedy in respect of her complaint under Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8).

47. On 13 October 1993 the Commission declared the application admissible. In its report of 17 January 1995 (Article 31) (art. 31), the Commission expressed the opinion that there had been no violation of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8) with regard to the taking of her daughter into care and the maintenance in force of the care decision concerned (unanimously); that there had been a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) as regards the decision depriving the applicant of her parental rights and access (by eleven votes to two); that no separate issue arose either under Article 6 (art. 6) (by twelve votes to one) or Article 13 (art. 13) (unanimously). The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the two partly dissenting opinions contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to this judgment (1).

FINAL SUBMISSIONS MADE TO THE COURT

48. At the hearing on 23 January 1996 the Government, as they had done in their memorial, invited the Court to hold that there had been no violation of Article 6 or 8 of the Convention (art. 6, art. 8).

49. On the same occasion the applicant reiterated her request to the Court stated in her memorial to find that there had been a breach of Articles 6 and 8 (art. 6, art. 8).

AS TO THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 OF THE CONVENTION (art. 8)

50. The applicant alleged that the taking into care of her daughter S., the refusal to terminate the care and the deprivation of her parental rights and access gave rise to violations of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8), which provides:

> "1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

51. The Government disputed the above contention. The Commission considered that there had been no violation with regard to the taking into public care and the refusal to terminate the care, but that there had been a violation with regard to the deprivation of the applicant's parental rights and access.

A. Was there an interference with the applicant's right to respect for family life?

52. The Court recalls that the mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constitutes a fundamental element of family life and that domestic measures hindering such enjoyment amount to an interference with the right protected by Article 8 (art. 8) (see, amongst others, the McMichael v. the United Kingdom judgment of 24 February 1995, Series A no. 307-B, p. 55, para. 86). The impugned measures, as was not disputed, evidently amounted to interferences with the applicant's right to respect for her family life as guaranteed by paragraph 1 of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8-1). Such interference constitutes a violation of this Article (art. 8) unless it is "in accordance with the law", pursues an aim or aims that are legitimate under paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) and can be regarded as "necessary in a democratic society".

B. Were the interferences justified?

1. "In accordance with the law"

53. It was undisputed before the Commission and, with one exception, before the Court that the impugned measures had a basis in national law and, to that extent, the Court is satisfied that such was the case.

54. The exception was an allegation by the applicant - in her written pleadings dealing with the necessity of the interference - to the effect that the provisional taking into care of her daughter had failed to fulfil the condition as to risk of harm in section 11 of the Child Welfare Act 1953 (see paragraphs 12 and 33 above).

55. The Government maintained that the measure was in accordance with Norwegian law.

56. The Court sees no reason to doubt that the provisional taking into care of the daughter had a basis in Norwegian law; it observes that the applicant, although she could have done so, did not appeal against that measure but only challenged the subsequent decision to take into care on a permanent basis, which measure was upheld by the City Court as being lawful.

57. Before the Commission the applicant had argued that as the relevant law (see paragraphs 32-35 above) was framed in vague terms its effects were unforeseeable and it thus failed to satisfy one of the quality requirements implied by the expression "in accordance with the law" (see, for instance, the Margareta and Roger Andersson v. Sweden judgment of 25 February 1992, Series A no. 226-A, p. 25, para. 75).

58. The Commission and the Government disagreed. They considered that the law in question was rather broad in its terms but that it was impossible to formulate legal rules with absolute precision in this field. Also, since the imposition of measures under that law was to a large extent subject to judicial review, there were important safeguards against arbitrariness.

59. Before the Court the applicant did not pursue her submission that the relevant domestic law was not foreseeable for the purposes of paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2).

2. Legitimate aim

60. Those who appeared before the Court agreed that the relevant domestic law was clearly intended to protect the interests of children and that there was nothing to suggest that it was applied for any other purpose.

61. The Court is satisfied that the contested measures were aimed at protecting the "health" and "rights and freedoms" of the applicant's daughter and thus pursued legitimate aims within the meaning of paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2).

3. "Necessary in a democratic society"

62. The applicant disputed that the interference with her right to respect for family life had been "necessary". In this connection she challenged a number of aspects of the domestic decisions, namely (1) the decision-making process before the Committee (see paragraphs 14-17 above); (2) the merits of the taking into care of her daughter S. and the maintenance in force of the care decision; (3) the merits of the deprivation of her parental rights and access; and (4) the length of the entire proceedings.

63. The Government contested the applicant's allegations. The Commission disagreed on the first and second points but shared the applicant's view as regards the third point, taking into account the argument concerning the length of the proceedings.

64. In determining whether the impugned measures were "necessary in a democratic society", the Court will consider whether, in the light of the case as a whole, the reasons adduced to justify them were relevant and sufficient for the purposes of paragraph 2 of Article 8

(art. 8-2) (see, inter alia, the Olsson v. Sweden (no. 1) judgment of 24 March 1988, Series A no. 130, p. 32, para. 68).

In so doing, the Court will have regard to the fact that perceptions as to the appropriateness of intervention by public authorities in the care of children vary from one Contracting State to another, depending on such factors as traditions relating to the role of the family and to State intervention in family affairs and the availability of resources for public measures in this particular area. However, consideration of what is in the best interest of the child is in any event of crucial importance. Moreover, it must be borne in mind that the national authorities have the benefit of direct contact with all the persons concerned (see the Olsson v. Sweden (no. 2) judgment of 27 November 1992, Series A no. 250, pp. 35-36, para. 90), often at the very stage when care measures are being envisaged or immediately after their implementation. It follows from these considerations that the Court's task is not to substitute itself for the domestic authorities in the exercise of their responsibilities for the regulation of the public care of children and the rights of parents whose children have been taken into care, but rather to review under the Convention the decisions that those authorities have taken in the exercise of their power of appreciation (see, for instance, the Hokkanen v. Finland judgment of 23 September 1994, Series A no. 299-A, p. 20, para. 55).

The margin of appreciation so to be accorded to the competent national authorities will vary in the light of the nature of the issues and the seriousness of the interests at stake (see the Sunday Times v. the United Kingdom (no. 1) judgment of 26 April 1979, Series A no. 30, pp. 35-37, para. 59). Thus, the Court recognises that the authorities enjoy a wide margin of appreciation in assessing the necessity of taking a child into care. However, a stricter scrutiny is called for both of any further limitations, such as restrictions placed by those authorities on parental rights and access, and of any legal safeguards designed to secure an effective protection of the right of parents and children to respect for their family life. Such further limitations entail the danger that the family relations between the parents and a young child are effectively curtailed.

It is against this background that the Court will examine whether the measures constituting the interferences with the applicant's exercise of her right to family life were "necessary".

(a) The decision-making process

65. The applicant complained that the hearing before the Committee had been inadequate. Not only had the authorities been over-represented, but their expert, Mr Rønbeck, had had a more favourable position at the hearing than the psychologists whom the applicant had wanted to be present: Mrs Valla had not been summoned and Mr Larssen had not been allowed to address the Committee (see paragraph 17 above). In addition, the fact that the hearing had continued until late at night had adversely affected the applicant's possibility of presenting her views in a fully satisfactory manner.

66. The Court notes that the Committee took its decision of 3 May 1990 after hearing the views of the applicant and her counsel. Mr Rønbeck had moreover been appointed with the applicant's agreement and it was only after he had presented his opinion that she requested the appointment of another psychologist, Mrs Valla. Although the latter was not heard directly by the Committee, her report was submitted to it (see paragraph 17 above).

In the circumstances, there is nothing to suggest that the decision-making process leading to the adoption of the impugned measures by the Committee was unfair or failed to involve the applicant to a degree sufficient to provide her with the requisite protection of her interests (cf. the W. v. the United Kingdom judgment of 8 July 1987, Series A no. 121, pp. 28-29, paras. 64-65; and the above-mentioned McMichael judgment, pp. 55 and 57, paras. 87 and 92). In addition, it is to be noted that, before deciding the applicant's appeals, the County Governor and the City Court heard the applicant and her counsel (see paragraphs 24 and 27 above). The Court therefore agrees with the Government and the Commission that the procedure did not give rise to a breach of Article 8 (art. 8).

(b) The merits of the impugned measures

(i) The taking into care and the refusal to terminate the care

67. As to the taking into care, the applicant maintained that the Committee's majority had wrongly relied on Mr Rønbeck's assessment (see paragraphs 14 and 17 above). In concluding that she was incapable of assuming the care of her daughter, he had over-emphasised the importance of her difficult past in Bergen. The minority had correctly based its opinion on the assessment by the psychologist Mrs Valla, who, in the light of the improvements in the applicant's situation after she moved to Oslo, had considered her suitable as a carer, as was confirmed by the subsequent opinions of two other psychologists, Mrs Seltzer and Mrs Aanonsen (see paragraphs 18, 27 and 29 above). Indeed, even the City Court had found her suitable when adjudicating the case (see paragraph 27 above).

According to the applicant, any uncertainty as to her ability to care for her daughter could have been reduced by resorting to preventive care measures. For instance, the authorities could have acceded to the applicant's request for a place in a mother-and-child unit, which would have enabled her to prove she was capable of assuming care while under the supervision of the child welfare authorities. Any lack of cooperation between her and the child welfare authorities in Bergen had stemmed from her extremely difficult situation while living there and did not mean that she would not cooperate with the authorities in Oslo; on the contrary she had declared her willingness to do so.

68. Also the County Governor, in rejecting the applicant's appeal against the care decision, had in her view attached excessive weight to her past in Bergen and too little to the improvements in her ability to provide care after her move to Oslo.

69. She further maintained that the City Court's ruling had the undesirable consequence that a new-born baby placed in a foster home could never be reunited with his or her natural parent even though the latter, as here, was deemed capable of assuming care. Since care measures were in principle to be temporary in character, the authorities should instead have sought gradually to return the child to the applicant.

70. The Government and the Commission were of the view that both the taking into care and the maintenance in force of the care decision were "necessary" within the meaning of paragraph 2 of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8-2).

71. The Court observes that the Committee Chairperson's decision of 13 December 1989 to take the applicant's daughter S. provisionally into care was taken on the grounds that the applicant, in view of her physical and mental state at the time, was deemed unable to provide satisfactory care for her daughter, who would thus be at risk if she were to remain with the applicant. The Chairperson had regard not only to statements by medical officers in Oslo but also to those of the child welfare authorities in Bergen, which, after several years' concern for the applicant's son C., had provisionally taken him into care and had contemplated such a measure also with regard to the daughter S. immediately after her birth (see paragraph 12 above).

Furthermore, in deciding to take S. into care on a permanent basis, the Committee attached decisive weight to Mr Rønbeck's assessment that the applicant suffered from serious unsolved mental problems impairing her social skills and her ability to take care of children. It considered that, if S. were to remain with the applicant, it was likely that the child would live under such conditions as would damage her physical and mental health. Having failed to understand her son C.'s need for care, the applicant had opposed attempts by the authorities to assist her in this matter. The fact that preventive care measures in respect of her son had been ineffective suggested that this kind of measure would also be unsuccessful with regard to her daughter. There was little reason to believe that the applicant would be motivated to accept treatment. The child was at a stage of her development where it was crucial that she should become attached to stable and secure persons without fearing that she would be moved. In these circumstances, the Committee considered, it was in her best interests to be taken into care (see paragraphs 14 and 17 above).

Moreover, the County Governor's decision of 9 November 1990 upholding the Committee's decision to take S. into care was based essentially on the same reasons (see paragraph 24 above).

72. In its decision of 16 April 1991 the City Court found that the material conditions (ytre betingelser) had improved to a point where the applicant was able to provide S. with a satisfactory upbringing but held nevertheless that the measure should remain in force. It considered that, since S. had been taken into care shortly after birth, had had very little contact with her mother and had already been moved twice, returning her to the mother would entail a particular risk to her development. As the child was in the middle of a phase of development of personal autonomy, it was crucial that she live under secure and emotionally stable conditions, such as obtained in the foster home. Moreover, at this critical stage of her upbringing, there was a real danger that the applicant would be unable to deal adequately with the child's reactions to the change of environment (see paragraph 27 above).

73. In the light of the foregoing, the Court is satisfied that the taking of the applicant's daughter S. into care and the maintenance in force of the care decision concerned were based on reasons which were not only relevant but also sufficient for the purposes of paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2). The measures were supported by painstaking and detailed assessments by the experts appointed by the Committee and the City Court. The finding of fact being primarily a matter for the national authorities, the Court will not substitute its views for theirs as to the relative weight to be given to the expert evidence adduced by each party (see paragraph 64 above). It considers that in taking the above care measures the national authorities acted within the margin of appreciation afforded to them in such matters. Accordingly, these measures did not constitute a violation of Article 8 (art. 8).

(ii) The deprivation of parental rights and access

74. In the applicant's and the Commission's opinion, taking into care should in principle be a temporary measure to be discontinued as soon as circumstances permit. The deprivation of the applicant's parental rights and access had a permanent character and could only be considered "necessary" within the meaning of Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2) if supported by particularly strong reasons. However, the applicant's state of health had not been such that she would have been permanently unable to care for her daughter. The argument that the applicant might disturb the calm and stable foster-home environment could not be decisive as access arrangements could have been implemented outside the foster home. Having regard to the improvements in the applicant's situation and the irreversible effects which the deprivation of the applicant's parental rights and access had on her enjoyment of family life with her daughter, the measures could not be said to be justified.

75. In addition, the applicant disputed that the deprivation of her parental rights and access were in her daughter's interest. On the contrary, the mother's contact with her child during the period preceding her placement with the foster parents had been positive and such contact could have contributed to a stable development of the child's identity had it been allowed to continue. The applicant further stressed that the measures had not been based on proper and repeated reviews of the specific circumstances of her case but on a general and prevailing view that adoption offered better prospects for the child's welfare than long-term fostering. Having been taken primarily to facilitate adoption, the measures had seriously and permanently prejudiced the applicant's interests by depriving her of any prospects of being reunited with her daughter.

76. The Government argued that in cases such as the present one the necessity test to be applied under Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8), rather than attempting to strike a "fair balance" between the interests of the natural parent and those of the child, should attach paramount importance to the best interests of the child, a principle which was firmly rooted not only in the laws of the Council of Europe member States but also in the Organisation's own policies (see Council of Europe: Committee of Ministers Resolution (77) 33 on placement of children, adopted on 3 November 1977; 16th Conference of European Ministers of Justice, Lisbon, 21-22 June 1988, Conclusions and resolutions of the conference, pp. 5-6). In this connection the Government referred also to the preamble to the 1996 European Convention on the Exercise of Children's Rights and to Articles 3, 9 paras. 1 and 3, and 21 of the 1989 United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. In any event, so the Government submitted, Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8) should not be interpreted so as to protect family life to the detriment of the child's health and development.

77. In the instant case, they maintained, the reasons mentioned above for the taking into care and for maintaining the care decision concerned in force all suggested that it was necessary to place the child permanently in a foster home. There was strong scientific evidence indicating that the placement was more likely to be successful if the child was adopted by the foster parents.

Reuniting the applicant with her daughter would have required extensive preparation presupposing good cooperation between all the parties involved. However, the applicant had shown an extremely hostile attitude towards the child welfare authorities in Bergen and had actively obstructed their implementation of the care decision in respect of her son by attempting to take him with her to Oslo. The competent authorities had therefore considered that there was a danger that she might disturb the daughter's development in the foster home and try to abduct her if given access. In these circumstances, having regard to their margin of appreciation, the relevant authorities were entitled to think that it was necessary for the protection of the child's best interests to deprive the applicant of her parental rights and access.

78. The Court considers that taking a child into care should normally be regarded as a temporary measure to be discontinued as soon as circumstances permit and that any measures of implementation of temporary care should be consistent with the ultimate aim of reuniting the natural parent and the child (see, in particular, the above-mentioned Olsson (no. 1) judgment, p. 36, para. 81). In this regard, a fair balance has to be struck between the interests of the child in remaining in public care and those of the parent in being reunited with the child (see, for instance, the above-mentioned Olsson (no. 2) judgment, pp. 35-36, para. 90; and the above-mentioned Hokkanen judgment, p. 20, para. 55). In carrying out this balancing exercise, the Court will attach particular importance to the best interests of the child, which, depending on their nature and seriousness, may override those of the parent. In particular, as suggested by the Government, the parent cannot be entitled under Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8) to have such measures taken as would harm the child's health and development.

In the present case the applicant had been deprived of her parental rights and access in the context of a permanent placement of her daughter in a foster home with a view to adoption by the foster parents (see paragraphs 17 and 22 above). These measures were particularly far-reaching in that they totally deprived the applicant of her family life with the child and were inconsistent with the aim of reuniting them. Such measures should only be applied in exceptional circumstances and could only be justified if they were motivated by an overriding requirement pertaining to the child's best interests (see, mutatis mutandis, the Margareta and Roger Andersson judgment cited above, p. 31, para. 95).

79. The question whether the deprivation of the applicant's parental rights and access was justified must be assessed in the light of the circumstances obtaining at the time when the decisions were taken and not with the benefit of hindsight. That question must moreover be considered in the light of the reasons mentioned in paragraphs 71 to 73 above for taking the daughter into care and for maintaining the care decision in force.

80. It is also relevant that it was in the child's interest to ensure that the process of establishing bonds with her foster parents was not disrupted. As already mentioned, the girl, who had been taken into care shortly after birth and had already spent half a year with temporary carers before being placed in a long-term foster home, was at a stage of her development when it was crucial that she live under secure and emotionally stable conditions. The Court sees no reason to doubt that the care in the foster home had better prospects of success if the placement was made with a view to adoption (see paragraphs 17 and 27 above). Furthermore, regard must be had to the fact that the child welfare authorities found that the applicant was not "particularly motivated to accept treatment" (see paragraph 17 above) and even feared that she might take her daughter away; for instance, she had on one occasion tried to disappear with her son and on another occasion she had failed to inform the authorities that he had run away from the children's home to join her (see paragraph 16 above).

81. In the Court's opinion, the above considerations were all relevant to the issue of necessity under paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2). It remains to be examined whether they were also sufficient to justify the Committee's decision of 3 May 1990 to cut off the contact between the mother and the child (see paragraphs 17 and 22 above).

82. In the first place, it must be observed that during the period between the birth of the applicant's daughter on 7 December 1989 and the Committee's decision of 3 May 1990, the applicant had had access to her child twice a week in a manner which does not appear to be open to criticism (see paragraph 16 above).

83. Secondly, as indicated in the Committee's decision of 3 May 1990, the applicant's lifestyle had by then already somewhat changed for the better (see paragraph 17 above).

It was rather the difficulties experienced in the implementation of the care decision concerning her son which provided the reason for the authorities' view that the applicant was unlikely to cooperate and that there was a risk of her disturbing the daughter's care if given access to the foster home (see paragraphs 16 and 17 above).

However, it cannot be said that those difficulties and that risk were of such a nature and degree as to dispense the authorities altogether from their normal obligation under Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8) to take measures with a view to reuniting them if the mother were to become able to provide the daughter with a satisfactory upbringing.

84. Against this background, the Court does not consider that the decision of 3 May 1990, in so far as it deprived the applicant of her access and parental rights in respect of her daughter, was sufficiently justified for the purposes of Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2), it not having been shown that the measure corresponded to any overriding requirement in the child's best interests (see paragraph 78 above).

Therefore the Court reaches the conclusion that the national authorities overstepped their margin of appreciation, thereby violating the applicant's rights under Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8).

In this connection it should be noted that less than a year after 3 May 1990 the City Court found that the applicant's material conditions had improved to the point where she would have been able to provide her daughter with a satisfactory upbringing. An important consideration for the City Court in refusing to terminate care was the lack of contact between the applicant and her daughter pending the proceedings, which state of affairs resulted directly from the decision of 3 May 1990 to deprive the applicant of her access (see paragraph 27 above).

85. In view of the reasons set out in paragraphs 82 to 84 above, the Court does not consider that the applicant's allegation that the length of the care proceedings was excessive (see paragraph 62 above) gives rise to any issue under Article 8 (art. 8).

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 6 PARA. 1 OF THE CONVENTION (art. 6-1)

86. The applicant also complained about the length of the proceedings under Article 6 para. 1 of the Convention (art. 6-1), which, in so far as relevant, reads:

> "In the determination of his civil rights and obligations ..., everyone is entitled to a ... hearing within a reasonable time by [a] ... tribunal ..."

87. The Government disagreed with the applicant, whereas the Commission, having taken the length of the proceedings into account under Article 8 (art. 8) (see paragraph 63 above), concluded that no separate issue arose under Article 6 (art. 6).

88. The Court observes that the proceedings leading to the deprivation of parental rights and access commenced before the Committee on 13 December 1989 and ended when the Supreme Court refused leave to appeal on 19 September 1991 (see paragraphs 12 and 28 above). They thus lasted altogether one year and nine months.

The Court shares the applicant's and the Commission's opinion that, in view of what was at stake for the applicant and the irreversible and definitive character of the measures concerned, the competent national authorities were required by Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) to act with exceptional diligence in ensuring the progress of the proceedings. However, it does not find that they failed to discharge their obligations in this respect.

In the Court's opinion the issues to be determined by the relevant administrative and judicial authorities were of a certain complexity. The proceedings comprised a thorough examination of the merits of the impugned care measures by the Committee's Chairperson, the Committee itself, the County Governor and the City Court and then a summary examination by the Supreme Court which refused leave to appeal (see paragraphs 12, 17, 24, 27 and 28 above). Thus three administrative and two judicial levels were involved and there is nothing to suggest, as was also conceded by the Commission, that any of these separately failed to act with the diligence required in the particular circumstances. Nor does it appear, having regard to the complexity of the case, that the duration of the proceedings as a whole exceeded a reasonable time.

89. Accordingly, the Court finds no breach of Article 6 of the Convention (art. 6) on account of the length of the proceedings.

III. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONVENTION (art. 13)

90. Before the Commission the applicant alleged that there had been a breach of Article 13 of the Convention (art. 13), which reads:

> "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in [the] Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

91. This complaint, which in the Commission's opinion gave rise to no issue separate from that under Article 8 (art. 8), was not pursued by the applicant before the Court, which does not consider it necessary to examine it of its own motion.

IV. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 50 OF THE CONVENTION (art. 50)

92. Ms Adele Johansen sought just satisfaction under Article 50 of the Convention (art. 50), which reads:

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the ... Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

93. The applicant sought no compensation for damage but claimed the reimbursement of costs and expenses incurred in the proceedings before the Court. By letter of 17 June 1996, she stated that she waived her Article 50 (art. 50) claim, the costs and expenses in question having been reimbursed by way of legal aid from the Norwegian authorities.

1. Holds unanimously that the taking into care of the applicant's daughter and the maintenance in force of the relevant care decision did not give rise to a breach of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8);

2. Holds by eight votes to one that the decision of 3 May 1990, in so far as it deprived the applicant of her access and parental rights in respect of her daughter, constituted a violation of Article 8 (art. 8);

3. Holds unanimously that there has been no violation of Article 6 para. 1 of the Convention (art. 6-1);

4. Holds unanimously that it is not necessary to examine whether there was a breach of Article 13 of the Convention (art. 13);

5. Holds unanimously that it is not necessary to make an award for costs and expenses.

PARTLY DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE MORENILLA

1. I agree with the majority that the taking into care of the applicant's daughter and the maintenance in force of the care decision were "necessary in a democratic society" within the meaning of paragraph 2 of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8-2). However, unlike the majority, I find that the Norwegian administrative and judicial authorities were entitled to think that it was "necessary" also to deprive the applicant of her parental rights and access in respect of the daughter.

2. When judging the necessity of these measures, the Court should, as rightly pointed out by the majority (see paragraph 64 of the judgment), examine whether the reasons adduced by the domestic authorities were "relevant and sufficient" in the light of the case as a whole. Moreover, regard should be had to the margin of appreciation to be accorded to them in this area, which, in addition to those reasons mentioned in paragraph 64 of the judgment, may be justified by the changing structure of family life in many member States of the Council of Europe (see Gomien, Harris and Zwaak, Law and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights and the European Social Charter, Strasbourg 1996, pp. 242, 243).

I share the majority's view that the authorities' discretion in assessing the necessity of taking a child into care should be a wide one but, unlike the majority, I see no valid justification for the Court to exercise a stricter scrutiny of restrictions on parental rights and access. In my view, in respect of the latter kind of measure too, the Court should avoid playing the role of a court of appeal and should limit itself to reviewing whether the applicant's interests were duly protected in the decision-making process and whether the justifications adduced by the national authorities could reasonably be made on the basis of the facts established by them.

3. In the instant case, the decision-making process leading to the decisions depriving the applicant of her parental rights and access was, as also observed by the majority, beyond reproach.

However, unlike the majority, I consider that the difficulties which the child welfare authorities experienced with the applicant and the risk of her disturbing the foster-home environment were such as to exempt them from their normal duty under Article 8 (art. 8) to take measures with a view to reuniting her and the daughter. In serious circumstances such as those which obtained in the instant case, where the life, health and development of the child were at risk, society must be able to intervene by taking such measures as are required in order to protect the best interests of the child, even though it may have the ultimate effect of disrupting in an irreversible manner the natural bonds between the mother and the daughter. Such interests were paramount not only under the relevant domestic law (see paragraphs 30-40 of the judgment) but also under Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8) (see, for instance, the Keegan v. Ireland judgment of 26 May 1994, Series A no. 290, pp. 20-21, para. 55; and the Olsson v. Sweden (no. 2) judgment of 27 November 1992, Series A no. 250, pp. 35-36, para. 90), which should be interpreted in the light of Resolution (77) 33 on placement of children adopted by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on 3 November 1977.

Although I am aware of the serious consequences of the measures for the applicant's family life, I consider that in the circumstances the authorities were, having regard to their margin of appreciation, entitled to think that it was necessary to deprive the applicant of her parental rights and access in the context of a permanent placement of the child in a foster home with a view to adoption. In my opinion, in reaching the contrary conclusion, the majority has based itself on reasoning (see paragraphs 82-84 of the judgment) which amounts to a reassessment of the evidence established by the Committee (see paragraph 17) and the County Governor (see paragraph 22).

4. For these reasons, I cannot follow the majority in finding that the national authorities, by depriving the applicant of her parental rights and access, "overstepped their margin of appreciation, thereby violating the applicant's rights under Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8)".

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

COURT (PLENARY)

CASE OF KLASS AND OTHERS v. GERMANY

(Application no. 5029/71)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

6 September 1978

In the case of Klass and others,

The European Court of Human Rights, taking its decision in plenary session in application of Rule 48 of the Rules of Court and composed of the following judges:

Mr. G. BALLADORE PALLIERI, President,
Mr. G. WIARDA,
Mr. H. MOSLER,
Mr. M. ZEKIA,
Mr. J. CREMONA,
Mr. P. O'DONOGHUE,
Mr. Thór VILHJÁLMSSON,
Mr. W. GANSHOF VAN DER MEERSCH,
Sir Gerald FITZMAURICE,
Mrs D. BINDSCHEDLER-ROBERT,
Mr. P.-H. TEITGEN,
Mr. G. LAGERGREN,
Mr. L. LIESCH,
Mr. F. GÖLCÜKLÜ,
Mr. F. MATSCHER,
Mr. J. PINHEIRO FARINHA,

and also Mr. H. PETZOLD, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 11, 13 and 14 March, and then on 30 June, 1, 3 and 4 July 1978,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case of Klass and others was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights (hereinafter called "the Commission"). The case originated in an application against the Federal Republic of Germany lodged with the Commission on 11 June 1971 under Article 25 (art. 25) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (hereinafter called "the Convention") by five German citizens, namely Gerhard Klass, Peter Lubberger, Jürgen Nussbruch, Hans-Jürgen Pohl and Dieter Selb.

2. The Commission's request, which referred to Articles 44 and 48, paragraph (a) (art. 44, art. 48-a), and to which was attached the report provided for in Article 31 (art. 31), was lodged with the registry of the Court on 15 July 1977, within the period of three months laid down in Articles 32 para. 1 and 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47). The purpose of the request is to obtain a decision from the Court as to whether or not the facts of the case disclose a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Articles 6 para. 1, 8 and 13 (art. 6-1, art. 8, art. 13) of the Convention.

3. On 28 July, the President of the Court drew by lot, in the presence of the Registrar, the names of five of the seven judges called upon to sit as members of the Chamber; Mr. H. Mosler, the elected judge of German nationality, and Mr. G. Balladore Pallieri, the President of the Court, were ex officio members under Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention and Rule 21 para. 3 (b) of the Rules of Court respectively. The five judges thus designated were Mr. J. Cremona, Mr. W. Ganshof van der Meersch, Mr. D. Evrigenis, Mr. G. Lagergren and Mr. F. Gölcüklü (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 para. 4 of the Rules of Court) (art. 43) .

Mr. Balladore Pallieri assumed the office of president of the Chamber in accordance with Rule 21 para. 5.

4. The President of the Chamber ascertained, through the Registrar, the views of the Agent of the Government and the Delegates of the Commission regarding the procedure to be followed. By an Order of 12 August, the President decided that the Government should file a memorial within a time-limit expiring on 28 November and that the Delegates of the Commission should be entitled to file a memorial in reply within two months of receipt of the Government’s memorial.

5. At a meeting held in private on 18 November in Strasbourg, the Chamber decided under Rule 48 to relinquish jurisdiction forthwith in favour of the plenary Court, on the ground "that the case raise(d) serious questions affecting the interpretation of the Convention".

6. The Government filed their memorial on 28 November. On 27 January 1978, a memorial by the Principal Delegate of the Commission was received at the registry; at the same time, the Secretary to the Commission advised the Registrar that the Delegates would reply to the Government’s memorial during the oral hearings.

7. After consulting, through the Registrar, the Agent of the Government and the Delegates of the Commission, the President directed by an Order of 24 February 1978 that the oral hearings should open on 10 March.

8. The Court held a preparatory meeting on 10 March, immediately before the opening of the hearings. At that meeting the Court, granting a request presented by the Government, decided that their Agent and counsel would be authorised to address the Court in German at the hearings, the Government undertaking, inter alia, responsibility for the interpretation into French or English of their oral arguments or statements (Rule 27 para. 2). In addition, the Court took note of the intention of the Commission’s Delegates to be assisted during the oral proceedings by one of the applicants, namely Mr. Pohl; the Court also authorised Mr. Pohl to speak in German (Rules 29 para. 1 in fine and 27 para. 3).

9. The oral hearings took place in public at the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 10 March.

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government:
  Mrs. I. MAIER, Ministerialdirigentin at the Federal Ministry of Justice, Agent,
  Mr. H. G. MERK, Ministerialrat at the Federal Ministry of the Interior,
  Mr. H. STÖCKER, Regierungsdirektor
  at the Federal Ministry of Justice,
  Mrs. H. SEIBERT, Regierungsdirektorin at the Federal Ministry of Justice, Advisers;
- for the Commission:
  Mr. G. SPERDUTI, Principal Delegate,
  Mr. C. A. NØRGAARD, Delegate,
  Mr. H.-J. POHL, Applicant, assisting the Delegates under Rule 29 para. 1, second sentence.

The Court heard addresses by Mrs. Maier for the Government and by Mr. Sperduti, Mr. Nørgaard and Mr. Pohl for the Commission, as well as their replies to questions put by several members of the Court.

AS TO THE FACTS

10. The applicants, who are German nationals, are Gerhard Klass, an Oberstaatsanwalt, Peter Lubberger, a lawyer, Jürgen Nussbruch, a judge, Hans-Jürgen Pohl and Dieter Selb, lawyers. Mr. Nussbruch lives in Heidelberg, the others in Mannheim.

All five applicants claim that Article 10 para. 2 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz) and a statute enacted in pursuance of that provision, namely the Act of 13 August 1968 on Restrictions on the Secrecy of the Mail, Post and Telecommunications (Gesetz zur Beschränkung des Brief-, Post- under Fernmeldegeheimnisses, hereinafter referred to as "the G 10"), are contrary to the Convention. They do not dispute that the State has the right to have recourse to the surveillance measures contemplated by the legislation; they challenge this legislation in that it permits those measures without obliging the authorities in every case to notify the persons concerned after the event, and in that it excludes any remedy before the courts against the ordering and execution of such measures. Their application is directed against the legislation as modified and interpreted by the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht).

11. Before lodging their application with the Commission, the applicants had in fact appealed to the Federal Constitutional Court. By judgment of 15

December 1970, that Court held that Article 1 para. 5, sub-paragraph 5 of the G 10 was void, being incompatible with the second sentence of Article 10 para. 2 of the Basic Law, in so far as it excluded notification of the person concerned about the measures of surveillance even when such notification could be given without jeopardising the purpose of the restriction. The Constitutional Court dismissed the remaining claims (Collected Decisions of the Constitutional Court, Vol. 30, pp. 1 et seq.).

Since the operative provisions of the aforementioned judgment have the force of law, the competent authorities are bound to apply the G 10 in the form and subject to the interpretation decided by the Constitutional Court. Furthermore, the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany were prompted by this judgment to propose amendments to the G 10, but the parliamentary proceedings have not yet been completed.

12. As regards the applicants' right to apply to the Constitutional Court, that Court held, inter alia:

> "In order to be able to enter a constitutional application against an Act, the applicant must claim that the Act itself, and not merely an implementary measure, constitutes a direct and immediate violation of one of his fundamental rights ... These conditions are not fulfilled since, according to the applicants' own submissions, it is only by an act on the part of the executive that their fundamental rights would be violated. However, because they are not apprised of the interference with their rights, the persons concerned cannot challenge any implementary measure. In such cases, they must be entitled to make a constitutional application against the Act itself, as in cases where a constitutional application against an implementary measure is impossible for other reasons ..." (ibid, pp. 16-17).

13. Although, as a precautionary measure, the applicants claimed before both the Constitutional Court and the Commission that they were being subjected to surveillance measures, they did not know whether the G 10 had actually been applied to them.

On this point, the Agent of the Government made the following declaration before the Court:

> "To remove all uncertainty as to the facts of the case and to give the Court a clear basis for its decision, the Federal Minister of the Interior, who has competence in the matter, has, with the G 10 Commission's approval, authorised me to make the following statement:
> At no time have surveillance measures provided for by the Act enacted in pursuance of Article 10 of the Basic Law been ordered or implemented against the applicants. Neither as persons suspected of one or more of the offences specified in the Act nor as third parties within the meaning of Article 1, paragraph 2, sub-paragraph 2, of the G 10 have the applicants been subjected to such measures. There is also no question of the applicants' having been indirectly involved in a surveillance measure directed against another person - at least, not in any fashion which would have permitted their identification. Finally, there is no question of the applicants' having been subjected to surveillance by mistake - for example through confusion over a telephone number -, since in such cases the person concerned is notified of the surveillance measure."

The contested legislation

14. After the end of the Second World War, the surveillance of mail, post and telecommunications in Germany was dealt with by the occupying powers. As regards the Federal Republic, neither the entry into force on 24 May 1949 of the Basic Law nor the foundation of the State of the Federal Republic on 20 September 1949 altered this situation which continued even after the termination of the occupation régime in 1955. Article 5 para. 2 of the Convention of 26 May 1952 on Relations between the Three Powers (France, the United States and the United Kingdom) and the Federal Republic - as amended by the Paris Protocol of 23 October 1954 - specified in fact that the Three Powers temporarily retained "the rights ... heretofore held or exercised by them, which relate to the protection of the security of armed forces stationed in the Federal Republic". Under the same provision, these rights were to lapse "when the appropriate German authorities (had) obtained similar powers under German legislation enabling them to take effective action to protect the security of those forces, including the ability to deal with a serious disturbance of public security and order".

15. The Government wished to substitute the domestic law for the rights exercised by the Three Powers and to place under legal control interferences with the right, guaranteed by Article 10 of the Basic Law, to respect for correspondence. Furthermore, the restrictions to which this right could be subject appeared to the Government to be inadequate for the effective protection of the constitutional order of the State. Thus, on 13 June 1967, the Government introduced two Bills as part of the Emergency Legislation. The first sought primarily to amend Article 10 para. 2 of the Basic Law; the second - based on Article 10 para. 2 so amended - was designed to limit the right to secrecy of the mail, post and telecommunications. The two Acts, having been adopted by the federal legislative assemblies, were enacted on 24 June and 13 August 1968 respectively.

The Three Powers had come to the view on 27 May that these two texts met the requirements of Article 5 para. 2 of the above-mentioned Convention. Their statements declared:

> "The rights of the Three Powers heretofore held or exercised by them which relate to the protection of the security of armed forces stationed in the Federal Republic and which are temporarily retained pursuant to that provision will accordingly lapse as each of the above-mentioned texts, as laws, becomes effective."

16. In its initial version, Article 10 of the Basic Law guaranteed the secrecy of mail, post and telecommunications with a proviso that restrictions could be ordered only pursuant to a statute. As amended by the Act of 24 June 1968, it now provides:

> "(1) Secrecy of the mail, post and telecommunications shall be inviolable.
> (2) Restrictions may be ordered only pursuant to a statute. Where such restrictions are intended to protect the free democratic constitutional order or the existence or security of the Federation or of a Land, the statute may provide that the person concerned shall not be notified of the restriction and that legal remedy through the courts shall be replaced by a system of scrutiny by agencies and auxiliary agencies appointed by the people's elected representatives."

17. The G 10, adopting the solution contemplated by the second sentence of paragraph 2 of the above-quoted Article 10, specifies (in Article 1 para. 1) the cases in which the competent authorities may impose the restrictions provided for in that paragraph, that is to say, may open and inspect mail and post, read telegraphic messages, listen to and record telephone conversations. Thus, Article 1 para. 1 empowers those authorities so to act in order to protect against "imminent dangers" threatening the "free democratic constitutional order", "the existence or the security of the Federation or of a Land", "the security of the (allied) armed forces" stationed on the territory of the Republic and the security of "the troops of one of the Three Powers stationed in the Land of Berlin". According to Article 1 para. 2, these measures may be taken only where there are factual indications (tatsächliche Anhaltspunkte) for suspecting a person of planning, committing or having committed certain criminal acts punishable under the Criminal Code, such as offences against the peace or security of the State (sub-paragraph 1, no. 1), the democratic order (sub-paragraph 1, no. 2), external security (sub-paragraph 1, no. 3) and the security of the allied armed forces (sub-paragraph 1, no. 5).

Paragraph 2 of Article 1 further states that the surveillance provided for in paragraph 1 is permissible only if the establishment of the facts by another method is without prospects of success or considerably more difficult (aussichtslos oder wesentlich erschwert). The surveillance may cover only "the suspect or such other persons who are, on the basis of clear facts (bestimmter Tatsachen), to be presumed to receive or forward communications intended for the suspect or emanating from him or whose telephone the suspect is to be presumed to use" (sub-paragraph 2).

18. Article 1 para. 4 of the Act provides that an application for surveillance measures may be made only by the head, or his substitute, of one of the following services: the Agencies for the Protection of the Constitution of the Federation and the Länder (Bundesamt für Verfassungsschutz; Verfassungsschutzbehörden der Länder), the Army Security Office (Amt für Sicherheit der Bundeswehr) and the Federal Intelligence Service (Bundesnachrichtendienst).

The measures are ordered, on written application giving reasons, either by the supreme Land authority in cases falling within its jurisdiction or by a Federal Minister empowered for the purpose by the Chancellor. The Chancellor has entrusted these functions to the Ministers of the Interior and of Defence each of whom, in the sphere falling within his competence, must personally take the decision as to the application of the measures (Article 1 para. 5, sub-paragraphs 1 and 2).

Measures ordered must be immediately discontinued once the required conditions have ceased to exist or the measures themselves are no longer necessary (Article 1 para. 7, sub-paragraph 2). The measures remain in force for a maximum of three months and may be renewed only on fresh application (Article 1 para. 5, sub-paragraph 3).

19. Under the terms of Article 1 para. 5, sub-paragraph 5, the person concerned is not to be notified of the restrictions affecting him. However, since the Federal Constitutional Court's judgment of 15 December 1970 (see paragraph 11 above), the competent authority has to inform the person concerned as soon as notification can be made without jeopardising the purpose of the restriction. To this end, the Minister concerned considers ex officio, immediately the measures have been discontinued or, if need be, at regular intervals thereafter, whether the person concerned should be notified. The Minister submits his decision for approval to the Commission set up under the G 10 for the purpose of supervising its application (hereinafter called "the G 10 Commission"). The G 10 Commission may direct the Minister to inform the person concerned that he has been subjected to surveillance measures.

20. Implementation of the measures ordered is supervised by an official qualified for judicial office (Article 1 para. 7, sub-paragraph 1). This official examines the information obtained in order to decide whether its use would be compatible with the Act and whether it is relevant to the purpose of the measure. He transmits to the competent authorities only information satisfying these conditions and destroys any other intelligence that may have been gathered.

The information and documents so obtained may not be used for other ends and documents must be destroyed as soon as they are no longer needed to achieve the required purpose (Article 1 para. 7 sub-paragraphs 3 and 4).

21. The competent Minister must, at least once every six months, report to a Board consisting of five Members of Parliament on the application of the G 10; the Members of Parliament are appointed by the Bundestag in proportion to the parliamentary groupings, the opposition being represented on the Board (Article 1 para. 9, sub-paragraph 1, of the G 10 and Rule 12 of the Rules of Procedure of the Bundestag). In addition, the Minister is bound every month to provide the G 10 Commission with an account of the measures he has ordered (Article 1 para. 9). In practice and except in urgent cases, the Minister seeks the prior consent of this Commission. The Government, moreover, intend proposing to Parliament to amend the G 10 so as to make such prior consent obligatory.

The G 10 Commission decides, ex officio or on application by a person believing himself to be under surveillance, on both the legality of and the necessity for the measures; if it declares any measures to be illegal or unnecessary, the Minister must terminate them immediately (Article 1 para. 9, sub-paragraph 2). Although not required by the Constitutional Court's judgment of 15 December 1970, the Commission has, since that judgment, also been called upon when decisions are taken on whether the person concerned should be notified of the measures affecting him (see paragraph 19 above).

The G 10 Commission consists of three members, namely, a Chairman, who must be qualified to hold judicial office, and two assessors. The Commission members are appointed for the current term of the Bundestag by the above-mentioned Board of five Members of Parliament after consultation with the Government; they are completely independent in the exercise of their functions and cannot be subject to instructions.

The G 10 Commission draws up its own rules of procedure which must be approved by the Board; before taking this decision, the Board consults the Government.

For the Länder, their legislatures lay down the parliamentary supervision to which the supreme authorities are subject in the matter. In fact, the Länder Parliaments have set up supervisory bodies which correspond to the federal bodies from the point of view of organisation and operation.

22. According to Article 1 para. 9, sub-paragraph 5, of the G 10:

> "... there shall be no legal remedy before the courts in respect of the ordering and implementation of restrictive measures."

The official statement of reasons accompanying the Bill contains the following passage in this connection:

> "The surveillance of the post and telecommunications of a certain person can serve a useful purpose only if the person concerned does not become aware of it. For this reason, notification to this person is out of the question. For the same reason, it must be avoided that a person who intends to commit, or who has committed, the offences enumerated in the Act can, by using a legal remedy, inform himself whether he is under surveillance. Consequently, a legal remedy to impugn the ordering of restrictive measures had to be denied ...
> The Bill presented during the 4th legislative session ... provided for the ordering (of such measures) by an independent judge. The Federal Government abandoned this solution in the Bill amending Article 10 of the Basic Law, introduced as part of the Emergency Legislation, mainly because the Executive, which is responsible before the Bundestag, should retain the responsibility for such decisions in order to observe a clear separation of powers. The present Bill therefore grants the power of decision to a Federal Minister or the supreme authority of the Land. For the (above-)mentioned reasons ..., the person concerned is deprived of the opportunity of having the restrictive measures ordered examined by a court; on the other hand, the constitutional principle of government under the rule of law demands an independent control of interference by the Executive with the rights of citizens. Thus, the Bill, in pursuance of the Bill amending Article 10 of the Basic Law ..., prescribes the regular reporting to a Parliamentary Board and the supervision of the ordering of the restrictive measures by a Control Commission appointed by the Board ..." (Bundestag document V/1880 of 13 June 1967, p. 8).

23. Although access to the courts to challenge the ordering and implementation of surveillance measures is excluded in this way, it is still open to a person believing himself to be under surveillance pursuant to the G 10 to seek a constitutional remedy: according to the information supplied by the Government, a person who has applied to the G 10 Commission without success retains the right to apply to the Constitutional Court. The latter may reject the application on the ground that the applicant is unable to adduce proof to substantiate a complaint, but it may also request the Government concerned to supply it with information or to produce documents to enable it to verify for itself the individual's allegations. The authorities are bound to reply to such a request even if the information asked for is secret. It is then for the Constitutional Court to decide whether the information and documents so obtained can be used; it may decide by a two-thirds majority that their use is incompatible with State security and dismiss the application on that ground (Article 26 para. 2 of the Constitutional Court Act).

The Agent of the Government admitted that this remedy might be employed only on rare occasions.

24. If the person concerned is notified, after the measures have been discontinued, that he has been subject to surveillance, several legal remedies against the interference with his rights become available to him. According to the information supplied by the Government, the individual may: in an action for a declaration, have reviewed by an administrative court declaration, the legality of the application to him of the G 10 and the conformity with the law of the surveillance measures ordered; bring an action for damages in a civil court if he has been prejudiced; bring an action for the destruction or, if appropriate, restitution of documents; finally, if none of these remedies is successful, apply to the Federal Constitutional Court for a ruling as to whether there has been a breach of the Basic Law.

25. Article 2 of the G 10 has also amended the Code of Criminal Procedure by inserting therein two Articles which authorise measures of surveillance of telephone and telegraphic communications.

Under Article 100 (a), these measures may be taken under certain conditions, in particular, when there are clear facts on which to suspect someone of having committed or attempted to commit certain serious offences listed in that Article. Under Article 100 (b), such measures may be ordered only by a court and for a maximum of three months; they may be renewed. In urgent cases, the decision may be taken by the public prosecutor's department but to remain in effect it must be confirmed by a court within three days. The persons concerned are informed of the measures taken in their respect as soon as notification can be made without jeopardising the purpose of the investigation (Article 101 para. 1 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

These provisions are not, however, in issue in the present case.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

26. In their application lodged with the Commission on 11 June 1971, the applicants alleged that Article 10 para. 2 of the Basic Law and the G 10 - to the extent that these provisions, firstly, empower the authorities to monitor their correspondence and telephone communications without obliging the authorities to inform them subsequently of the measures taken against them and, secondly, exclude the possibility of challenging such measures before the ordinary courts - violate Articles 6, 8 and 13 (art. 6, art. 8, art. 13) of the Convention.

On 18 December 1974, the Commission declared the application admissible. It found, as regards Article 25 (art. 25) of the Convention:

> "... only the victim of an alleged violation may bring an application. The applicants, however, state that they may be or may have been subject to secret surveillance, for example, in course of legal representation of clients who were themselves subject to surveillance, and that persons having been the subject of secret surveillance are not always subsequently informed of the measures taken against them. In view of this particularity of the case the applicants have to be considered as victims for the purpose of Article 25 (art. 25)."

27. Having been invited by the Government to consider the application inadmissible under Article 29 in conjunction with Articles 25 and 27 para. 2 (art. 29+25, art. 29+27-2) of the Convention, the Commission declared in its report of 9 March 1977 that it saw no reason to accede to this request. In this connection, the report stated:

> "The Commission is ... still of the opinion ... that the applicants must be considered as if they were victims. Some of the applicants are barristers and it is theoretically excluded that they are in fact subject to secret surveillance in consequence of contacts they may have with clients who are suspected of anti-constitutional activities.
> As it is the particularity of this case that persons subject to secret supervision by the authorities are not always subsequently informed of such measures taken against them, it is impossible for the applicants to show that any of their rights have been interfered with. In these circumstances the applicants must be considered to be entitled to lodge an application even if they cannot show that they are victims."

The Commission then expressed the opinion:

- by eleven votes to one with two abstentions, that the present case did not disclose any breach of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention insofar as the applicants relied on the notion "civil rights";

- unanimously, that the present case did not disclose any breach of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) in so far as the applicants relied on the notion "criminal charge";

- by twelve votes in favour with one abstention, that the present case did not disclose any breach of Article 8 (art. 8) or of Article 13 (art. 13).

The report contains various separate opinions.

28. In her memorial of 28 November 1977, the Agent of the Government submitted in conclusion:

> "I ... invite the Court
> to find that the application was inadmissible;
> in the alternative, to find that the Federal Republic of Germany has not violated the Convention."

She repeated these concluding submissions at the hearing on 10 March 1978.

29. For their part, the Delegates of the Commission made the following concluding submissions to the Court:

> "May it please the Court to say and judge
> 1. Whether, having regard to the circumstances of the case, the applicants could claim to be 'victims' of a violation of their rights guaranteed by the Convention by reason of the system of surveillance established by the so-called G 10 Act;
> 2. And, if so, whether the applicants are actually victims of a violation of their rights set forth in the Convention by the very existence of that Act, considering that it gives no guarantee to persons whose communications have been subjected to secret surveillance that they will be notified subsequently of the measures taken concerning them."

AS TO THE LAW

I. ON ARTICLE 25 PARA. 1 (art. 25-1)

30. Both in their written memorial and in their oral submissions, the Government formally invited the Court to find that the application lodged with the Commission was "inadmissible". They argued that the applicants could not be considered as "victims" within the meaning of Article 25 para. 1 (art. 25-1) which provides as follows:

> "The Commission may receive petitions addressed to the Secretary-General of the Council of Europe from any person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals claiming to be the victim of a violation by one of the High Contracting Parties of the rights set forth in this Convention, provided that the High Contracting Party against which the complaint has been lodged has declared that it recognises the competence of the Commission to receive such petitions ..."

In the Government's submission, the applicants were not claiming to have established an individual violation, even potential, of their own rights but rather, on the basis of the purely hypothetical possibility of being subject to surveillance, were seeking a general and abstract review of the contested legislation in the light of the Convention.

31. According to the reply given by the Delegates at the hearing, the Commission agreed with the Government that the Court is competent to determine whether the applicants can claim to be "victims" within the meaning of Article 25 para. 1 (art. 25-1). However, the Commission disagreed with the Government in so far as the latter's proposal might imply the suggestion that the Commission's decision on the admissibility of the application should as such be reviewed by the Court.

The Delegates considered that the Government were requiring too rigid a standard for the notion of a "victim" of an alleged breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention. They submitted that, in order to be able to claim to be the victim of an interference with the exercise of the right conferred on him by Article 8 para. 1 (art. 8-1), it should suffice that a person is in a situation where there is a reasonable risk of his being subjected to secret surveillance. In the Delegates' view, the applicants are not only to be considered as constructive victims, as the Commission had in effect stated: they can claim to be direct victims of a violation of their rights under Article 8 (art. 8) in that under the terms of the contested legislation everyone in the Federal Republic of Germany who could be presumed to have contact with people involved in subversive activity really runs the risk of being subject to secret surveillance, the sole existence of this risk being in itself a restriction on free communication.

The Principal Delegate, for another reason, regarded the application as rightly declared admissible. In his view, the alleged violation related to a single right which, although not expressly enounced in the Convention, was to be derived by necessary implication; this implied right was the right of every individual to be informed within a reasonable time of any secret measure taken in his respect by the public authorities and amounting to an interference with his rights and freedoms under the Convention.

32. The Court confirms the well-established principle of its own case-law that, once a case is duly referred to it, the Court is endowed with full jurisdiction and may take cognisance of all questions of fact or of law arising in the course of the proceedings, including questions which may have been raised before the Commission under the head of admissibility. This conclusion is in no way invalidated by the powers conferred on the Commission under Article 27 (art. 27) of the Convention as regards the admissibility of applications. The task which this Article assigns to the Commission is one of sifting; the Commission either does or does not accept the applications. Its decision to reject applications which it considers to be inadmissible are without appeal as are, moreover, also those by which applications are accepted; they are taken in complete independence (see the De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp judgment of 18 June 1971, Series A no. 12, pp. 29 and 30, paras. 47-54; see also the judgment of 9 February 1967 on the preliminary objection in the "Belgian Linguistic" case, Series A no. 5, p. 18; the Handyside judgment of 7 December 1976, Series A no. 24, p. 20, para. 41; and the judgment of 18 January 1978 in the case of Ireland v. the United Kingdom, Series A no. 25, p. 63, para. 157).

The present case concerns, inter alia, the interpretation of the notion of "victim" within the meaning of Article 25 (art. 25) of the Convention, this being a matter already raised before the Commission. The Court therefore affirms its jurisdiction to examine the issue arising under that Article (art. 25).

33. While Article 24 (art. 24) allows each Contracting State to refer to the Commission "any alleged breach" of the Convention by another Contracting State, a person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals must, in order to be able to lodge a petition in pursuance of Article 25 (art. 25), claim "to be the victim of a violation ... of the rights set forth in (the) Convention". Thus, in contrast to the position under Article 24 (art. 24) - where, subject to the other conditions laid down, the general interest attaching to the observance of the Convention renders admissible an inter-State application - Article 25 (art. 25) requires that an individual applicant should claim to have been actually affected by the violation he alleges (see the judgment of 18 January 1978 in the case of Ireland v. the United Kingdom, Series A no. 25, pp. 90-91, paras. 239 and 240). Article 25 (art. 25) does not institute for individuals a kind of actio popularis for the interpretation of the Convention; it does not permit individuals to complain against a law in abstracto simply because they feel that it contravenes the Convention. In principle, it does not suffice for an individual applicant to claim that the mere existence of a law violates his rights under the Convention; it is necessary that the law should have been applied to his detriment. Nevertheless, as both the Government and the Commission pointed out, a law may by itself violate the rights of an individual if the individual is directly affected by the law in the absence of any specific measure of implementation. In this connection, the Court recalls that, in two previous cases originating in applications lodged in pursuance of Article 25 (art. 25), it has itself been faced with legislation having such an effect: in the "Belgian Linguistic" case and the case of Kjeldsen, Busk Madsen and Pedersen, the Court was called on to examine the compatibility with the Convention and Protocol No. 1 of certain legislation relating to education (see the judgment of 23 July 1968, Series A no. 6, and the judgment of 7 December 1976, Series A no. 23, especially pp. 22-23, para. 48).

34. Article 25 (art. 25), which governs the access by individuals to the Commission, is one of the keystones in the machinery for the enforcement of the rights and freedoms set forth in the Convention. This machinery involves, for an individual who considers himself to have been prejudiced by some action claimed to be in breach of the Convention, the possibility of bringing the alleged violation before the Commission provided the other admissibility requirements are satisfied. The question arises in the present proceedings whether an individual is to be deprived of the opportunity of lodging an application with the Commission because, owing to the secrecy of the measures objected to, he cannot point to any concrete measure specifically affecting him. In the Court's view, the effectiveness (l'effet utile) of the Convention implies in such circumstances some possibility of having access to the Commission. If this were not so, the efficiency of the Convention's enforcement machinery would be materially weakened. The procedural provisions of the Convention must, in view of the fact that the Convention and its institutions were set up to protect the individual, be applied in a manner which serves to make the system of individual applications efficacious.

The Court therefore accepts that an individual may, under certain conditions, claim to be the victim of a violation occasioned by the mere existence of secret measures or of legislation permitting secret measures, without having to allege that such measures were in fact applied to him. The relevant conditions are to be determined in each case according to the Convention right or rights alleged to have been infringed, the secret character of the measures objected to, and the connection between the applicant and those measures.

35. In the light of these considerations, it has now to be ascertained whether, by reason of the particular legislation being challenged, the applicants can claim to be victims, in the sense of Article 25 (art. 25), of a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention - Article 8 (art. 8) being the provision giving rise to the central issue in the present case.

36. The Court points out that where a State institutes secret surveillance the existence of which remains unknown to the persons being controlled, with the effect that the surveillance remains unchallengeable, Article 8 (art. 8) could to a large extent be reduced to a nullity. It is possible in such a situation for an individual to be treated in a manner contrary to Article 8 (art. 8), or even to be deprived of the right granted by that Article (art. 8), without his being aware of it and therefore without being able to obtain a remedy either at the national level or before the Convention institutions.

In this connection, it should be recalled that the Federal Constitutional Court in its judgment of 15 December 1970 (see paragraphs 11 and 12 above) adopted the following reasoning:

> "In order to be able to enter a constitutional application against an Act, the applicant must claim that the Act itself, and not merely an implementary measure, constitutes a direct and immediate violation of one of his fundamental rights ... These conditions are not fulfilled since, according to the applicants' own submissions, it is only by an act on the part of the executive that their fundamental rights would be violated. However, because they are not apprised of the interference with their rights, the persons concerned cannot challenge any implementary measure. In such cases, they must be entitled to make a constitutional application against the Act itself, as in cases where a constitutional application against an implementary measure is impossible for other reasons ..."

This reasoning, in spite of the possible differences existing between appeals to the Federal Constitutional Court under German law and the enforcement machinery set up by the Convention, is valid, mutatis mutandis, for applications lodged under Article 25 (art. 25).

The Court finds it unacceptable that the assurance of the enjoyment of a right guaranteed by the Convention could be thus removed by the simple fact that the person concerned is kept unaware of its violation. A right of recourse to the Commission for persons potentially affected by secret surveillance is to be derived from Article 25 (art. 25), since otherwise Article 8 (art. 8) runs the risk of being nullified.

37. As to the facts of the particular case, the Court observes that the contested legislation institutes a system of surveillance under which all persons in the Federal Republic of Germany can potentially have their mail, post and telecommunications monitored, without their ever knowing this unless there has been either some indiscretion or subsequent notification in the circumstances laid down in the Federal Constitutional Court's judgment (see paragraph 11 above). To that extent, the disputed legislation directly affects all users or potential users of the postal and telecommunication services in the Federal Republic of Germany. Furthermore, as the Delegates rightly pointed out, this menace of surveillance can be claimed in itself to restrict free communication through the postal and telecommunication services, thereby constituting for all users or potential users a direct interference with the right guaranteed by Article 8 (art. 8).

At the hearing, the Agent of the Government informed the Court that at no time had surveillance measures under the G 10 been ordered or implemented in respect of the applicants (see paragraph 13 above). The Court takes note of the Agent's statement. However, in the light of its conclusions as to the effect of the contested legislation the Court does not consider that this retrospective clarification bears on the appreciation of the applicants' status as "victims".

38. Having regard to the specific circumstances of the present case, the Court concludes that each of the applicants is entitled to "(claim) to be the victim of a violation" of the Convention, even though he is not able to allege in support of his application that he has been subject to a concrete measure of surveillance. The question whether the applicants were actually the victims of any violation of the Convention involves determining whether the contested legislation is in itself compatible with the Convention's provisions.

Accordingly, the Court does not find it necessary to decide whether the Convention implies a right to be informed in the circumstances mentioned by the Principal Delegate.

II. ON THE ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 (art. 8)

39. The applicants claim that the contested legislation, notably because the person concerned is not informed of the surveillance measures and cannot have recourse to the courts when such measures are terminated, violates Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention which provides as follows:

> "1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

40. According to Article 10 para. 2 of the Basic Law, restrictions upon the secrecy of the mail, post and telecommunications may be ordered but only pursuant to a statute. Article 1 para. 1 of the G 10 allows certain authorities to open and inspect mail and post, to read telegraphic messages and to monitor and record telephone conversations (see paragraph 17 above). The Court's examination under Article 8 (art. 8) is thus limited to the authorisation of such measures alone and does not extend, for instance, to the secret surveillance effect in pursuance of the Code of Criminal Procedure (see paragraph 25 above).

41. The first matter to be decided is whether and, if so, in what respect the contested legislation, in permitting the above-mentioned measures of surveillance, constitutes an interference with the exercise of the right guaranteed to the applicants under Article 8 para. 1 (art. 8-1).

Although telephone conversations are not expressly mentioned in paragraph 1 of Article 8 (art. 8-1), the Court considers, as did the Commission, that such conversations are covered by the notions of "private life" and "correspondence" referred to by this provision.

In its report, the Commission expressed the opinion that the secret surveillance provided for under the German legislation amounted to an interference with the exercise of the right set forth in Article 8 para. 1 (art. 8-1). Neither before the Commission nor before the Court did the Government contest this issue. Clearly, any of the permitted surveillance measures, once applied to a given individual, would result in an interference by a public authority with the exercise of that individual's right to respect for his private and family life and his correspondence. Furthermore, in the mere existence of the legislation itself there is involved, for all those to whom the legislation could be applied, a menance of surveillance; this menace necessarily strikes at freedom of communication between users of the postal and telecommunication services and thereby constitutes an "interference by a public authority" with the exercise of the applicants' right to respect for private and family life and for correspondence.

The Court does not exclude that the contested legislation, and therefore the measures permitted thereunder, could also involve an interference with the exercise of a person's right to respect for his home. However, the Court does not deem it necessary in the present proceedings to decide this point.

42. The cardinal issue arising under Article 8 (art. 8) in the present case is whether the interference so found is justified by the terms of paragraph 2 of the Article (art. 8-2). This paragraph, since it provides for an exception to a right guaranteed by the Convention, is to be narrowly interpreted. Powers of secret surveillance of citizens, characterising as they do the police state, are tolerable under the Convention only in so far as strictly necessary for safeguarding the democratic institutions.

43. In order for the "interference" established above not to infringe Article 8 (art. 8), it must, according to paragraph 2 (art. 8-2), first of all have been "in accordance with the law". This requirement is fulfilled in the present case since the "interference" results from Acts passed by Parliament, including one Act which was modified by the Federal Constitutional Court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, by its judgment of 15 December 1970 (see paragraph 11 above). In addition, the Court observes that, as both the Government and the Commission pointed out, any individual measure of surveillance has to comply with the strict conditions and procedures laid down in the legislation itself.

44. It remains to be determined whether the other requisites laid down in paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) were also satisfied. According to the Government and the Commission, the interference permitted by the contested legislation was "necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security" and/or "for the prevention of disorder or crime". Before the Court the Government submitted that the interference was additionally justified "in the interests of ... public safety" and "for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others".

45. The G 10 defines precisely, and thereby limits, the purposes for which the restrictive measures may be imposed. It provides that, in order to protect against "imminent dangers" threatening "the free democratic constitutional order", "the existence or security of the Federation or of a Land", "the security of the (allied) armed forces" stationed on the territory of the Republic or the security of "the troops of one of the Three Powers stationed in the Land of Berlin", the responsible authorities may authorise the restrictions referred to above (see paragraph 17).

46. The Court, sharing the view of the Government and the Commission, finds that the aim of the G 10 is indeed to safeguard national security and/or to prevent disorder or crime in pursuance of Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2). In these circumstances, the Court does not deem it necessary to decide whether the further purposes cited by the Government are also relevant.

On the other hand, it has to be ascertained whether the means provided under the impugned legislation for the achievement of the above-mentioned aim remain in all respects within the bounds of what is necessary in a democratic society.

47. The applicants do not object to the German legislation in that it provides for wide-ranging powers of surveillance; they accept such powers, and the resultant encroachment upon the right guaranteed by Article 8 para. 1 (art. 8-1), as being a necessary means of defence for the protection of the democratic State. The applicants consider, however, that paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) lays down for such powers certain limits which have to be respected in a democratic society in order to ensure that the society does not slide imperceptibly towards totalitarianism. In their view, the contested legislation lacks adequate safeguards against possible abuse.

48. As the Delegates observed, the Court, in its appreciation of the scope of the protection offered by Article 8 (art. 8), cannot but take judicial notice of two important facts. The first consists of the technical advances made in the means of espionage and, correspondingly, of surveillance; the second is the development of terrorism in Europe in recent years. Democratic societies nowadays find themselves threatened by highly sophisticated forms of espionage and by terrorism, with the result that the State must be able, in order effectively to counter such threats, to undertake the secret surveillance of subversive elements operating within its jurisdiction. The Court has therefore to accept that the existence of some legislation granting powers of secret surveillance over the mail, post and telecommunications is, under exceptional conditions, necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security and/or for the prevention of disorder or crime.

49. As concerns the fixing of the conditions under which the system of surveillance is to be operated, the Court points out that the domestic legislature enjoys a certain discretion. It is certainly not for the Court to substitute for the assessment of the national authorities any other assessment of what might be the best policy in this field (cf., mutatis mutandis, the De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp judgment of 18 June 1971, Series A no. 12, pp. 45-46, para. 93, and the Golder judgment of 21 February 1975, Series A no. 18, pp. 21-22, para. 45; cf., for Article 10 para. 2, the Engel and others judgment of 8 June 1976, Series A no. 22, pp. 41-42, para. 100, and the Handyside judgment of 7 December 1976, Series A no. 24, p. 22, para. 48).

Nevertheless, the Court stresses that this does not mean that the Contracting States enjoy an unlimited discretion to subject persons within their jurisdiction to secret surveillance. The Court, being aware of the danger such a law poses of undermining or even destroying democracy on the ground of defending it, affirms that the Contracting States may not, in the name of the struggle against espionage and terrorism, adopt whatever measures they deem appropriate.

50. The Court must be satisfied that, whatever system of surveillance is adopted, there exist adequate and effective guarantees against abuse. This assessment has only a relative character: it depends on all the circumstances of the case, such as the nature, scope and duration of the possible measures, the grounds required for ordering such measures, the authorities competent to permit, carry out and supervise such measures, and the kind of remedy provided by the national law.

The functioning of the system of secret surveillance established by the contested legislation, as modified by the Federal Constitutional Court's judgment of 15 December 1970, must therefore be examined in the light of the Convention.

51. According to the G 10, a series of limitative conditions have to be satisfied before a surveillance measure can be imposed. Thus, the permissible restrictive measures are confined to cases in which there are factual indications for suspecting a person of planning, committing or having committed certain serious criminal acts; measures may only be ordered if the establishment of the facts by another method is without prospects of success or considerably more difficult; even then, the surveillance may cover only the specific suspect or his presumed "contact-persons" (see paragraph 17 above). Consequently, so-called exploratory or general surveillance is not permitted by the contested legislation.

Surveillance may be ordered only on written application giving reasons, and such an application may be made only by the head, or his substitute, of certain services; the decision thereon must be taken by a Federal Minister empowered for the purpose by the Chancellor or, where appropriate, by the supreme Land authority (see paragraph 18 above). Accordingly, under the law there exists an administrative procedure designed to ensure that measures are not ordered haphazardly, irregularly or without due and proper consideration. In addition, although not required by the Act, the competent Minister in practice and except in urgent cases seeks the prior consent of the G 10 Commission (see paragraph 21 above).

52. The G 10 also lays down strict conditions with regard to the implementation of the surveillance measures and to the processing of the information thereby obtained. The measures in question remain in force for a maximum of three months and may be renewed only on fresh application; the measures must immediately be discontinued once the required conditions have ceased to exist or the measures themselves are no longer necessary; knowledge and documents thereby obtained may not be used for other ends, and documents must be destroyed as soon as they are no longer needed to achieve the required purpose (see paragraphs 18 and 20 above).

As regards the implementation of the measures, an initial control is carried out by an official qualified for judicial office. This official examines the information obtained before transmitting to the competent services such information as may be used in accordance with the Act and is relevant to the purpose of the measure; he destroys any other intelligence that may have been gathered (see paragraph 20 above).

53. Under the G 10, while recourse to the courts in respect of the ordering and implementation of measures of surveillance is excluded, subsequent control or review is provided instead, in accordance with Article 10 para. 2 of the Basic Law, by two bodies appointed by the people's elected representatives, namely, the Parliamentary Board and the G 10 Commission.

The competent Minister must, at least once every six months, report on the application of the G 10 to the Parliamentary Board consisting of five Members of Parliament; the Members of Parliament are appointed by the Bundestag in proportion to the parliamentary groupings, the opposition being represented on the Board. In addition, the Minister is bound every month to provide the G 10 Commission with an account of the measures he has ordered. In practice, he seeks the prior consent of this Commission. The latter decides, ex officio or on application by a person believing himself to be under surveillance, on both the legality of and the necessity for the measures in question; if it declares any measures to be illegal or unnecessary, the Minister must terminate them immediately. The Commission members are appointed for the current term of the Bundestag by the Parliamentary Board after consultation with the Government; they are completely independent in the exercise of their functions and cannot be subject to instructions (see paragraph 21 above).

54. The Government maintain that Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2) does not require judicial control of secret surveillance and that the system of review established under the G 10 does effectively protect the rights of the individual. The applicants, on the other hand, qualify this system as a "form of political control", inadequate in comparison with the principle of judicial control which ought to prevail.

It therefore has to be determined whether the procedures for supervising the ordering and implementation of the restrictive measures are such as to keep the "interference" resulting from the contested legislation to what is "necessary in a democratic society".

55. Review of surveillance may intervene at three stages: when the surveillance is first ordered, while it is being carried out, or after it has been terminated. As regards the first two stages, the very nature and logic of secret surveillance dictate that not only the surveillance itself but also the accompanying review should be effected without the individual's knowledge. Consequently, since the individual will necessarily be prevented from seeking an effective remedy of his own accord or from taking a direct part in any review proceedings, it is essential that the procedures established should themselves provide adequate and equivalent guarantees safeguarding the individual's rights. In addition, the values of a democratic society must be followed as faithfully as possible in the supervisory procedures if the bounds of necessity, within the meaning of Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2), are not to be exceeded. One of the fundamental principles of a democratic society is the rule of law, which is expressly referred to in the Preamble to the Convention (see the Golder judgment of 21 February 1975, Series A no. 18, pp. 16-17, para. 34). The rule of law implies, inter alia, that an interference by the executive authorities with an individual's rights should be subject to an effective control which should normally be assured by the judiciary, at least in the last resort, judicial control offering the best guarantees of independence, impartiality and a proper procedure.

56. Within the system of surveillance established by the G 10, judicial control was excluded, being replaced by an initial control effected by an official qualified for judicial office and by the control provided by the Parliamentary Board and the G 10 Commission.

The Court considers that, in a field where abuse is potentially so easy in individual cases and could have such harmful consequences for democratic society as a whole, it is in principle desirable to entrust supervisory control to a judge.

Nevertheless, having regard to the nature of the supervisory and other safeguards provided for by the G 10, the Court concludes that the exclusion of judicial control does not exceed the limits of what may be deemed necessary in a democratic society. The Parliamentary Board and the G 10 Commission are independent of the authorities carrying out the surveillance, and are vested with sufficient powers and competence to exercise an effective and continuous control. Furthermore, the democratic character is reflected in the balanced membership of the Parliamentary Board. The opposition is represented on this body and is therefore able to participate in the control of the measures ordered by the competent Minister who is responsible to the Bundestag. The two supervisory bodies may, in the circumstances of the case, be regarded as enjoying sufficient independence to give an objective ruling.

The Court notes in addition that an individual believing himself to be under surveillance has the opportunity of complaining to the G 10 Commission and of having recourse to the Constitutional Court (see paragraph 23 above). However, as the Government conceded, these are remedies which can come into play only in exceptional circumstances.

57. As regards review a posteriori, it is necessary to determine whether judicial control, in particular with the individual's participation, should continue to be excluded even after surveillance has ceased. Inextricably linked to this issue is the question of subsequent notification, since there is in principle little scope for recourse to the courts by the individual concerned unless he is advised of the measures taken without his knowledge and thus able retrospectively to challenge their legality.

The applicants' main complaint under Article 8 (art. 8) is in fact that the person concerned is not always subsequently informed after the suspension of surveillance and is not therefore in a position to seek an effective remedy before the courts. Their preoccupation is the danger of measures being improperly implemented without the individual knowing or being able to verify the extent to which his rights have been interfered with. In their view, effective control by the courts after the suspension of surveillance measures is necessary in a democratic society to ensure against abuses; otherwise adequate control of secret surveillance is lacking and the right conferred on individuals under Article 8 (art. 8) is simply eliminated.

In the Government's view, the subsequent notification which must be given since the Federal Constitutional Court's judgment (see paragraphs 11 and 19 above) corresponds to the requirements of Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2). In their submission, the whole efficacy of secret surveillance requires that, both before and after the event, information cannot be divulged if thereby the purpose of the investigation is, or would be retrospectively, thwarted. They stressed that recourse to the courts is no longer excluded after notification has been given, various legal remedies then becoming available to allow the individual, inter alia, to seek redress for any injury suffered (see paragraph 24 above).

58. In the opinion of the Court, it has to be ascertained whether it is even feasible in practice to require subsequent notification in all cases.

The activity or danger against which a particular series of surveillance measures is directed may continue for years, even decades, after the suspension of those measures. Subsequent notification to each individual affected by a suspended measure might well jeopardise the long-term purpose that originally prompted the surveillance. Furthermore, as the Federal Constitutional Court rightly observed, such notification might serve to reveal the working methods and fields of operation of the intelligence services and even possibly to identify their agents. In the Court's view, in so far as the "interference" resulting from the contested legislation is in principle justified under Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2) (see paragraph 48 above), the fact of not informing the individual once surveillance has ceased cannot itself be incompatible with this provision since it is this very fact which ensures the efficacy of the "interference". Moreover, it is to be recalled that, in pursuance of the Federal Constitutional Court's judgment of 15 December 1970, the person concerned must be informed after the termination of the surveillance measures as soon as notification can be made without jeopardising the purpose of the restriction (see paragraphs 11 and 19 above).

59. Both in general and in relation to the question of subsequent notification, the applicants have constantly invoked the danger of abuse as a ground for their contention that the legislation they challenge does not fulfil the requirements of Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2) of the Convention. While the possibility of improper action by a dishonest, negligent or over-zealous official can never be completely ruled out whatever the system, the considerations that matter for the purposes of the Court's present review are the likelihood of such action and the safeguards provided to protect against it.

The Court has examined above (at paragraphs 51 to 58) the contested legislation in the light, inter alia, of these considerations. The Court notes in particular that the G 10 contains various provisions designed to reduce the effect of surveillance measures to an unavoidable minimum and to ensure that the surveillance is carried out in strict accordance with the law. In the absence of any evidence or indication that the actual practice followed is otherwise, the Court must assume that in the democratic society of the Federal Republic of Germany, the relevant authorities are properly applying the legislation in issue.

The Court agrees with the Commission that some compromise between the requirements for defending democratic society and individual rights is inherent in the system of the Convention (see, mutatis mutandis, the judgment of 23 July 1968 in the "Belgian Linguistic" case, Series A no. 6, p. 32, para. 5). As the Preamble to the Convention states, "Fundamental Freedoms ... are best maintained on the one hand by an effective political democracy and on the other by a common understanding and observance of the Human Rights upon which (the Contracting States) depend". In the context of Article 8 (art. 8), this means that a balance must be sought between the exercise by the individual of the right guaranteed to him under paragraph 1 (art. 8-1) and the necessity under paragraph 2 (art. 8-2) to impose secret surveillance for the protection of the democratic society as a whole.

60. In the light of these considerations and of the detailed examination of the contested legislation, the Court concludes that the German legislature was justified to consider the interference resulting from that legislation with the exercise of the right guaranteed by Article 8 para. 1 (art. 8-1) as being necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security and for the prevention of disorder or crime (Article 8 para. 2) (art. 8-2). Accordingly, the Court finds no breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention.

III. ON THE ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 13 (art. 13)

61. The applicants also alleged a breach of Article 13 (art. 13) which provides:

> "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

62. In the applicants' view, the Contracting States are obliged under Article 13 (art. 13) to provide an effective remedy for any alleged breach of the Convention; any other interpretation of this provision would render it meaningless. On the other hand, both the Government and the Commission consider that there is no basis for the application of Article 13 (art. 13) unless a right guaranteed by another Article of the Convention has been violated.

63. In the judgment of 6 February 1976 in the Swedish Engine Drivers' Union case, the Court, having found there to be in fact an effective remedy before a national authority, considered that it was not called upon to rule whether Article 13 (art. 13) was applicable only when a right guaranteed by another Article of the Convention has been violated (Series A no. 20, p. 18, para. 50; see also the De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp judgment of 18 June 1971, Series A no. 12, p. 46, para. 95). The Court proposes in the present case to decide on the applicability of Article 13 (art. 13), before examining, if necessary, the effectiveness of any relevant remedy under German law.

64. Article 13 (art. 13) states that any individual whose Convention rights and freedoms "are violated" is to have an effective remedy before a national authority even where "the violation has been committed" by persons in an official capacity. This provision, read literally, seems to say that a person is entitled to a national remedy only if a "violation" has occurred. However, a person cannot establish a "violation" before a national authority unless he is first able to lodge with such an authority a complaint to that effect. Consequently, as the minority in the Commission stated, it cannot be a prerequisite for the application of Article 13 (art. 13) that the Convention be in fact violated. In the Court's view, Article 13 (art. 13) requires that where an individual considers himself to have been prejudiced by a measure allegedly in breach of the Convention, he should have a remedy before a national authority in order both to have his claim decided and, if appropriate, to obtain redress. Thus Article 13 (art. 13) must be interpreted as guaranteeing an "effective remedy before a national authority" to everyone who claims that his rights and freedoms under the Convention have been violated.

65. Accordingly, although the Court has found no breach of the right guaranteed to the applicants by Article 8 (art. 8), it falls to be ascertained whether German law afforded the applicants "an effective remedy before a national authority" within the meaning of Article 13 (art. 13).

The applicants are not claiming that, in relation to particular surveillance measures actually applied to them, they lacked an effective remedy for alleged violation of their rights under the Convention. Rather, their complaint is directed against what they consider to be a shortcoming in the content of the contested legislation. While conceding that some forms of recourse exist in certain circumstances, they contend that the legislation itself, since it prevents them from even knowing whether their rights under the Convention have been interfered with by a concrete measure of surveillance, thereby denies them in principle an effective remedy under national law. Neither the Commission nor the Government agree with this contention. Consequently, although the applicants are challenging the terms of the legislation itself, the Court must examine, inter alia, what remedies are in fact available under German law and whether these remedies are effective in the circumstances.

66. The Court observes firstly that the applicants themselves enjoyed "an effective remedy", within the meaning of Article 13 (art. 13), in so far as they challenged before the Federal Constitutional Court the conformity of the relevant legislation with their right to respect for correspondence and with their right of access to the courts. Admittedly, that Court examined the applicants' complaints with reference not to the Convention but solely to the Basic Law. It should be noted, however, that the rights invoked by the applicants before the Constitutional Court are substantially the same as those whose violation was alleged before the Convention institutions (cf., mutatis mutandis, the judgment of 6 February 1976 in the Swedish Engine Drivers' Union case, Series A no. 20, p. 18, para. 50). A reading of the judgment of 15 December 1970 reveals that the Constitutional Court carefully examined the complaints brought before it in the light, inter alia, of the fundamental principles and democratic values embodied in the Basic Law.

67. As regards the issue whether there is "an effective remedy" in relation to the implementation of concrete surveillance measures under the G 10, the applicants argued in the first place that to qualify as a "national authority", within the meaning of Article 13 (art. 13), a body should at least be composed of members who are impartial and who enjoy the safeguards of judicial independence. The Government in reply submitted that, in contrast to Article 6 (art. 6), Article 13 (art. 13) does not require a legal remedy through the courts.

In the Court's opinion, the authority referred to in Article 13 (art. 13) may not necessarily in all instances be a judicial authority in the strict sense (see the Golder judgment of 21 February 1975, Series A no. 18, p. 16, para. 33). Nevertheless, the powers and procedural guarantees an authority possesses are relevant in determining whether the remedy before it is effective.

68. The concept of an "effective remedy", in the applicants' submission, presupposes that the person concerned should be placed in a position, by means of subsequent information, to defend himself against any inadmissible encroachment upon his guaranteed rights. Both the Government and the Commission were agreed that no unrestricted right to notification of surveillance measures can be deduced from Article 13 (art. 13) once the contested legislation, including the lack of information, has been held to be "necessary in a democratic society" for any one of the purposes mentioned in Article 8 (art. 8).

The Court has already pointed out that it is the secrecy of the measures which renders it difficult, if not impossible, for the person concerned to seek any remedy of his own accord, particularly while surveillance is in progress (see paragraph 55 above). Secret surveillance and its implications are facts that the Court, albeit to its regret, has held to be necessary, in modern-day conditions in a democratic society, in the interests of national security and for the prevention of disorder or crime (see paragraph 48 above). The Convention is to be read as a whole and therefore, as the Commission indicated in its report, any interpretation of Article 13 (art. 13) must be in harmony with the logic of the Convention. The Court cannot interpret or apply Article 13 (art. 13) so as to arrive at a result tantamount in fact to nullifying its conclusion that the absence of notification to the person concerned is compatible with Article 8 (art. 8) in order to ensure the efficacy of surveillance measures (see paragraphs 58 to 60 above). Consequently, the Court, consistently with its conclusions concerning Article 8 (art. 8), holds that the lack of notification does not, in the circumstances of the case, entail a breach of Article 13 (art. 13).

69. For the purposes of the present proceedings, an "effective remedy" under Article 13 (art. 13) must mean a remedy that is as effective as can be having regard to the restricted scope for recourse inherent in any system of secret surveillance. It therefore remains to examine the various remedies available to the applicants under German law in order to see whether they are "effective" in this limited sense.

70. Although, according to the G 10, there can be no recourse to the courts in respect of the ordering and implementation of restrictive measures, certain other remedies are nevertheless open to the individual believing himself to be under surveillance: he has the opportunity of complaining to the G 10 Commission and to the Constitutional Court (see paragraphs 21 and 23 above). Admittedly, the effectiveness of these remedies is limited and they will in principle apply only in exceptional cases. However, in the circumstances of the present proceedings, it is hard to conceive of more effective remedies being possible.

71. On the other hand, in pursuance of the Federal Constitutional Court’s judgment of 15 December 1970, the competent authority is bound to inform the person concerned as soon as the surveillance measures are discontinued and notification can be made without jeopardising the purpose of the restriction (see paragraphs 11 and 19 above). From the moment of such notification, various legal remedies - before the courts - become available to the individual. According to the information supplied by the Government, the individual may: in an action for a declaration, have reviewed by an administrative court the lawfulness of the application to him of the G 10 and the conformity with the law of the surveillance measures ordered; bring an action for damages in a civil court if he has been prejudiced; bring an action for the destruction or, if appropriate, restitution of documents; finally, if none of these remedies is successful, apply to the Federal Constitutional Court for a ruling as to whether there has been a breach of the Basic Law (see paragraph 24 above).

72. Accordingly, the Court considers that, in the particular circumstances of this case, the aggregate of remedies provided for under German law satisfies the requirements of Article 13 (art. 13).

IV. ON THE ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 6 PARA. 1 (art. 6-1)

73. The applicants finally alleged a breach of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) which provides:

> "In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice."

74. According to the applicants, the surveillance measures which can be taken under the contested legislation amount both to an interference with a "civil right", and to the laying of a "criminal charge" within the meaning of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1). In their submission, the legislation violates this Article (art. 6-1) in so far as it does not require notification to the person concerned in all cases after the termination of surveillance measures and excludes recourse to the courts to test the lawfulness of such measures. On the other hand, both the Government and the Commission concur in thinking that Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) does not apply to the facts of the case under either the "civil" or the "criminal" head.

75. The Court has held that in the circumstances of the present case the G 10 does not contravene Article 8 (art. 8) in authorising a secret surveillance of mail, post and telecommunications subject to the conditions specified (see paragraphs 39 to 60 above).

Since the Court has arrived at this conclusion, the question whether the decisions authorising such surveillance under the G 10 are covered by the judicial guarantee set forth in Article 6 (art. 6) – assuming this Article (art. 6) to be applicable - must be examined by drawing a distinction between two stages: that before, and that after, notification of the termination of surveillance.

As long as it remains validly secret, the decision placing someone under surveillance is thereby incapable of judicial control on the initiative of the person concerned, within the meaning of Article 6 (art. 6); as a consequence, it of necessity escapes the requirements of that Article.

The decision can come within the ambit of the said provision only after discontinuance of the surveillance. According to the information supplied by the Government, the individual concerned, once he has been notified of such discontinuance, has at his disposal several legal remedies against the possible infringements of his rights; these remedies would satisfy the requirements of Article 6 (art. 6) (see paragraphs 24 and 71 above).

The Court accordingly concludes that, even if it is applicable, Article 6 (art. 6) has not been violated.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. holds unanimously that it has jurisdiction to rule on the question whether the applicants can claim to be victims within the meaning of Article 25 (art. 25) of the Convention;

2. holds unanimously that the applicants can claim to be victims within the meaning of the aforesaid Article (art. 25);

3. holds unanimously that there has been no breach of Article 8, Article 13 or Article 6 (art. 8, art. 13, art. 6) of the Convention.

H.P.

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE PINHEIRO FARINHA

(Translation)

I agree with the judgment's conclusions, but on different grounds.

1. The G 10 Act specifies, in Article 1 para. 1, the cases in which the competent authorities may impose restrictions, that is to say, may open and inspect mail and post, read telegraphic messages, listen to and record telephone conversations. It empowers those authorities so to act, inter alia, in order to protect against "imminent dangers" threatening the "free democratic constitutional order", "the existence or the security of the Federation or of a Land", "the security of the (allied) armed forces" stationed on the territory of the Republic and the security of "the troops of one of the Three Powers stationed in the Land of Berlin". According to Article 1 para. 2, these measures may be taken only where there are factual indications (tatsächliche Anhaltspunkte) for suspecting a person of planning, committing, or having committed certain criminal acts punishable under the Criminal Code, such as offences against the peace or security of the State (sub-paragraph 1, no. 1), the democratic order (sub-paragraph 1, no. 2), external security (sub-paragraph 1, no. 3) and the security of the allied armed forces (sub-paragraph 1, no. 5) (see paragraph 17 of the judgment).

For all those persons to whom the G 10 can be applied, the mere facts of its existence creates a very real menace that their exercise of the right to respect for their private and family life and their correspondence may be the subject of surveillance.

Clearly, therefore, a person may claim to be a victim for the purposes of Article 25 (art. 25) of the Convention. Consequently, the applicants have a direct interest (Jose Alberto dos Reis, Codigo do Processo Civil Anotado, vol. 1, p. 77), which is an ideal condition (Carnelutti, Sistemo del diritto processuale civile, vol. 1, pp. 361 and 366) for an application to the Commission.

In my view, the applicants are the victims of a menace and for this reason can claim to be victims within the meaning of Article 25 (art. 25).

2. I would mention in passing one point of concern, namely, that the majority opinion, contained in paragraph 56, could take the interpretation of Article 8 (art. 8) in a direction which, if I may say so, might not be without risk.

The measures are ordered, on written application giving reasons, either by the supreme Land authority in cases falling within its jurisdiction or by a Federal Minister empowered for the purpose by the Chancellor. The Chancellor has entrusted these functions to the Ministers of the Interior and of Defence, each of whom, in the sphere falling within his competence, must personally take the decision as to the application of the measures

Implementation of the measures ordered is supervised by an official qualified for judicial office (Article 1 para. 7, sub-paragraph 1) (see paragraph 20 of the judgment).

I believe that separation of powers is a basic principle of a democratic society and that, since the measures can be ordered where there are mere factual indications that criminal acts are about to be or are in the course of being committed, this principle requires that the measures be ordered by an independent judge - as was in fact contemplated by the German legislature (see paragraph 22 of the judgment).

I have difficulty in accepting that the political authority may decide by itself whether there exist factual indications that criminal acts are about to be or are in the course of being committed.

3. Acting in the general interest, the States, as the High Contracting Parties, safeguard the Convention against any breaches attributable to another State; such breaches can consist in the danger and threat to democracy which the publication of a law in itself may pose.

In cases originating in an application by individuals, it is necessary to show, in addition to the threat or danger, that there has been a specific violation of the Convention of which they claim to be the victims.

There is no doubt that a law can in itself violate the rights of an individual if it is directly applicable to that individual without any specific measure of implementation.

This is the case with a law which denies those who reside in a particular area access to certain educational establishments, and with a law which makes sex education one of the compulsory subjects on the curriculum: these laws are applicable without the need for any implementing measure (see the "Belgian Linguistic" case and the Kjeldsen, Busk Madsen and Pedersen case).

The same does not hold true for the German G 10.

The Act certainly makes provision for telephone-tapping and inspection of mail, although it delimits the scope of such measures and regulates the methods of enforcing them.

Surveillance of an "exploratory" or general kind is not, however, authorised by the legislation in question. If it were, then the Act would be directly applicable.

Instead, the measures cannot be applied without a specific decision by the supreme Land authority or the competent Federal Minister who must, in addition, consider whether there exist any factual indications that a criminal act is about to be or is in the course of being committed.

Thus, only where a surveillance measure has been authorised and taken against a given individual does any question arise of an interference by a public authority with the exercise of that individual's right to respect for his private and family life and his correspondence.

So far as the case sub judice is concerned, on the one hand, the applicants do not know whether the G 10 has in fact been applied to them (see paragraph 12 of the judgment) and, on the other hand, the respondent Government state - and we have no reason to doubt this statement - that "at no time have surveillance measures provided for by the Act passed in pursuance of Article 10 of the Basic Law been ordered or implemented against the applicants.

The applicants have not been subjected to such measures either as persons suspected of one or more of the offences specified in the Act or as third parties within the meaning of Article 1, paragraph 2, sub-paragraph 2, of the G 10.

There is also no question of the applicants' having been indirectly involved in a surveillance measure directed against another person - at least, not in any fashion which would have permitted their identification.

Finally, there is no question of the applicants' having been subjected to surveillance by mistake - for example through confusion over a telephone number -, since in such cases the person concerned is notified of the surveillance measure" (see paragraph 13 of the judgment).

The Court may take into consideration only the case of the applicants (Engel and others judgment of 8 June 1976, Series A no. 22, p. 43, para. 106) and not the situation of other persons not having authorised them to lodge an application with the Commission in their name.

These are the reasons which lead me to conclude, as the Court does, that the case sub judice does not disclose any violation of the Convention.

In the case of Laskey, Jaggard and Brown
v. the United Kingdom (1),

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") and the relevant provisions of Rules of Court A (2), as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr R. Bernhardt, President,
Mr L.-E. Pettiti,
Mr C. Russo,
Mr A. Spielmann,
Sir John Freeland,
Mr M.A. Lopes Rocha,
Mr L. Wildhaber,
Mr P. Kuris,
Mr E. Levits,

Having deliberated in private on 28 October 1996 and 20 January 1997,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

1. The case is numbered 109/1995/615/703-705. The first number is the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court in the relevant year (second number). The last two numbers indicate the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court since its creation and on the list of the corresponding originating applications to the Commission.

2. Rules A apply to all cases referred to the Court before the entry into force of Protocol No. 9 (P9) (1 October 1994) and thereafter only to cases concerning States not bound by that Protocol (P9). They correspond to the Rules that came into force on 1 January 1983, as amended several times subsequently.

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 11 December 1995, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 para. 1 and Article 47 of the Convention (art. 32-1, art. 47). It originated in three applications (nos. 21627/93, 21826/93 and 21974/93) against the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland lodged with the Commission under Article 25 (art. 25) on 14 December 1992 by three British nationals, Mr Colin Laskey, Mr Roland Jaggard and Mr Anthony Brown.

The Commission's request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) and to the declaration whereby the United Kingdom recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46)

(art. 46). The object of the request was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8).

2. In response to the enquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 para. 3 (d) of Rules of Court A, the late Mr Laskey's father and the two other applicants stated that they wished to take part in the proceedings and designated the lawyers who would represent them (Rule 30).

3. The Chamber to be constituted included ex officio Sir John Freeland, the elected judge of British nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr R. Bernhardt, the Vice-President of the Court (Rule 21 para. 4 (b)). On 8 February 1996, in the presence of the Registrar, the President of the Court, Mr R. Ryssdal, drew by lot the names of the other seven members, namely Mr L.-E. Pettiti, Mr C. Russo, Mr A. Spielmann, Mr M.A. Lopes Rocha, Mr L. Wildhaber, Mr P. Kuris and Mr E. Levits (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 para. 5) (art. 43).

4. As President of the Chamber (Rule 21 para. 6), Mr Bernhardt, acting through the Registrar, consulted the Agent of the United Kingdom Government ("the Government"), the applicants' lawyers and the Delegate of the Commission on the organisation of the proceedings (Rules 37 para. 1 and 38). Pursuant to the orders made in consequence, the Registrar received the Government's and the applicants' memorials on 2 and 15 July 1996 respectively.

5. On 17 July 1996, the President granted leave to Rights International, a New York-based non-governmental human rights organisation, to submit written comments on specified aspects of the case (Rule 37 para. 2). The comments were received on 16 August 1996.

6. In accordance with the President's decision, the hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 21 October 1996. The Court had held a preparatory meeting beforehand.

There appeared before the Court:

(a) for the Government

Mr I. Christie, Assistant Legal Adviser,
Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Agent,
Mr D. Pannick QC,
Mr M. Shaw, Counsel,
Mr S. Bramley,
Ms B. Moxon, Advisers;

(b) for the Commission

Mr G. Ress, Delegate;

(c) for the applicants

Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC,
Ms A. Worrall QC, Counsel,
Mr D. Jonas,
Mr A. Hamilton,
Mr I. Geffen, Solicitors,

Mr J. Wadham, Adviser.

The Court heard addresses by Mr Ress, Lord Lester of Herne Hill, Ms Worrall and Mr Pannick.

AS TO THE FACTS

I. The circumstances of the case

7. Mr Laskey, Mr Jaggard and Mr Brown, all British citizens, were born in 1943, 1947 and 1935 respectively. Mr Laskey died on 14 May 1996.

8. In 1987, in the course of routine investigations into other matters, the police came into possession of a number of video films which were made during sado-masochistic encounters involving the applicants and as many as forty-four other homosexual men. As a result the applicants, with several other men, were charged with a series of offences, including assault and wounding, relating to sado-masochistic activities that had taken place over a ten-year period. One of the charges involved a defendant who was not yet 21 years old - the age of consent to male homosexual practices at the time. Although the instances of assault were very numerous, the prosecution limited the counts to a small number of exemplary charges.

The acts consisted in the main of maltreatment of the genitalia (with, for example, hot wax, sandpaper, fish hooks and needles) and ritualistic beatings either with the assailant's bare hands or a variety of implements, including stinging nettles, spiked belts and a cat-o'-nine tails. There were instances of branding and infliction of injuries which resulted in the flow of blood and which left scarring.

These activities were consensual and were conducted in private for no apparent purpose other than the achievement of sexual gratification. The infliction of pain was subject to certain rules including the provision of a code word to be used by any "victim" to stop an "assault", and did not lead to any instances of infection, permanent injury or the need for medical attention.

9. The activities took place at a number of locations, including rooms equipped as torture chambers. Video cameras were used to record events and the tapes copied and distributed amongst members of the group. The prosecution was largely based on the contents of those videotapes. There was no suggestion that the tapes had been sold or used other than by members of the group.

10. The applicants pleaded guilty to the assault charges after the trial judge ruled that they could not rely on the consent of the "victims" as an answer to the prosecution case.

11. On 19 December 1990, the defendants were convicted and sentenced to terms of imprisonment. On passing sentence, the trial judge commented: "... the unlawful conduct now before the court would be dealt with equally in the prosecution of heterosexuals or bisexuals if carried out by them. The homosexuality of the defendants is only the background against which the case must be viewed."

Mr Laskey was sentenced to imprisonment for four years and six months. This included a sentence of four years' imprisonment for aiding and abetting keeping a disorderly house (see paragraph 31 below) and a consecutive term of six months' imprisonment for possession of an indecent photograph of a child. Under section 47 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 ("the 1861 Act" - see paragraph 27 below), Mr Laskey also received concurrent sentences of twelve months' imprisonment in respect of various counts of assault occasioning actual bodily harm and aiding and abetting assault occasioning actual bodily harm.

12. Mr Jaggard was sentenced to imprisonment for three years. He received two years' imprisonment for aiding and abetting unlawful wounding - contrary to section 20 of the 1861 Act (see paragraph 25 below) -, and a further twelve months' imprisonment for assault occasioning actual bodily harm, aiding and abetting the same offence, and unlawful wounding.

13. Mr Brown was sentenced to imprisonment for two years and nine months. He received twelve months' imprisonment for aiding and abetting assault occasioning actual bodily harm, a further nine months' imprisonment for assault occasioning actual bodily harm, and a further twelve months' imprisonment for further assaults occasioning actual bodily harm.

14. The applicants appealed against conviction and sentence.

15. On 19 February 1992, the Court of Appeal, Criminal Division, dismissed the appeals against conviction. Since, however, the court found that the applicants did not appreciate that their actions in inflicting injuries were criminal, reduced sentences were imposed.

16. Mr Laskey's sentence was thus reduced to eighteen months' imprisonment as regards the charge of aiding and abetting keeping a disorderly house. This sentence was to run concurrently with another three months' sentence in respect of the various counts of assault and consecutively with six months' imprisonment for the possession of an indecent photograph of a child, totalling two years' imprisonment.

17. Mr Jaggard's and Mr Brown's sentences were reduced to six months' and three months' imprisonment respectively.

18. The applicants appealed to the House of Lords on the following certified point of law of public importance:

> "Where A wounds or assaults B occasioning him actual bodily harm in the course of a sado-masochistic encounter, does the prosecution have to prove lack of consent on the part of B before they can establish A's guilt under section 20 or section 47 of the 1861 Act?"

19. On 11 March 1993, the appeal, known as the case of R. v. Brown ([1993] 2 All England Law Reports 75), was dismissed by a majority of the House of Lords, two of the five law lords dissenting.

20. Lord Templeman, in the majority, held after reviewing the case-law that:

> "... the authorities dealing with the intentional infliction of bodily harm do not establish that consent is a defence to a charge under the Act of 1861. They establish that consent is a defence to the infliction of bodily harm in the course of some lawful activities. The question is whether the defence should be extended to the infliction of bodily harm in the course of sado-masochistic encounters ...

Counsel for the appellants argued that consent should provide a defence ... because it was said every person has a right to deal with his own body as he chooses. I do not consider that this slogan provides a sufficient guide to the policy decision which must now be taken. It is an offence for a person to abuse his own body and mind by taking drugs. Although the law is often broken, the criminal law restrains a practice which is regarded as dangerous and injurious to individuals and which if allowed and extended is harmful to society generally. In any event the appellants in this case did not mutilate their own bodies. They inflicted harm on willing victims ...

In principle there is a difference between violence which is incidental and violence which is inflicted for the indulgence of cruelty. The violence of sado-masochistic encounters involves the indulgence of cruelty by sadists and the degradation of victims. Such violence is injurious to the participants and unpredictably dangerous. I am not prepared to invent a defence of consent for sado-masochistic encounters which breed and glorify cruelty ...

Society is entitled and bound to protect itself against a cult of violence. Pleasure derived from the infliction of pain is an evil thing. Cruelty is uncivilised."

21. Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle found that:

"In my view the line falls properly to be drawn between assault at common law and the offence of assault occasioning actual bodily harm created by section 47 of the 1861 Act, with the result that consent of the victim is no answer to anyone charged with the latter offence ... unless the circumstances fall within one of the well known exceptions such as organised sporting contests or games, parental chastisement or reasonable surgery ... the infliction of actual or more serious bodily harm is an unlawful activity to which consent is no answer.

... Notwithstanding the views which I have come to, I think it right to say something about the submissions that consent to the activity of the appellants would not be injurious to the public interest.

Considerable emphasis was placed by the appellants on the well-ordered and secret manner in which their activities were conducted and upon the fact that these activities had resulted in no injuries which required medical attention. There was, it was said, no question of proselytising by the appellants. This latter submission sits ill with the following passage in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice:

> 'They [Laskey and Cadman] recruited new participants; they jointly organised proceedings at the house where much of this activity took place; where much of the pain inflicting equipment was stored.
> Cadman was a voyeur rather than a sado-masochist, but both he and Laskey through their operations at the

> Horwich premises were responsible in part for the corruption of a youth "K" who is now it seems settled into a normal heterosexual relationship.'

Be that as it may, in considering the public interest it would be wrong to look only at the activities of the appellants alone, there being no suggestion that they and their associates are the only practitioners of homosexual sado-masochism in England and Wales. This House must therefore consider the possibility that these activities are practised by others and by others who are not so controlled or responsible as the appellants are claiming to be. Without going into details of all the rather curious activities in which the appellants engaged it would appear to be good luck rather than good judgment which has prevented serious injury from occurring. Wounds can easily become septic if not properly treated, the free flow of blood from a person who is HIV-positive or who has AIDS can infect another and an inflicter who is carried away by sexual excitement or by drink or drugs could very easily inflict pain and injury beyond the level to which the receiver had consented. Your Lordships have no information as to whether such situations have occurred in relation to other sado-masochistic practitioners. It was no doubt these dangers which caused Lady Mallalieu to restrict her propositions in relation to the public interest to the actual rather than the potential result of the activity. In my view such a restriction is quite unjustified. When considering the public interest potential for harm is just as relevant as actual harm. As Mathew J. said in Coney 8 Queen's Bench 534, 547:

> 'There is however abundant authority for saying that no consent can render that innocent which is in fact dangerous.'

Furthermore, the possibility of proselytisation and corruption of young men is a real danger even in the case of these appellants and the taking of video recordings of such activities suggests that secrecy may not be as strict as the appellants claimed to your Lordships."

22. Lord Mustill and Lord Slynn of Hadley dissented. The first considered that the case should not be treated as falling within the criminal law of violence but rather within the criminal law of private sexual relations. He gave weight to the arguments of the appellants concerning Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8), finding that the decisions of the European authorities clearly favoured the right of the appellants to conduct their private life undisturbed by the criminal law. He considered after an examination of the relevant case-law that it was appropriate for the House of Lords to tackle afresh the question whether public interest required penalising the infliction of this degree of harm in private on a consenting recipient, where the purpose was not profit but gratification of sexual desire. He found no convincing argument on grounds of health (alleged risk of infections or spread of AIDS), the alleged risk of the activities getting out of hand or any possible risk of corruption of youth which might require the offences under the 1861 Act to be interpreted as applying to this conduct.

23. Lord Slynn of Hadley found that as the law stood adults were able to consent to acts done in private which did not result in serious bodily harm. He agreed that it was in the end a matter of policy in an area where social and moral factors were extremely important and where attitudes could change. It was however for the legislature to decide whether such conduct should be brought within the criminal law and not for the courts in the interests of "paternalism" to introduce into existing statutory crimes relating to offences against the person concepts which did not properly fit there.

24. The proceedings were given widespread press coverage. All the applicants lost their jobs and Mr Jaggard required extensive psychiatric treatment.

II. Relevant domestic law and practice

A. Offences against the persons

1. The Offences against the Person Act 1861

25. Section 20 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 ("the 1861 Act") provides:

> "Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously wound or inflict any grievous bodily harm upon any other person, either with or without any weapon or instrument, ... shall be liable ... to [imprisonment] ... for not more than five years."

26. According to the case-law, to constitute a wound for the purposes of the section, the whole skin must be broken, not merely the outer layer or epidermis.

27. By section 47 of the 1861 Act:

> "Whosoever shall be convicted on indictment of any assault occasioning actual bodily harm shall be liable ... to imprisonment for not more than five years."

Actual bodily harm is defined as "any hurt or injury calculated to interfere with health or comfort" (Liksey J, in R. v. Miller [1954] 2 Queen's Bench Reports 282, at 292).

2. Case-law prior to R. v. Brown

28. In the case of R. v. Donovan ([1934] 2 King's Bench Reports, at 498), the accused had beaten with a cane a girl for the purposes of sexual gratification, with her consent. Swift J held:

> "It is an unlawful act to beat another person with such a degree of violence that the infliction of actual bodily harm is a probable consequence, and when such an act is proved, consent is immaterial."

29. In Attorney-General's Reference (No. 6 of 1980) ([1980] Queen's Bench Reports, at 715) where two men quarrelled and decided to fight each other, Lord Lane CJ in the Court of Appeal had held:

> "It is not in the public interest that people should try to cause or should cause each other actual bodily harm for no good reason. Minor struggles are another matter. So, in our judgment, it is immaterial whether the act occurs in private or in public; it is an assault if actual bodily harm is intended and/or caused. This means that most fights will be unlawful regardless of consent. Nothing which we have said is intended to cast doubt upon the accepted legality of properly conducted games and sports, lawful chastisement or correction, reasonable surgical interference, dangerous exhibitions, etc. These apparent exceptions can be justified as involving the exercise of a legal right, in the case of chastisement or correction, or as needed in the public interest, in the other cases."

3. Case-law subsequent to R. v. Brown

30. In R. v. Wilson ([1996] 3 Weekly Law Reports, at 125), where a man had been convicted of assault occasioning actual bodily harm for having branded his initials with a hot knife on his wife's buttocks with her consent, the Court of Appeal, Criminal Division, allowed the appeal. In the course of the court's judgment, Lord Justice Russell stated:

"... there is no factual comparison to be made between the instant case and the facts of either Donovan or Brown: Mrs Wilson not only consented to that which the appellant did, she instigated it. There was no aggressive intent on the part of the appellant ...

We do not think that we are entitled to assume that the method adopted by the appellant and his wife was any more dangerous or painful than tattooing ...

Consensual activity between husband and wife, in the privacy of the matrimonial home, is not, in our judgment, a proper matter for criminal investigation, let alone criminal prosecution."

B. Offences against public decency

31. Keeping a "disorderly house" is a common law offence. A disorderly house is defined as

"one which is not regulated by the restraints of morality and which is so conducted as to violate law and good order. There must be an element of 'open house', but it does not need to be open for the public at large ... Where indecent performances or exhibitions are alleged as rendering the premises a disorderly house, it must be proved that matters are there performed or exhibited of such a character that their performance or exhibition in a place of common resort (a) amounts to an outrage of public decency, or (b) tends to corrupt or deprave, or (c) is otherwise calculated to injure the public interest so as to call for condemnation and punishment" ([1996] Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice 20, at 224).

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

32. Mr Laskey, Mr Jaggard and Mr Brown applied to the Commission on 14 December 1992. They relied on Articles 7 and 8 of the Convention (art. 7, art. 8), complaining that their convictions were the result of an unforeseeable application of a provision of the criminal law which, in any event, amounted to an unlawful and unjustifiable interference with their right to respect for their private life.

33. On 18 January 1995, the Commission declared the applications (nos. 21627/93, 21826/93 and 21974/93) admissible as to the complaint under Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8). In its report of 26 October 1995 (Article 31) (art. 31), it expressed the opinion, by eleven votes to seven, that there had been no violation of that provision (art. 8).

The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the two separate opinions contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to this judgment (1).

FINAL SUBMISSIONS TO THE COURT

34. At the hearing, the Government invited the Court to agree with the majority of the Commission that there had been no breach of the Convention in this case.

The applicants, for their part, asked the Court to consider the position of each individual applicant upon the basis of the agreed facts and the charges which were pertinent to them and to find a violation of their right to respect for their private lives through the expression of their sexual personality, as guaranteed by Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8).

AS TO THE LAW

ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 OF THE CONVENTION (art. 8)

35. The applicants contended that their prosecution and convictions for assault and wounding in the course of consensual sado-masochistic activities between adults was in breach of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8), which provides:

> "1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

It was common ground among those appearing before the Court that the criminal proceedings against the applicants which resulted in their conviction constituted an "interference by a public authority" with the applicants' right to respect for their private life. It was similarly undisputed that the interference had been "in accordance with the law". Furthermore, the Commission and the applicants accepted the Government's assertion that the interference pursued the legitimate aim of the "protection of health or morals", within the meaning of the second paragraph of Article 8 (art. 8-2).

36. The Court observes that not every sexual activity carried out behind closed doors necessarily falls within the scope of Article 8 (art. 8). In the present case, the applicants were involved in consensual sado-masochistic activities for purposes of sexual gratification. There can be no doubt that sexual orientation and activity concern an intimate aspect of private life (see, mutatis mutandis, the Dudgeon v. the United Kingdom judgment of 22 October 1981, Series A no. 45, p. 21, para. 52). However, a considerable number of people were involved in the activities in question which included, inter alia, the recruitment of new "members", the provision of several specially equipped "chambers", and the shooting of many videotapes which were distributed among the "members" (see paragraphs 8 and 9 above). It may thus be open to question whether the sexual activities of the applicants fell entirely within the notion of "private life" in the particular circumstances of the case.

However, since this point has not been disputed by those appearing before it, the Court sees no reason to examine it of its own motion in the present case. Assuming, therefore, that the prosecution and conviction of the applicants amounted to an interference with their private life, the question arises whether such an interference was "necessary in a democratic society" within the meaning of the second paragraph of Article 8 (art. 8-2).

37. The applicants maintained that the interference in issue could not be regarded as "necessary in a democratic society". This submission was contested by the Government and by a majority of the Commission.

38. In support of their submission, the applicants alleged that all those involved in the sado-masochistic encounters were willing adult participants; that participation in the acts complained of was carefully restricted and controlled and was limited to persons with like-minded sado-masochistic proclivities; that the acts were not witnessed by the public at large and that there was no danger or likelihood that they would ever be so witnessed; that no serious or permanent injury had been sustained, no infection had been caused to the wounds, and that no medical treatment had been required. Furthermore, no complaint was ever made to the police - who learnt about the applicants' activities by chance (see paragraph 8 above).

The potential for severe injury or for moral corruption was regarded by the applicants as a matter of speculation. To the extent that issues of public morality had arisen - with reference to Mr Laskey's conviction for keeping a disorderly house and for the possession of an indecent photograph of a child (see paragraph 11 above) - these had been dealt with under the relevant sexual offences provisions and appropriately punished. In any event, such issues fell outside the scope of the case as presented before the Court.

39. The applicants submitted that their case should be viewed as one involving matters of sexual expression, rather than violence. With due regard to this consideration, the line beyond which consent is no defence to physical injury should only be drawn at the level of intentional or reckless causing of serious disabling injury.

40. For the Government, the State was entitled to punish acts of violence, such as those for which the applicants were convicted, that could not be considered of a trifling or transient nature, irrespective of the consent of the victim. In fact, in the present case, some of these acts could well be compared to "genital torture" and a Contracting State could not be said to have an obligation to tolerate acts of torture because they are committed in the context of a consenting sexual relationship. The State was moreover entitled to prohibit activities because of their potential danger.

The Government further contended that the criminal law should seek to deter certain forms of behaviour on public-health grounds but also for broader moral reasons. In this respect, acts of torture - such as those in issue in the present case - may be banned also on the ground that they undermine the respect which human beings should confer upon each other. In any event, the whole issue of the role of consent in the criminal law is of great complexity and the Contracting States should enjoy a wide margin of appreciation to consider all the public-policy options.

41. The Commission noted that the injuries that were or could be caused by the applicants' activities were of a significant nature and degree, and that the conduct in question was, on any view, of an extreme character. The State authorities therefore acted within their margin of appreciation in order to protect its citizens from real risk of serious physical harm or injury.

42. According to the Court's established case-law, the notion of necessity implies that the interference corresponds to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued; in determining whether an interference is "necessary in a democratic society", the Court will take into account that a margin of appreciation is left to the national authorities (see, inter alia, the Olsson v. Sweden (no. 1) judgment of 24 March 1988, Series A no. 130, pp. 31-32, para. 67), whose decision remains subject to review by the Court for conformity with the requirements of the Convention.

The scope of this margin of appreciation is not identical in each case but will vary according to the context. Relevant factors include the nature of the Convention right in issue, its importance for the individual and the nature of the activities concerned (see the Buckley v. the United Kingdom judgment of 25 September 1996, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1996-IV, pp. 1291-92, para. 74).

43. The Court considers that one of the roles which the State is unquestionably entitled to undertake is to seek to regulate, through the operation of the criminal law, activities which involve the infliction of physical harm. This is so whether the activities in question occur in the course of sexual conduct or otherwise.

44. The determination of the level of harm that should be tolerated by the law in situations where the victim consents is in the first instance a matter for the State concerned since what is at stake is related, on the one hand, to public health considerations and to the general deterrent effect of the criminal law, and, on the other, to the personal autonomy of the individual.

45. The applicants have contended that, in the circumstances of the case, the behaviour in question formed part of private morality which is not the State's business to regulate. In their submission the matters for which they were prosecuted and convicted concerned only private sexual behaviour.

The Court is not persuaded by this submission. It is evident from the facts established by the national courts that the applicants' sado-masochistic activities involved a significant degree of injury or wounding which could not be characterised as trifling or transient. This, in itself, suffices to distinguish the present case from those applications which have previously been examined by the Court concerning consensual homosexual behaviour in private between adults where no such feature was present (see the Dudgeon judgment cited above, the Norris v. Ireland judgment of 26 October 1988, Series A no. 142, and the Modinos v. Cyprus judgment of 22 April 1993, Series A no. 259).

46. Nor does the Court accept the applicants' submission that no prosecution should have been brought against them since their injuries were not severe and since no medical treatment had been required.

In deciding whether or not to prosecute, the State authorities were entitled to have regard not only to the actual seriousness of the harm caused - which as noted above was considered to be significant - but also, as stated by Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle (see paragraph 21 above), to the potential for harm inherent in the acts in question. In this respect it is recalled that the activities were considered by Lord Templeman to be "unpredictably dangerous" (see paragraph 20 above).

47. The applicants have further submitted that they were singled out partly because of the authorities' bias against homosexuals. They referred to the recent judgment in the Wilson case (see paragraph 30 above), where, in their view, similar behaviour in the context of a heterosexual couple was not considered to deserve criminal punishment.

The Court finds no evidence in support of the applicants' allegations in either the conduct of the proceedings against them or the judgment of the House of Lords. In this respect it recalls the remark of the trial judge when passing sentence that "the unlawful conduct now before the court would be dealt with equally in the prosecution of heterosexuals or bisexuals if carried out by them" (see paragraph 11 above).

Moreover, it is clear from the judgment of the House of Lords that the opinions of the majority were based on the extreme nature of the practices involved and not the sexual proclivities of the applicants (see paragraphs 20 and 21 above).

In any event, like the Court of Appeal, the Court does not consider that the facts in the Wilson case were at all comparable in seriousness to those in the present case (see paragraph 30 above).

48. Accordingly, the Court considers that the reasons given by the national authorities for the measures taken in respect of the applicants were relevant and sufficient for the purposes of Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2).

49. It remains to be ascertained whether these measures were proportionate to the legitimate aim or aims pursued.

The Court notes that the charges of assault were numerous and referred to illegal activities which had taken place over more than ten years. However, only a few charges were selected for inclusion in the prosecution case. It further notes that, in recognition of the fact that the applicants did not appreciate their actions to be criminal, reduced sentences were imposed on appeal (see paragraphs 15-17 above). In these circumstances, bearing in mind the degree of organisation involved in the offences, the measures taken against the applicants cannot be regarded as disproportionate.

50. In sum, the Court finds that the national authorities were entitled to consider that the prosecution and conviction of the applicants were necessary in a democratic society for the protection of health within the meaning of Article 8 para. 2 of the Convention (art. 8-2).

51. In view of this conclusion the Court, like the Commission, does not find it necessary to determine whether the interference with the applicants' right to respect for private life could also be justified on the ground of the protection of morals. This finding, however, should not be understood as calling into question the prerogative of the State on moral grounds to seek to deter acts of the kind in question.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY

Holds that there has been no violation of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8).

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE PETTITI

I concurred with all my colleagues in finding that there had been no violation of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8). However, my reasoning differs from theirs in some respects.

Firstly, the Court implicitly accepted that Article 8 (art. 8) was applicable since it assumed there had been an interference, and the application referred to State interference under Article 8 (art. 8): "the institution of criminal proceedings infringed that Article (art. 8)."

In my view, that Article (art. 8) was not even applicable in the instant case. The concept of private life cannot be stretched indefinitely.

Not every aspect of private life automatically qualifies for protection under the Convention. The fact that the behaviour concerned takes place on private premises does not suffice to ensure complete immunity and impunity. Not everything that happens behind closed doors is necessarily acceptable. It is already the case in criminal law that the "rape" of a spouse where there is doubt whether consent was given may lead to prosecution. Other types of behaviour may give rise to civil proceedings (internal telephone tapping for example). Sexual acts and abuse, even when not criminal, give rise to liability.

The case could have been looked at differently, both in domestic law and subsequently under the Convention. Can one consider that adolescents taking part in sado-masochistic activities have given their free and informed consent where their elders have used various means of enticement, including financial reward?

In domestic law, sado-masochistic activities could be made the subject of a specific criminal offence without that being contrary to Article 8 (art. 8) of the European Convention on Human Rights.

It seems to me that the wording used by the Court in paragraph 42 is too vague. The margin of appreciation has been used by the Court mainly in dealing with issues of morals or problems of civil society, but above all so as to afford better protection to others; consequently, a reference to the Müller and Others v. Switzerland judgment would have been preferable to the reference to the Buckley v. the United Kingdom judgment (see Olivier de Schutter's commentary on that judgment in Revue trimestrielle des droits de l'homme, Brussels, 1997, pp. 64-93).

It seemed to me necessary to expand paragraph 43 by noting "to regulate and punish practices of sexual abuse that are demeaning even if they do not involve the infliction of physical harm".

The dangers of unrestrained permissiveness, which can lead to debauchery, paedophilia (see paragraph 11 of the judgment) or the torture of others, were highlighted at the Stockholm World Conference. The protection of private life means the protection of a person's intimacy and dignity, not the protection of his baseness or the promotion of criminal immoralism.

Having deliberated in private on 22 and 23 February and on 27 June 1984,

PROCEDURE

1. The present case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 16 May 1983, within the period of three months laid down by Article 32 para. 1 and Article 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention"). The case originated in an application (no. 8691/79) against the United Kingdom of Great Britain and

* Note by the registry: The revised Rules of Court, which entered into force on 1 January 1983, are applicable to the present case.

Northern Ireland lodged with the Commission on 19 July 1979 under Article 25 (art. 25) by a United Kingdom citizen, Mr. James Malone.

2. The Commission's request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) and to the declaration whereby the United Kingdom recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46). The object of the request was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Articles 8 and 13 (art. 8, art. 13) of the Convention.

3. In response to the inquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 para. 3 (d) of the Rules of Court, Mr. Malone stated that he wished to participate in the proceedings pending before the Court and designated the lawyers who would represent him (Rule 30).

4. The Chamber of seven judges to be constituted included, as ex officio members, Sir Vincent Evans, the elected judge of British nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr. G. Wiarda, the President of the Court (Rule 21 para. 3 (b)). On 27 May 1983, the President of the Court drew by lot, in the presence of the Registrar, the names of the five other members, namely Mr. M. Zekia, Mrs. D. Bindschedler-Robert, Mr. G. Lagergren, Mr. R. Bernhardt and Mr. J. Gersing (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 para. 4) (art. 43) .

Mr. Zekia and Mr. Bernhardt, who were prevented from taking part in the consideration of the case, were subsequently replaced by Mr. B. Walsh and Mr. E. García de Enterría, substitute judges (Rules 22 para. 1 and 24 para. 1).

5. Mr. Wiarda assumed the office of President of the Chamber (Rule 21 para. 5). He ascertained, through the Registrar, the views of the Agent of the Government of the United Kingdom ("the Government"), the Delegate of the Commission and the lawyers for the applicant regarding the need for a written procedure. On 24 June, he directed that the Agent and the lawyers for the applicant should each have until 16 September to file a memorial and that the Delegate should be entitled to file, within two months from the date of the transmission to him by the Registrar of whichever of the aforesaid documents should last be filed, a memorial in reply (Rule 37 para. 1).

On 14 September, the President extended until 14 October each of the time-limits granted to the Agent and the applicant's lawyers.

6. The Government's memorial was received at the registry on 14 October, the applicant's memorial on 25 October. The Secretary to the Commission informed the Registrar by letter received on 22 December that the Delegate did not wish to file any written reply to these memorials but would be presenting his comments at the hearings.

7. On 27 October, the Chamber unanimously decided to relinquish jurisdiction forthwith in favour of the plenary Court (Rule 50). On the same day, after consulting, through the Registrar, the Agent of the Government, the Delegate of the Commission and the lawyers for the applicant, the President of the Court directed that the oral proceedings should open on 20 February 1984 (Rule 38).

8. By letter received on 6 October 1983, the Post Office Engineering Union ("the POEU") requested leave under Rule 37 para. 2 to submit written comments, indicating, inter alia, its "specific occupational interest" in the case and five themes it would want to develop in written comments. On 3 November, the President granted leave but on narrower terms than those sought: he specified that the comments should bear solely on certain of the matters referred to in the POEU's list of proposed themes and then only "in so far as such matters relate to the particular issues of alleged violation of the Convention which are before the Court for decision in the Malone case". He further directed that the comments should be filed not later than 3 January 1984.

On 16 December 1983, this time-limit was extended by the President by three weeks. The POEU's comments were received at the registry on 26 January 1984.

9. On 17 February 1984, the lawyers for the applicant filed the applicant's claims for just satisfaction under Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention. On the same day, the Government supplied two documents whose production the Registrar had asked for on the instructions of the President. By letter received on 19 February, the Government, with a view to facilitating the hearings the following day, gave a clarification regarding a certain matter in the case.

10. The hearings were held in public at the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 20 February. Immediately prior to their opening, the Court had held a preparatory meeting.

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government
  Mr. M. EATON, Legal Counsellor,
  Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Agent,
  Sir Michael HAVERS, Q.C., M.P., Attorney General,
  Mr. N. BRATZA, Barrister-at-Law, Counsel,
  Mr. H. STEEL, Law Officers' Department,
  Mrs. S. EVANS, Legal Adviser, Home Office, Advisers;
- for the Commission
  Mr. C. NØRGAARD, President of the Commission, Delegate;
- for the applicant
  Mr. C. ROSS-MUNRO, Q.C.,
  Mr. D. SEROTA, Barrister-at-Law, Counsel.

The Court heard addresses by Sir Michael Havers for the Government, by Mr. Nørgaard for the Commission and by Mr. Ross-Munro for the applicant, as well as their replies to its questions.

11. On 27 February, in fulfilment of an undertaking given at the hearing, the Government supplied copies of extracts from a document which had been referred to in argument at the hearing. By letter received on 5 June, they notified the Registrar of an amendment to this document.

AS TO THE FACTS

I. PARTICULAR CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

12. Mr. James Malone was born in 1937 and is resident in Dorking, Surrey. In 1977, he was an antique dealer. It appears that he has since ceased business as such.

13. On 22 March 1977, Mr. Malone was charged with a number of offences relating to dishonest handling of stolen goods. His trial, which took place in June and August 1978, resulted in his being acquitted on certain counts and the jury disagreeing on the rest. He was retried on the remaining charges between April and May 1979. Following a further failure by the jury to agree, he was once more formally arraigned; the prosecution offered no evidence and he was acquitted.

14. During the first trial, it emerged that details of a telephone conversation to which Mr. Malone had been a party prior to 22 March 1977 were contained in the note-book of the police officer in charge of the investigations. Counsel for the prosecution then accepted that this conversation had been intercepted on the authority of a warrant issued by the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

15. In October 1978, the applicant instituted civil proceedings in the Chancery Division of the High Court against the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, seeking, inter alia, declarations to the effect that interception, monitoring and recording of conversations on his telephone lines without his consent was unlawful, even if done pursuant to a warrant of the Secretary of State. The Solicitor General intervened in the proceedings on behalf of the Secretary of State but without being made a party. On 28 February 1979, the Vice-Chancellor, Sir Robert Megarry, dismissed the applicant's claim (Malone v. Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis (No. 2), [1979] 2 All England Law Reports 620; also reported at [1979] 2 Weekly Law Reports 700). An account of this judgment is set out below (at paragraphs 31-36).

16. The applicant further believed that both his correspondence and his telephone calls had been intercepted for a number of years. He based his belief on delay to and signs of interference with his correspondence. In particular, he produced to the Commission bundles of envelopes which had been delivered to him either sealed with an adhesive tape of an identical kind or in an unsealed state. As to his telephone communications, he stated that he had heard unusual noises on his telephone and alleged that the police had at times been in possession of information which they could only have obtained by telephone tapping. He thought that such measures had continued since his acquittal on the charges against him.

It was admitted by the Government that the single conversation about which evidence emerged at the applicant's trial had been intercepted on behalf of the police pursuant to a warrant issued under the hand of the Secretary of State for the prevention and detection of crime. According to the Government, this interception was carried out in full conformity with the law and the relevant procedures. No disclosure was made either at the trial of the applicant or during the course of the applicant's proceedings against the Commissioner of Police as to whether the applicant's own telephone number had been tapped or as to whether other and, if so, what other, telephone conversations to which the applicant was a party had been intercepted. The primary reasons given for withholding this information were that disclosure would or might frustrate the purpose of telephone interceptions and might also serve to identify other sources of police information, particularly police informants, and thereby place in jeopardy the source in question. For similar reasons, the Government declined to disclose before the Commission or the Court to what extent, if at all, the applicant's telephone calls and correspondence had been intercepted on behalf of the police authorities. It was however denied that the resealing with adhesive tape or the delivery unsealed of the envelopes produced to the Commission was attributable directly or indirectly to any interception. The Government conceded that, as the applicant was at the material time suspected by the police of being concerned in the receiving of stolen property and in particular of stolen antiques, he was one of a class of persons against whom measures of interception were liable to be employed.

17. In addition, Mr. Malone believed that his telephone had been "metered" on behalf of the police by a device which automatically records all numbers dialled. As evidence for this belief, he asserted that when he was charged in March 1977 the premises of about twenty people whom he had recently telephoned were searched by the police. The Government affirmed that the police had neither caused the applicant's telephone calls to be metered nor undertaken the alleged or any search operations on the basis of any list of numbers obtained from metering.

18. In September 1978, the applicant requested the Post Office and the complaints department of the police to remove suspected listening devices from his telephone. The Post Office and the police both replied that they had no authority in the matter.

II. RELEVANT LAW AND PRACTICE

A. Introduction

19. The following account is confined to the law and practice in England and Wales relating to the interception of communications on behalf of the police for the purposes of the prevention and detection of crime. The expression "interception" is used to mean the obtaining of information about the contents of a communication by post or telephone without the consent of the parties involved.

20. It has for long been the practice for the interception of postal and telephone communications in England and Wales to be carried out on the authority of a warrant issued by a Secretary of State, nowadays normally the Secretary of State for the Home Department (the Home Secretary). There is no overall statutory code governing the matter, although various statutory provisions are applicable thereto. The effect in domestic law of these provisions is the subject of some dispute in the current proceedings. Accordingly, the present summary of the facts is limited to what is undisputed, the submissions in relation to the contested aspects of these provisions being dealt with in the part of the judgment "as to the law".

21. Three official reports available to the public have described and examined the working of the system for the interception of communications.

Firstly, a Committee of Privy Councillors under the chairmanship of Lord Birkett was appointed in June 1957 "to consider and report upon the exercise by the Secretary of State of the executive power to intercept communications and, in particular, under what authority, to what extent and for what purposes this power has been exercised and to what use information so obtained has been put; and to recommend whether, how and subject to what safeguards, this power should be exercised ...". The Committee’s report (hereinafter referred to as "the Birkett report") was published in October 1957 (as Command Paper 283). The Government of the day announced that they accepted the report and its recommendations, and were taking immediate steps to implement those recommendations calling for a change in procedure. Subsequent Governments, in the person of the Prime Minister or the Home Secretary, publicly reaffirmed before Parliament that the arrangements relating to the interception of communications were strictly in accordance with the procedures described and recommended in the Birkett report.

Secondly, a Command Paper entitled "The Interception of Communications in Great Britain" was presented to Parliament by the then Home Secretary in April 1980 (Command Paper 7873 - hereinafter referred to as "the White Paper"). The purpose of the White Paper was to bring up to date the account given in the Birkett report.

Finally, in March 1981 a report by Lord Diplock, a Lord of Appeal in Ordinary who had been appointed to monitor the relevant procedures on a continuing basis (see paragraphs 54 and 55 below), was published outlining the results of the monitoring he had carried out to date.

22. The legal basis of the practice of intercepting telephone communications was also examined by the Vice-Chancellor in his judgment in the action which the applicant brought against the Metropolitan Police Commissioner (see paragraphs 31-36 below).

23. Certain changes have occurred in the organisation of the postal and telephone services since 1957, when the Birkett Committee made its report. The Post Office, which ran both services, was then a Department of State under the direct control of a Minister (the Postmaster General). By virtue of the Post Office Act 1969, it became a public corporation with a certain independence of the Crown, though subject to various ministerial powers of supervision and control exercised at the material time by the Home Secretary. The Post Office Act 1969 was repealed in part and amended by the British Telecommunications Act 1981. That Act divided the Post Office into two corporations: the Post Office, responsible for mail, and British Telecommunications, responsible for telephones. The 1981 Act made no change of substance in relation to the law governing interceptions. For the sake of convenience, references in the present judgment are to the position as it was before the 1981 Act came into force.

B. Legal position relating to interception of communications prior to 1969

24. The existence of a power vested in the Secretary of State to authorise by warrant the interception of correspondence, in the sense of detaining and opening correspondence transmitted by post, has been acknowledged from early times and its exercise has been publicly known (see the Birkett report, Part I, especially paras. 11, 17 and 39). The precise origin in law of this executive authority is obscure (ibid., para. 9). Nevertheless, although none of the Post Office statutes (of 1710, 1837, 1908 or 1953) contained clauses expressly conferring authority to intercept communications, all recognised the power as an independently existing power which it was lawful to exercise (ibid., paras. 17 and 38).

25. At the time of the Birkett report, the most recent statutory provision recognising the right of interception of a postal communication was section 58 sub-section 1 of the Post Office Act 1953, which provides:

> "If any officer of the Post Office, contrary to his duty, opens ... any postal packet in course of transmission by post, or wilfully detains or delays ... any such postal packet, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour ... .

> Provided that nothing in this section shall extend to ... the opening, detaining or delaying of a postal packet ... in obedience to an express warrant in writing under the hand of a Secretary of State."

"Postal packet" is defined in section 87 sub-section 1 of the Act as meaning:

> "a letter, postcard, reply postcard, newspaper, printed packet, sample packet or parcel and every packet or article transmissible by post, and includes a telegram".

Section 58, which is still in force, reproduced a clause that had been on the statute book without material amendment since 1710.

26. So far as telecommunications are further concerned, it is an offence under section 45 of the Telegraph Act 1863 if an official of the Post Office "improperly divulges to any person the purport of any message". Section 11 of the Post Office (Protection) Act 1884 creates a similar offence in relation to telegrams. In addition, section 20 of the Telegraph Act 1868 makes it a criminal offence if any Post Office official "shall, contrary to his duty, disclose or in any way make known or intercept the contents or any part of the contents of any telegraphic message or any message entrusted to the [Post Office] for the purpose of transmission".

These provisions are still in force.

27. It was held in a case decided in 1880 (Attorney General v. Edison Telephone Company, (1880) 6 Queen’s Bench Division 244) that a telephone conversation is a "telegraphic communication" for the purposes of the Telegraph Acts. It has not been disputed in the present proceedings that the offences under the Telegraph Acts apply to telephone conversations.

28. The power to intercept telephone messages has been exercised in England and Wales from time to time since the introduction of the telephone. Until the year 1937, the Post Office, which was at that time a Department of Government, acted upon the view that the power which the Crown exercised in intercepting telephone messages was a power possessed by any operator of telephones and was not contrary to law. Consequently, no warrants by the Secretary of State were issued and arrangements for the interception of telephone conversations were made directly between the police authorities and the Director-General of the Post Office. In 1937, the position was reviewed by the Home Secretary and the Postmaster General (the Minister then responsible for the administration of the Post Office) and it was decided, as a matter of policy, that it was undesirable that records of telephone conversations should be made by Post Office servants and disclosed to the police without the authority of the Secretary of State. The view was taken that the power which had for long been exercised to intercept postal communications on the authority of a warrant of the Secretary of State was, by its nature, wide enough to include the interception of telephone communications. Since 1937 it had accordingly been the practice of the Post Office to intercept telephone conversations only on the express warrant of the Secretary of State (see the Birkett report, paras. 40-41).

The Birkett Committee considered that the power to intercept telephone communications rested upon the power plainly recognised by the Post Office statutes as existing before the enactment of the statutes (Birkett report, para. 50). It concluded (ibid., para. 51):

> "We are therefore of the opinion that the state of the law might fairly be expressed in this way.
> (a) The power to intercept letters has been exercised from the earliest times, and has been recognised in successive Acts of Parliament.
> (b) This power extends to telegrams.
> (c) It is difficult to resist the view that if there is a lawful power to intercept communications in the form of letters and telegrams, then it is wide enough to cover telephone communications as well."

C. Post Office Act 1969

29. Under the Post Office Act 1969, the "Post Office" ceased to be a Department of State and was established as a public corporation of that name with the powers, duties and functions set out in the Act. In consequence of the change of status of the Post Office and of the fact that the Post Office was no longer under the direct control of a Minister of the Crown, it became necessary to make express statutory provision in relation to the interception of communications on the authority of a warrant of the Secretary of State. By section 80 of the Act it was therefore provided as follows:

> "A requirement to do what is necessary to inform designated persons holding office under the Crown concerning matters and things transmitted or in course of transmission by means of postal or telecommunication services provided by the Post Office may be laid on the Post Office for the like purposes and in the like manner as, at the passing of this Act, a requirement may be laid on the Postmaster General to do what is necessary to inform such persons concerning matters and things transmitted or in course of transmission by means of such services provided by him."

30. The 1969 Act also introduced, for the first time, an express statutory defence to the offences under the Telegraph Acts mentioned above (at paragraph 26), similar to that which exists under section 58 para. 1 of the Post Office Act 1953. This was effected by paragraph 1 sub-paragraph 1 of Schedule 5 to the Act, which reads:

> "In any proceedings against a person in respect of an offence under section 45 of the Telegraph Act 1863 or section 11 of the Post Office (Protection) Act 1884 consisting in the improper divulging of the purport of a message or communication or an offence under section 20 of the Telegraph Act 1868 it shall be a defence for him to prove that the act constituting the offence was done in obedience to a warrant under the hand of a Secretary of State."

D. Judgment of Sir Robert Megarry V.-C. in Malone v. Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis

31. In the civil action which he brought against the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, Mr. Malone sought various relief including declarations to the following effect:

- that any "tapping" (that is, interception, monitoring or recording) of conversations on his telephone lines without his consent, or disclosing the contents thereof, was unlawful even if done pursuant to a warrant of the Home Secretary;
- that he had rights of property, privacy and confidentiality in respect of conversations on his telephone lines and that the above-stated tapping and disclosure were in breach of those rights;
- that the tapping of his telephone lines violated Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention.

In his judgment, delivered on 28 February 1979, the Vice-Chancellor noted that he had no jurisdiction to make the declaration claimed in respect of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention. He made a detailed examination of the domestic law relating to telephone tapping, held in substance that the practice of tapping on behalf of the police as recounted in the Birkett report was legal and accordingly dismissed the action.

32. The Vice-Chancellor described the central issue before him as being in simple form: is telephone tapping in aid of the police in their functions relating to crime illegal? He further delimited the question as follows:

> "... the only form of telephone tapping that has been debated is tapping which consists of the making of recordings by Post Office officials in some part of the existing telephone system, and the making of those recordings available to police officers for the purposes of transcription and use. I am not concerned with any form of tapping that involved electronic devices which make wireless transmissions, nor with any process whereby anyone trespasses onto the premises of the subscriber or anyone else to affix tapping devices or the like. All that I am concerned with is the legality of tapping effected by means of recording telephone conversations from wires which, though connected to the premises of the subscriber, are not on them." ([1979] 2 All England Law Reports, p. 629)

33. The Vice-Chancellor held that there was no right of property (as distinct from copyright) in words transmitted along telephone lines (ibid., p. 631).

As to the applicant’s remaining contentions based on privacy and confidentiality, he observed firstly that no assistance could be derived from cases dealing with other kinds of warrant. Unlike a search of premises, the process of telephone tapping on Post Office premises did not involve any act of trespass and so was not prima facie illegal (ibid., p. 640). Secondly, referring to the warrant of the Home Secretary, the Vice-Chancellor remarked that such warrant did not "purport to be issued under the authority of any statute or of the common law". The decision to introduce such warrants in 1937 seemed "plainly to have been an administrative decision not dictated or required by statute" (ibid.). He referred, however, to section 80 of the Post Office Act 1969 and Schedule 5 to the Act, on which the Solicitor General had based certain contentions summarised as follows:

> "Although the previous arrangements had been merely administrative, they had been set out in the Birkett report a dozen years earlier, and the section plainly referred to these arrangements; ... A warrant was not needed to make the tapping lawful: it was lawful without any warrant. But where the tapping was done under warrant ... [section 80] afforded statutory recognition of the lawfulness of the tapping." (ibid., p. 641)

"In their essentials", stated the Vice-Chancellor, "these contentions seem to me to be sound." He accepted that, by the 1969 Act,

> "Parliament has provided a clear recognition of the warrant of the Home Secretary as having an effective function in law, both as providing a defence to certain criminal charges, and also as amounting to an effective requirement for the Post Office to do certain acts" (ibid., pp. 641-642).

The Vice-Chancellor further concluded that there was in English law neither a general right of privacy nor, as the applicant had contended, a particular right of privacy to hold a telephone conversation in the privacy of one’s home without molestation (ibid., pp. 642-644). Moreover, no duty of confidentiality existed between the Post Office and the telephone subscriber; nor was there any other obligation of confidence on a person who overheard a telephone conversation, whether by means of tapping or otherwise (ibid., pp. 645-647).

34. Turning to the arguments based on the Convention, the Vice-Chancellor noted firstly that the Convention was not part of the law of England and, as such, did not confer on the applicant direct rights that could be enforced in the English courts (ibid., p. 647).

He then considered the applicant’s argument that the Convention, as interpreted by the European Court in the case of Klass and Others (judgment of 6 September 1978, Series A no. 28), could be used as a guide to assist in the determination of English law on a point that was uncertain. He observed that the issues before him did not involve construing legislation enacted with the purpose of giving effect to obligations imposed by the Convention. Where Parliament had abstained from legislating on a point that was plainly suitable for legislation, it was difficult for the court to lay down new rules that would carry out the Crown’s treaty obligations, or to discover for the first time that such rules had always existed. He compared the system of safeguards considered in the Klass case with the English system, as described in the Birkett report, and concluded:

"... Not a single one of these safeguards is to be found as a matter of established law in England, and only a few corresponding provisions exist as a matter of administrative procedure.

It does not, of course, follow that a system with fewer or different safeguards will fail to satisfy Article 8 (art. 8) in the eyes of the European Court of Human Rights. At the same time, it is impossible to read the judgment in the Klass case without it becoming abundantly clear that a system which has no legal safeguards whatever has small chance of satisfying the requirements of that Court, whatever administrative provisions there may be. ... Even if the system [in operation in England] were to be considered adequate in its conditions, it is laid down merely as a matter of administrative procedure, so that it is unenforceable in law, and as a matter of law could at any time be altered without warning or subsequent notification. Certainly in law any 'adequate and effective safeguards against abuse' are wanting. In this respect English law compares most unfavourably with West German law: this is not a subject on which it is possible to feel any pride in English law.

I therefore find it impossible to see how English law could be said to satisfy the requirements of the Convention, as interpreted in the Klass case, unless that law not only prohibited all telephone tapping save in suitably limited classes of case, but also laid down detailed restrictions on the exercise of the power in those limited classes."

This conclusion did not, however, enable the Vice-Chancellor to decide the case in the way the applicant sought:

"It may perhaps be that the common law is sufficiently fertile to achieve what is required by the first limb of [the above-stated proviso]: possible ways of expressing such a rule may be seen in what I have already said. But I see the greatest difficulty in the common law framing the safeguards required by the second limb. Various institutions or offices would have to be brought into being to exercise various defined functions. The more complex and indefinite the subject-matter the greater the difficulty in the court doing what it is really appropriate, and only appropriate, for the legislature to do. Furthermore, I find it hard to see what there is in the present case to require the English courts to struggle with such a problem. Give full rein to the Convention, and it is clear that when the object of the surveillance is the detection of crime, the question is not whether there ought to be a general prohibition of all surveillance, but in what circumstances, and subject to what conditions and restrictions, it ought to be permitted. It is those circumstances, conditions and restrictions which are at the centre of this case; and yet it is they which are the least suitable for determination by judicial decision.

... Any regulation of so complex a matter as telephone tapping is essentially a matter for Parliament, not the courts; and neither the Convention nor the Klass case can, I think, play any proper part in deciding the issue before me." (ibid., pp. 647-649)

He added that "this case seems to me to make it plain that telephone tapping is a subject which cries out for legislation", and continued:

"However much the protection of the public against crime demands that in proper cases the police should have the assistance of telephone tapping, I would have thought that in any civilised system of law the claims of liberty and justice would require that telephone users should have effective and independent safeguards against possible abuses. The fact that a telephone user is suspected of crime increases rather than diminishes this requirement: suspicions, however reasonably held, may sometimes prove to be wholly unfounded. If there were effective and independent safeguards, these would not only exclude some cases of excessive zeal but also, by their mere existence, provide some degree of reassurance for those who are resentful of the police or believe themselves to be persecuted." (ibid., p. 649)

35. As a final point of substance, the Vice-Chancellor dealt, in the following terms, with the applicant's contention that as no power to tap telephones had been given by either statute or common law, the tapping was necessarily unlawful:

"I have already held that, if such tapping can be carried out without committing any breach of the law, it requires no authorisation by statute or common law; it can lawfully be done simply because there is nothing to make it unlawful. Now that I have held that such tapping can indeed be carried out without committing any breach of the law, the contention necessarily fails. I may also say that the statutory recognition given to the Home Secretary's warrant seems to me to point clearly to the same conclusion." (ibid., p. 649)

36. The Vice-Chancellor therefore held that the applicant's claim failed in its entirety. He made the following concluding remarks as to the ambit of his decision:

"Though of necessity I have discussed much, my actual decision is closely limited. It is confined to the tapping of the telephone lines of a particular person which is effected by the Post Office on Post Office premises in pursuance of a warrant of the Home Secretary in a case in which the police have just cause or excuse for requesting the tapping, in that it will assist them in performing their functions in relation to crime, whether in prevention, detection, discovering the criminals or otherwise, and in which the material obtained is used only by the police, and only for those purposes. In particular, I decide nothing on tapping effected for other purposes, or by other persons, or by other means; nothing on tapping when the information is supplied to persons other than the police; and nothing on tapping when the police use the material for purposes other than those I have mentioned. The principles involved in my decision may or may not be of some assistance in such other cases, whether by analogy or otherwise: but my actual decision is limited in the way that I have just stated." (ibid., p. 651)

E. Subsequent consideration of the need for legislation

37. Following the Vice-Chancellor's judgment, the necessity for legislation concerning the interception of communications was the subject of review by the Government, and of Parliamentary discussion. On 1 April 1980, on the publication of the White Paper, the Home Secretary announced in Parliament that after carefully considering the suggestions proffered by the Vice-Chancellor in his judgment, the Government had decided not to introduce legislation. He explained the reasons for this decision in the following terms:

"The interception of communications is, by definition, a practice that depends for its effectiveness and value upon being carried out in secret, and cannot therefore be subject to the normal processes of parliamentary control. Its acceptability in a > democratic society depends on its being subject to ministerial control, and on the readiness of the public and their representatives in Parliament to repose their trust in the Ministers concerned to exercise that control responsibly and with a right sense of balance between the value of interception as a means of protecting order and security and the threat which it may present to the liberty of the subject.

> Within the necessary limits of secrecy, I and my right hon. Friends who are concerned are responsible to Parliament for our stewardship in this sphere. There would be no more sense in making such secret matters justiciable than there would be in my being obliged to reveal them in the House. If the power to intercept were to be regulated by statute, then the courts would have power to inquire into the matter and to do so, if not publicly, then at least in the presence of the complainant. This must surely limit the use of interception as a tool of investigation. The Government have come to the clear conclusion that the procedures, conditions and safeguards described in the [White] Paper ensure strict control of interception by Ministers, are a good and sufficient protection for the liberty of the subject, and would not be made significantly more effective for that purpose by being embodied in legislation. The Government have accordingly decided not to introduce legislation on these matters" (Hansard, House of Commons, 1 April 1980, cols. 205-207).

He gave an assurance that "Parliament will be informed of any changes that are made in the arrangements" (ibid., col. 208).

38. In the course of the Parliamentary proceedings leading to the enactment of the British Telecommunications Act 1981, attempts were made to include in the Bill provisions which would have made it an offence to intercept mail or matters sent by public telecommunication systems except pursuant to a warrant issued under conditions which corresponded substantially to those described in the White Paper. The Government successfully opposed these moves, primarily on the grounds that secrecy, which was essential if interception was to be effective, could not be maintained if the arrangements for interception were laid down by legislation and thus became justiciable in the courts. The present arrangements and safeguards were adequate and the proposed new provisions were, in the Government's view, unworkable and unnecessary (see, for example, the statement of the Home Secretary in the House of Commons on 1 April 1981, Hansard, cols. 334-338). The 1981 Act eventually contained a re-enactment of section 80 of the Post Office Act 1969 applicable to the Telecommunications Corporation (Schedule 3, para. 1, of the 1981 Act). Section 80 of the 1969 Act itself continues to apply to the Post Office.

39. In its report presented to Parliament in January 1981 (Command Paper 8092), the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure, which had been appointed in 1978, also considered the possible need for legislation in this field. In the chapter entitled "Investigative powers and the rights of the citizen", the Royal Commission made the following recommendation in regard to what it termed "surreptitious surveillance" (paras. 3.56-3.60):

> "... [A]lthough we have no evidence that the existing controls are inadequate to prevent abuse, we think that there are strong arguments for introducing a system of > statutory control on similar lines to that which we have recommended for search warrants. As with all features of police investigative procedures, the value of prescribing them in statutory form is that it brings clarity and precision to the rules; they are open to public scrutiny and to the potential of Parliamentary review. So far as surveillance devices in general are concerned this is not at present so.

> We therefore recommend that the use of surveillance devices by the police (including the interception of letters and telephone communications) should be regulated by statute."

These recommendations were not adopted by the Government.

40. A few months later, the Law Commission, a permanent body set up by statute in 1965 for the purpose of promoting reform of the law, produced a report on breach of confidence (presented to Parliament in October 1981 - Command Paper 8388). This report examined, inter alia, the implications for the civil law of confidence of the acquisition of information by surveillance devices, and made various proposals for reform of the law (paras. 6.35 - 6.46). The Law Commission, however, felt that the question whether "the methods which the police ... may use to obtain information should be defined by statute" was a matter outside the scope of its report (paras. 6.43 and 6.44 in fine). No action has been taken by the Government on this report.

F. The practice followed in relation to interceptions

41. Details of the current practices followed in relation to interceptions are set out in the Government's White Paper of 1980. The practices there summarised are essentially the same as those described and recommended in the Birkett report, and referred to in Parliamentary statements by successive Prime Ministers and Home Secretaries in 1957, 1966, 1978 and 1980.

42. The police, H.M. Customs and Excise and the Security Service may request authority for the interception of communications for the purposes of "detection of serious crime and the safeguarding of the security of the State" (paragraph 2 of the White Paper). Interception may take place only on the authority of the Secretary of State given by warrant under his own hand. In England and Wales, the power to grant such warrants is exercised by the Home Secretary or occasionally, if he is ill or absent, by another Secretary of State on his behalf (ibid.). In the case of warrants applied for by the police to assist them in the detection of crime, three conditions must be satisfied before a warrant will be issued:

(a) the offence must be "really serious";

(b) normal methods of investigation must have been tried and failed or must, from the nature of things, be unlikely to succeed;

(c) there must be good reason to think that an interception would be likely to lead to an arrest and a conviction.

43. As is indicated in the Birkett report (paras. 58-61), the concept of "serious crime" has varied from time to time. Changing circumstances have made some acts serious offences which were not previously so regarded; equally, some offences formerly regarded as serious enough to justify warrants for the interception of communications have ceased to be so regarded. Thus, the interception of letters believed to contain obscene or indecent matter ceased in the mid-1950s (Birkett report, para. 60); no warrants for the purpose of preventing the transmission of illegal lottery material have been issued since November 1953 (ibid., para. 59). "Serious crime" is defined in the White Paper, and subject to the addition of the concluding words has been consistently defined since September 1951 (Birkett report, para. 64), as consisting of "offences for which a man with no previous record could reasonably be expected to be sentenced to three years' imprisonment, or offences of lesser gravity in which either a large number of people is involved or there is good reason to apprehend the use of violence" (White Paper, para. 4). In April 1982, the Home Secretary announced to Parliament that, on a recommendation made by Lord Diplock in his second report (see paragraph 55 below), the concept of a serious offence was to be extended to cover offences which would not necessarily attract a penalty of three years' imprisonment on first conviction, but in which the financial rewards of success were very large (Hansard, House of Commons, 21 April 1982, col. 95).

Handling (including receiving) stolen goods, knowing or believing them to be stolen, is an offence under section 22 of the Theft Act 1968, carrying a maximum penalty of fourteen years' imprisonment. According to the Government, the receiving of stolen property is regarded as a very serious offence since the receiver lies at the root of much organised crime and encourages large-scale thefts (see the Birkett report, para. 103). The detection of receivers of stolen property was at the time of the Birkett report (ibid.), and remains, one of the important uses to which interception of communications is put by the police.

44. Applications for warrants must be made in writing and must contain a statement of the purpose for which interception is requested and of the facts and circumstances which support the request. Every application is submitted to the Permanent Under-Secretary of State - the senior civil servant - at the Home Office (or, in his absence, a nominated deputy), who, if he is satisfied that the application meets the required criteria, submits it to the Secretary of State for approval and signature of a warrant. In a case of exceptional urgency, if the Secretary of State is not immediately available to sign a warrant, he may be asked to give authority orally, by telephone; a warrant is signed and issued as soon as possible thereafter (White Paper, para. 9).

In their submissions to the Commission and the Court, the Government supplemented as follows the information given in the White Paper. Except in cases of exceptional urgency, an application will only be considered in the Home Office if it is put forward by a senior officer of the Metropolitan Police, in practice the Assistant Commissioner (Crime), and also, in the case of another police force, by the chief officer of police concerned. Close personal consideration is given by the Secretary of State to every request for a warrant submitted to him. In the debate on the British Telecommunications Bill in April 1981, the then Home Secretary confirmed before Parliament that he did not and would not sign any warrant for interception unless he were personally satisfied that the relevant criteria were met (Hansard, House of Commons, 1 April 1981, col. 336).

45. Every warrant sets out the name and address of the recipient of mail in question or the telephone number to be monitored, together with the name and address of the subscriber. Any changes require the authority of the Secretary of State, who may delegate power to give such authority to the Permanent Under-Secretary. If both the mail and the telephone line of a person are to be intercepted, two separate warrants are required (White Paper, para. 10).

46. Every warrant is time-limited, specifying a date on which it expires if not renewed. Warrants are in the first place issued with a time-limit set at a defined date not exceeding two months from the date of issue. Warrants may be renewed only on the personal authority of the Secretary of State and may be renewed for not more than one month at a time. In each case where renewal of a warrant is sought, the police are required first to satisfy the Permanent Under-Secretary of State at the Home Office that the reasons for which the warrant was first issued are still valid and that the case for renewal is justified: a submission to the Secretary of State for authority to renew the warrant is only made if the Permanent Under-Secretary is so satisfied (White Paper, para. 11).

47. Warrants are reviewed monthly by the Secretary of State. When an interception is considered to be no longer necessary, it is immediately discontinued and the warrant is cancelled on the authority of the Permanent Under-Secretary of State at the Home Office. In addition to the monthly review of each warrant by the Secretary of State, the Metropolitan Police carry out their own review each month of all warrants arising from police applications: where an interception is deemed to be no longer necessary, instructions are issued to the Post Office to discontinue the interception forthwith and the Home Office is informed so that the warrant can be cancelled (Birkett report, paras. 72-74; White Paper, paras. 12-13).

48. In accordance with the recommendations of the Birkett report (para. 84), records are kept in the Home Office, showing in respect of each application for a warrant:

(a) the ground on which the warrant is applied for;

(b) a copy of the warrant issued or a note of rejection of the application;
(c) the dates of any renewals of the warrant;
(d) a note of any other decisions concerning the warrant;
(e) the date of cancellation of the warrant (White Paper, para. 14).

49. On the issue of a warrant, the interception is effected by the Post Office. Telephone interceptions are carried out by a small staff of Post Office employees who record the conversation but do not themselves listen to it except from time to time to ensure that the apparatus is working correctly. In the case of postal communications, the Post Office makes a copy of the correspondence. As regards the interception of communications for the purpose of the detection of crime, in practice the "designated person holding office under the Crown" to whom the Post Office is required by sub-section 80 of the Post Office Act 1969 to transmit the intercepted information (see paragraph 29 above) is invariably the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. The product of the interception - that is, the copy of the correspondence or the tape-recording - is made available to a special unit of the Metropolitan Police who note or transcribe only such parts of the correspondence or the telephone conversation as are relevant to the investigation. When the documentary record has been made, the tape is returned to the Post Office staff, who erase the recording. The tape is subsequently re-used. The majority of recordings are erased within one week of their being taken (Birkett report, paras. 115-117; White Paper, para. 15).

50. A Consolidated Circular to Police, issued by the Home Office in 1977, contained the following paragraphs in a section headed "Supply of information by Post Office to police":

> "1.67 Head Postmasters and Telephone Managers have been given authority to assist the police as indicated in paragraph 1.68 below without reference to Post Office Headquarters, in circumstances where the police are seeking information
> (a) in the interests of justice in the investigation of a serious indictable offence; or
> (b) when they are acting in a case on the instructions of the Director of Public Prosecutions; or
> (c) when a warrant has been issued for the arrest of the offender, or the offence is such that he can be arrested without a warrant; or
> 1.68 Head Postmasters, or (in matters affecting the telecommunication service) Telephone Managers, may afford the following facilities in response to a request made by the officer locally in charge of the force at the town where the Head Postmaster is stationed

(g) Telegrams. Telegrams may be shown to the police on the authority of the sender or addressee. Apart from this the Post Office is prepared to give authority in particular cases of serious crime where the inspection of a telegram is a matter of urgency, and will do so at once on telephonic application, by a chief officer of police or a responsible officer acting on his behalf, to the Chief Inspector, Post Office Investigation Division. ...

In May 1984, the Home Office notified chief officers of police that paragraph 1.68 (g), described as containing advice and information to the police which was "in some respects misleading", was henceforth to be regarded as deleted, with the exception of the first complete sentence. At the same time, chief officers of police were reminded that the procedures for the interception of communications were set out in the White Paper and rigorously applied in all cases.

51. The notes or transcriptions of intercepted communications are retained in the police interception unit for a period of twelve months or for as long as they may be required for the purposes of investigation. The contents of the documentary record are communicated to the officers of the appropriate police force engaged in the criminal investigation in question. When the notes or transcriptions are no longer required for the purposes of the investigation, the documentary record is destroyed (Birkett report, para. 118; White Paper, para. 15). The product of intercepted communications is used exclusively for the purpose of assisting the police to pursue their investigations: the material is not tendered in evidence, although the interception may itself lead to the obtaining of information by other means which may be tendered in evidence (Birkett report, para. 151; White Paper, para. 16). In accordance with the recommendation of the Birkett Committee (Birkett report, para. 101), information obtained by means of an interception is never disclosed to private individuals or private bodies or to courts or tribunals of any kind (White Paper, para. 17).

52. An individual whose communications have been intercepted is not informed of the fact of interception or of the information thereby obtained, even when the surveillance and the related investigations have terminated.

53. For security reasons it is the normal practice not to disclose the numbers of interceptions made (Birkett report, paras. 119-121; White Paper, paras. 24-25). However, in order to allay public concern as to the extent of interception, both the Birkett report and the White Paper gave figures for the number of warrants granted annually over the years preceding their publication. The figures in the White Paper (Appendix III) indicate that in England and Wales between 1969 and 1979 generally something over 400 telephone warrants and something under 100 postal warrants were granted annually by the Home Secretary. Paragraph 27 of the White Paper also gave the total number of Home Secretary warrants in force on 31 December for the years 1958 (237), 1968 (273) and 1978 (308). The number of telephones installed at the end of 1979 was, according to the Government, 26,428,000, as compared with 7,327,000 at the end of 1957. The Government further stated that over the period from 1958 to 1978 there was a fourfold increase in indictable crime, from 626,000 to 2,395,000.

54. When the White Paper was published on 1 April 1980, the Home Secretary announced in Parliament that the Government, whilst not proposing to introduce legislation (see paragraph 37 above), intended to appoint a senior member of the judiciary to conduct a continuous independent check so as to ensure that interception of communications was being carried out for the established purposes and in accordance with the established procedures. His terms of reference were stated to be:

> "to review on a continuing basis the purposes, procedures, conditions and safeguards governing the interception of communications on behalf of the police, HM Customs and Excise and the security service as set out in [the White Paper]; and to report to the Prime Minister" (Hansard, House of Commons, 1 April 1980, cols. 207-208).

It was further announced that the person appointed would have the right of access to all relevant papers and the right to request additional information from the departments and organisations concerned. For the purposes of his first report, which would be published, he would examine all the arrangements set out in the White Paper; his subsequent reports on the detailed operation of the arrangements would not be published, but Parliament would be informed of any findings of a general nature and of any changes that were made in the arrangements (ibid.).

55. Lord Diplock, a Lord of Appeal in Ordinary since 1968, was appointed to carry out the review. In his first report, published in March 1981, Lord Diplock recorded, inter alia, that, on the basis of a detailed examination of apparently typical cases selected at random, he was satisfied

(i) that, in each case, the information provided by the applicant authorities to the Secretary of State in support of the issue of a warrant was stated with accuracy and candour and that the procedures followed within the applicant authorities for vetting applications before submission to the Secretary of State were appropriate to detect and correct any departure from proper standards;

(ii) that warrants were not applied for save in proper cases and were not continued any longer than was necessary to carry out their legitimate purpose.

Lord Diplock further found from his examination of the system that all products of interception not directly relevant to the purpose for which the warrant was granted were speedily destroyed and that such material as was directly relevant to that purpose was given no wider circulation than was essential for carrying it out.

In early 1982, Lord Diplock submitted his second report. As the Secretary of State informed Parliament, Lord Diplock's general conclusion was that during the year 1981 the procedure for the interception of communications had continued to work satisfactorily and the principles set out in the White Paper had been conscientiously observed by all departments concerned.

In 1982, Lord Diplock resigned his position and was succeeded by Lord Bridge of Harwich, a Lord of Appeal in Ordinary since 1980.

G. "Metering"

56. The process known as "metering" involves the use of a device called a meter check printer which registers the numbers dialled on a particular telephone and the time and duration of each call. It is a process which was designed by the Post Office for its own purposes as the corporation responsible for the provision of telephone services. Those purposes include ensuring that the subscriber is correctly charged, investigating complaints of poor quality service and checking possible abuse of the telephone service. When "metering" a telephone, the Post Office - now British Telecommunications (see paragraph 23 above) - makes use only of signals sent to itself.

In the case of the Post Office, the Crown does not require the keeping of records of this kind but, if the records are kept, the Post Office may be compelled to produce them in evidence in civil or criminal cases in the ordinary way, namely by means of a subpoena duces tecum. In this respect the position of the Post Office does not differ from that of any other party holding relevant records as, for instance, a banker. Neither the police nor the Crown are empowered to direct or compel the production of the Post Office records otherwise than by the normal means.

However, the Post Office do on occasions make and provide such records at the request of the police if the information is essential to police enquiries in relation to serious crime and cannot be obtained from other sources. This practice has been made public in answer to parliamentary questions on more than one occasion (see, for example, the statement by the Home Secretary to Parliament, Hansard, House of Commons, 23 February 1978, cols. 760-761).

H. Possible domestic remedies in respect of the alleged violation of the Convention

57. Commission, Government and applicant are agreed that, at least in theory, judicial remedies are available in England and Wales, in both the civil and the criminal courts, in respect of interceptions of communications carried out unlawfully. The remedies referred to by the Government were summarised in the pleadings as follows:

(i) In the event of any interception or disclosure of intercepted material effected by a Post Office employee "contrary to duty" or "improperly" and without a warrant of the Secretary of State, a criminal offence would be committed under the Telegraph Acts 1863 and 1868 and the Post Office (Protection) Act 1884 (as regards telephone interceptions) and under the Post Office Act 1953 (as regards postal interceptions) (see paragraphs 25-27 above). On complaint that communications had been unlawfully intercepted, it would be the duty of the police to investigate the matter and to initiate a prosecution if satisfied that an offence had been committed. If the police failed to prosecute, it would be open to the complainant himself to commence a private prosecution.

(ii) In addition to (i) above, in a case of unlawful interception by a Post Office employee without a warrant, an individual could obtain an injunction from the domestic courts to restrain the person or persons concerned and the Post Office itself from carrying out further unlawful interception of his communications: such an injunction is available to any person who can show that a private right or interest has been interfered with by a criminal act (see, for example, Gouriet v. The Union of Post Office Workers, [1977] 3 All England Law Reports 70; Ex parte Island Records Ltd., [1978] 3 All England Law Reports 795).

(iii) On the same grounds, an action would lie for an injunction to restrain the divulging or publication of the contents of intercepted communications by employees of the Post Office, otherwise than under a warrant of the Secretary of State, or to any person other than the police.

Besides these remedies, unauthorised interference with mail would normally constitute the tort of trespass to (that is, wrongful interference with) chattels and so give rise to a civil action for damages.

58. The Government further pointed to the following possible non-judicial remedies:

(i) In the event that the police were themselves implicated in an interception carried out without a warrant, a complaint could additionally be lodged under section 49 of the Police Act 1964, which a chief officer of police would, by the terms of the Act, be obliged to investigate and, if an offence appeared to him to have been committed, to refer to the Director of Public Prosecutions.

(ii) If a complainant were able to establish merely that the police or the Secretary of State had misappreciated the facts or that there was not an adequate case for imposing an interception, the individual concerned would be able to complain directly to the Secretary of State himself or through his Member of Parliament: if a complainant were to give the Home Secretary information which suggested that the grounds on which a warrant had been issued did not in fact fall within the published criteria or were inadequate or mistaken, the Home Secretary would immediately cause it to be investigated and, if the complaint were found to be justified, would immediately cancel the warrant.

(iii) Similarly, if there were non-compliance with any of the relevant administrative rules of procedure set out in the Birkett report and the White Paper, a remedy would lie through complaint to the Secretary of State who would, in a proper case, cancel or revoke a warrant and thereby terminate an interception which was being improperly carried out.

According to the Government, in practice there never has been a case where a complaint in any of the three above circumstances has proved to be well-founded.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

59. In his application of 19 July 1979 to the Commission (no. 8691/79), Mr. Malone complained of the admitted interception of a telephone conversation to which he had been a party. He further stated his belief that, at the behest of the police, his correspondence as well as that of his wife had been intercepted, his telephone lines "tapped" and, in addition, his telephone "metered" by a device recording all the numbers dialled. He claimed that by reason of these matters, and of relevant law and practice in England and Wales, he had been the victim of breaches of Articles 8 and 13 (art. 8, art. 13) of the Convention.

60. The Commission declared the application admissible on 13 July 1981.

In its report adopted on 17 December 1982 (Article 31) (art. 31), the Commission expressed the opinion:

- that there had been a breach of the applicant’s rights under Article 8 (art. 8) by reason of the admitted interception of a telephone conversation to which he was a party and of the law and practice in England and Wales governing the interception of postal and telephone communications on behalf of the police (eleven votes, with one abstention);

- that it was unnecessary in the circumstances of the case to investigate whether the applicant’s rights had also been interfered with by the procedure known as "metering" of telephone calls (seven votes to three, with two abstentions);

- that there had been a breach of the applicant's rights under Article 13 (art. 13) in that the law in England and Wales did not provide an "effective remedy before a national authority" in respect of interceptions carried out under a warrant (ten votes to one, with one abstention).

The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the two separate opinions contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to the present judgment.

FINAL SUBMISSIONS MADE TO THE COURT BY THE GOVERNMENT

61. At the hearings on 20 February 1984, the Government maintained the submissions set out in their memorial, whereby they requested the Court

> "(1) with regard to Article 8 (art. 8),
> (i) to decide and declare that the interference with the exercise of the rights guaranteed by Article 8 para. 1 (art. 8-1) of the Convention resulting from the measures of interception of communications on behalf of the police in England and Wales for the purpose of the detection and prevention of crime, and any application of those measures to the applicant, were and are justified under paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) as being in accordance with the law and necessary in a democratic society for the prevention of crime and for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others and that accordingly there has been no breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention;
> (ii) (a) to decide and declare that it is unnecessary in the circumstances of the present case to investigate whether the applicant's rights under Article 8 (art. 8) were interfered with by the so-called system of 'metering'; alternatively (b) to decide and declare that the facts found disclose no breach of the applicant's rights under Article 8 (art. 8) by reason of the said system of 'metering';
> (2) with regard to Article 13 (art. 13),
> to decide and declare that the circumstances of the present case disclose no breach of Article 13 (art. 13) of the Convention".

AS TO THE LAW

I. ALLEGED BREACH OF ARTICLE 8 (art. 8)

62. Article 8 (art. 8) provides as follows:

> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

The applicant alleged violation of this Article (art. 8) under two heads. In his submission, the first violation resulted from interception of his postal and telephone communications by or on behalf of the police, or from the law and practice in England and Wales relevant thereto; the second from "metering" of his telephone by or on behalf of the police, or from the law and practice in England and Wales relevant thereto.

A. Interception of communications

1. Scope of the issue before the Court

63. It should be noted from the outset that the scope of the case before the Court does not extend to interception of communications in general. The Commission's decision of 13 July 1981 declaring Mr. Malone's application to be admissible determines the object of the case brought before the Court (see, inter alia, the Ireland v. the United Kingdom judgment of 18 January 1978, Series A no. 25, p. 63, para. 157). According to that decision, the present case "is directly concerned only with the question of interceptions effected by or on behalf of the police" - and not other government services such as H.M. Customs and Excise and the Security Service - "within the general context of a criminal investigation, together with the legal and administrative framework relevant to such interceptions".

2. Whether there was any interference with an Article 8 (art. 8) right

64. It was common ground that one telephone conversation to which the applicant was a party was intercepted at the request of the police under a warrant issued by the Home Secretary (see paragraph 14 above). As telephone conversations are covered by the notions of "private life" and "correspondence" within the meaning of Article 8 (art. 8) (see the Klass and Others judgment of 6 September 1978, Series A no. 28, p. 21, para. 41), the admitted measure of interception involved an "interference by a public authority" with the exercise of a right guaranteed to the applicant under paragraph 1 of Article 8 (art. 8-1).

Despite the applicant's allegations, the Government have consistently declined to disclose to what extent, if at all, his telephone calls and mail have been intercepted otherwise on behalf of the police (see paragraph 16 above). They did, however, concede that, as a suspected receiver of stolen goods, he was a member of a class of persons against whom measures of postal and telephone interception were liable to be employed. As the Commission pointed out in its report (paragraph 115), the existence in England and Wales of laws and practices which permit and establish a system for effecting secret surveillance of communications amounted in itself to an "interference ... with the exercise" of the applicant's rights under Article 8 (art. 8), apart from any measures actually taken against him (see the above-mentioned Klass and Others judgment, ibid.). This being so, the Court, like the Commission (see the report, paragraph 114), does not consider it necessary to inquire into the applicant's further claims that both his mail and his telephone calls were intercepted for a number of years.

3. Whether the interferences were justified

65. The principal issue of contention was whether the interferences found were justified under the terms of paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2), notably whether they were "in accordance with the law" and "necessary in a democratic society" for one of the purposes enumerated in that paragraph.

(a) "In accordance with the law"

(i) General principles

66. The Court held in its Silver and Others judgment of 25 March 1983 (Series A no. 61, pp. 32-33, para. 85) that, at least as far as interferences with prisoners' correspondence were concerned, the expression "in accordance with the law/ prévue par la loi" in paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) should be interpreted in the light of the same general principles as were stated in the Sunday Times judgment of 26 April 1979 (Series A no. 30) to apply to the comparable expression "prescribed by law/ prévues par la loi" in paragraph 2 of Article 10 (art. 10-2).

The first such principle was that the word "law/loi" is to be interpreted as covering not only written law but also unwritten law (see the above-mentioned Sunday Times judgment, p. 30, para. 47). A second principle, recognised by Commission, Government and applicant as being applicable in the present case, was that "the interference in question must have some basis in domestic law" (see the the above-mentioned Silver and Others judgment, p. 33, para. 86). The expressions in question were, however, also taken to include requirements over and above compliance with the domestic law. Two of these requirements were explained in the following terms:

> "Firstly, the law must be adequately accessible: the citizen must be able to have an indication that is adequate in the circumstances of the legal rules applicable to a given case. Secondly, a norm cannot be regarded as 'law' unless it is formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct: he must be able - if need be with appropriate advice - to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail." (Sunday Times judgment, p. 31, para. 49; Silver and Others judgment, p. 33, paras. 87 and 88)

67. In the Government's submission, these two requirements, which were identified by the Court in cases concerning the imposition of penalties or restrictions on the exercise by the individual of his right to freedom of expression or to correspond, are less appropriate in the wholly different context of secret surveillance of communications. In the latter context, where the relevant law imposes no restrictions or controls on the individual to which he is obliged to conform, the paramount consideration would appear to the Government to be the lawfulness of the administrative action under domestic law.

The Court would reiterate its opinion that the phrase "in accordance with the law" does not merely refer back to domestic law but also relates to the quality of the law, requiring it to be compatible with the rule of law, which is expressly mentioned in the preamble to the Convention (see, mutatis mutandis, the above-mentioned Silver and Others judgment, p. 34, para. 90, and the Golder judgment of 21 February 1975, Series A no. 18, p. 17, para. 34). The phrase thus implies - and this follows from the object and purpose of Article 8 (art. 8) - that there must be a measure of legal protection in domestic law against arbitrary interferences by public authorities with the rights safeguarded by paragraph 1 (art. 8-1) (see the report of the Commission, paragraph 121). Especially where a power of the executive is exercised in secret, the risks of arbitrariness are evident (see the above-mentioned Klass and Others judgment, Series A no. 28, pp. 21 and 23, paras. 42 and 49). Undoubtedly, as the Government rightly suggested, the requirements of the Convention, notably in regard to foreseeability, cannot be exactly the same in the special context of interception of communications for the purposes of police investigations as they are where the object of the relevant law is to place restrictions on the conduct of individuals. In particular, the requirement of foreseeability cannot mean that an individual should be enabled to foresee when the authorities are likely to intercept his communications so that he can adapt his conduct accordingly. Nevertheless, the law must be sufficiently clear in its terms to give citizens an adequate indication as to the circumstances in which and the conditions on which public authorities are empowered to resort to this secret and potentially dangerous interference with the right to respect for private life and correspondence.

68. There was also some debate in the pleadings as to the extent to which, in order for the Convention to be complied with, the "law" itself, as opposed to accompanying administrative practice, should define the circumstances in which and the conditions on which a public authority may interfere with the exercise of the protected rights. The above-mentioned judgment in the case of Silver and Others, which was delivered subsequent to the adoption of the Commission's report in the present case, goes some way to answering the point. In that judgment, the Court held that "a law which confers a discretion must indicate the scope of that discretion", although the detailed procedures and conditions to be observed do not necessarily have to be incorporated in rules of substantive law (ibid., Series A no. 61, pp. 33-34, paras. 88-89). The degree of precision required of the "law" in this connection will depend upon the particular subject-matter (see the above-mentioned Sunday Times judgment, Series A no. 30, p. 31, para. 49). Since the implementation in practice of measures of secret surveillance of communications is not open to scrutiny by the individuals concerned or the public at large, it would be contrary to the rule of law for the legal discretion granted to the executive to be expressed in terms of an unfettered power. Consequently, the law must indicate the scope of any such discretion conferred on the competent authorities and the manner of its exercise with sufficient clarity, having regard to the legitimate aim of the measure in question, to give the individual adequate protection against arbitrary interference.

(ii) Application in the present case of the foregoing principles

69. Whilst the exact legal basis of the executive's power in this respect was the subject of some dispute, it was common ground that the settled practice of intercepting communications on behalf of the police in pursuance of a warrant issued by the Secretary of State for the purposes of detecting and preventing crime, and hence the admitted interception of one of the applicant's telephone conversations, were lawful under the law of England and Wales. The legality of this power to intercept was established in relation to telephone communications in the judgment of Sir Robert Megarry dismissing the applicant's civil action (see paragraphs 31-36 above) and, as shown by the independent findings of the Birkett report (see paragraph 28 in fine above), is generally recognised for postal communications.

70. The issue to be determined is therefore whether, under domestic law, the essential elements of the power to intercept communications were laid down with reasonable precision in accessible legal rules that sufficiently indicated the scope and manner of exercise of the discretion conferred on the relevant authorities.

This issue was considered under two heads in the pleadings: firstly, whether the law was such that a communication passing through the services of the Post Office might be intercepted, for police purposes, only pursuant to a valid warrant issued by the Secretary of State and, secondly, to what extent the circumstances in which a warrant might be issued and implemented were themselves circumscribed by law.

71. On the first point, whilst the statements of the established practice given in the Birkett report and the White Paper are categorical para. 55 of the Birkett report and para. 2 of the White Paper - see paragraph 42 above), the law of England and Wales, as the applicant rightly pointed out (see paragraph 56 of the Commission's report), does not expressly make the exercise of the power to intercept communications subject to the issue of a warrant. According to its literal terms, section 80 of the Post Office Act 1969 provides that a "requirement" may be laid on the Post Office to pass information to the police, but it does not in itself render illegal interceptions carried out in the absence of a warrant amounting to a valid "requirement" (see paragraph 29 above). The Commission, however, concluded that this appeared to be the effect of section 80 when read in conjunction with the criminal offences created by section 58 para. 1 of the Post Office Act 1953 and by the other statutory provisions referred to in paragraph 1, sub-paragraph 1 of Schedule 5 to the 1969 Act (see paragraphs 129-135 of the report, and paragraphs 25, 26 and 30 above). The reasoning of the Commission was accepted and adopted by the Government but, at least in respect of telephone interceptions, disputed by the applicant. He relied on certain dicta to the contrary in the judgment of Sir Robert Megarry (see paragraphs 31-36 above, especially paragraphs 33 and 35). He also referred to the fact that the 1977 Home Office Consolidated Circular to Police made no mention, in the section headed "Supply of information by Post Office to police", of the warrant procedure (see paragraph 50 above).

72. As to the second point, the pleadings revealed a fundamental difference of view as to the effect, if any, of the Post Office Act 1969 in imposing legal restraints on the purposes for which and the manner in which interception of communications may lawfully be authorised by the Secretary of State.

73. According to the Government, the words in section 80 - and, in particular, the phrase "for the like purposes and in the like manner as, at the passing of this Act, a requirement may be laid" - define and restrict the power to intercept by reference to the practice which prevailed in 1968. In the submission of the Government, since the entry into force of the 1969 Act a requirement to intercept communications on behalf of the police can lawfully be imposed on the Post Office only by means of a warrant signed personally by the Secretary of State for the exclusive purpose of the detection of crime and satisfying certain other conditions. Thus, by virtue of section 80 the warrant must, as a matter of law, specify the relevant name, address and telephone number; it must be time-limited and can only be directed to the Post Office, not the police. In addition, the Post Office is only required and empowered under section 80 to make information available to "designated persons holding office under the Crown". Any attempt to broaden or otherwise modify the purposes for which or the manner in which interceptions may be authorised would require an amendment to the 1969 Act which could only be achieved by primary legislation.

74. In its reasoning, which was adopted by the applicant, the Commission drew attention to various factors of uncertainty arguing against the Government's view as to the effect of the 1969 Act (see paragraphs 136-142 of the report).

75. Firstly, the relevant wording of the section, and especially the word "may", appeared to the Commission to authorise the laying of a requirement on the Post Office for whatever purposes and in whatever manner it would previously have been lawfully possible to place a ministerial duty on the Postmaster General, and not to be confined to what actually did happen in practice in 1968. Yet at the time of the Birkett report (see, for example, paragraphs 15, 21, 27, 54-55, 56, 62 and 75), and likewise at the time when the 1969 Act was passed, no clear legal restrictions existed on the permissible "purposes" and "manner". Indeed the Birkett report at one stage (paragraph 62) described the Secretary of State's discretion as "absolute", albeit specifying how its exercise was in practice limited.

76. A further difficulty seen by the Commission is that, on the Government's interpretation, not all the details of the existing arrangements are said to have been incorporated into the law by virtue of section 80 but at least the principal conditions, procedures or purposes for the issue of warrants authorising interceptions. Even assuming that the reference to "like purposes" and "like manner" is limited to previous practice as opposed to what would have been legally permissible, it was by no means evident to the Commission what aspects of the previous "purposes" and "manner" have been given statutory basis, so that they cannot be changed save by primary legislation, and what aspects remain matters of administrative discretion susceptible of modification by governmental decision. In this connection, the Commission noted that the notion of "serious crime", which in practice serves as a condition governing when a warrant may be issued for the purpose of the detection of crime, has twice been enlarged since the 1969 Act without recourse to Parliament (see paragraphs 42-43 above).

77. The Commission further pointed out that the Government's analysis of the law was not shared by Sir Robert Megarry in his judgment of February 1979. He apparently accepted the Solicitor General's contentions before him that section 80 referred back to previous administrative arrangements for the issue of warrants (see paragraph 33 above). On the other hand, he plainly considered that these arrangements remained administrative in character and had not, even in their principal aspects, been made binding legal requirements by virtue of section 80 (see paragraph 34 above).

78. It was also somewhat surprising, so the Commission observed, that no mention of section 80 as regulating the issue of warrants should have been made in the White Paper published by the Government in the wake of Sir Robert Megarry's judgment (see paragraph 21 above). Furthermore, the Home Secretary, when presenting the White Paper to Parliament in April 1980, expressed himself in terms suggesting that the existing arrangements as a whole were matters of administrative practice not suitable for being "embodied in legislation", and were subject to change by governmental decision of which Parliament would be informed (see paragraphs 37 in fine and 54 in fine above).

79. The foregoing considerations disclose that, at the very least, in its present state the law in England and Wales governing interception of communications for police purposes is somewhat obscure and open to differing interpretations. The Court would be usurping the function of the national courts were it to attempt to make an authoritative statement on such issues of domestic law (see, mutatis mutandis, the Deweer judgment of 27 February 1980, Series A no. 35, p. 28, in fine, and the Van Droogenbroeck judgment of 24 June 1982, Series A no. 50, p. 30, fourth sub-paragraph). The Court is, however, required under the Convention to determine whether, for the purposes of paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2), the relevant law lays down with reasonable clarity the essential elements of the authorities' powers in this domain.

Detailed procedures concerning interception of communications on behalf of the police in England and Wales do exist (see paragraphs 42-49, 51-52 and 54-55 above). What is more, published statistics show the efficacy of those procedures in keeping the number of warrants granted relatively low, especially when compared with the rising number of indictable crimes committed and telephones installed (see paragraph 53 above). The public have been made aware of the applicable arrangements and principles through publication of the Birkett report and the White Paper and through statements by responsible Ministers in Parliament (see paragraphs 21, 37-38, 41, 43 and 54 above).

Nonetheless, on the evidence before the Court, it cannot be said with any reasonable certainty what elements of the powers to intercept are incorporated in legal rules and what elements remain within the discretion of the executive. In view of the attendant obscurity and uncertainty as to the state of the law in this essential respect, the Court cannot but reach a similar conclusion to that of the Commission. In the opinion of the Court, the law of England and Wales does not indicate with reasonable clarity the scope and manner of exercise of the relevant discretion conferred on the public authorities. To that extent, the minimum degree of legal protection to which citizens are entitled under the rule of law in a democratic society is lacking.

(iii) Conclusion

80. In sum, as far as interception of communications is concerned, the interferences with the applicant's right under Article 8 (art. 8) to respect for his private life and correspondence (see paragraph 64 above) were not "in accordance with the law".

(b) "Necessary in a democratic society" for a recognised purpose

81. Undoubtedly, the existence of some law granting powers of interception of communications to aid the police in their function of investigating and detecting crime may be "necessary in a democratic society ... for the prevention of disorder or crime", within the meaning of paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) (see, mutatis mutandis, the above-mentioned Klass and Others judgment, Series A no. 28, p. 23, para. 48). The Court accepts, for example, the assertion in the Government's White Paper (at para. 21) that in Great Britain "the increase of crime,and particularly the growth of organised crime, the increasing sophistication of criminals and the ease and speed with which they can move about have made telephone interception an indispensable tool in the investigation and prevention of serious crime". However, the exercise of such powers, because of its inherent secrecy, carries with it a danger of abuse of a kind that is potentially easy in individual cases and could have harmful consequences for democratic society as a whole (ibid., p. 26, para. 56). This being so, the resultant interference can only be regarded as "necessary in a democratic society" if the particular system of secret surveillance adopted contains adequate guarantees against abuse (ibid., p. 23, paras. 49-50).

82. The applicant maintained that the system in England and Wales for the interception of postal and telephone communications on behalf of the police did not meet this condition.

In view of its foregoing conclusion that the interferences found were not "in accordance with the law", the Court considers that it does not have to examine further the content of the other guarantees required by paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) and whether the system circumstances.

B. Metering

83. The process known as "metering" involves the use of a device (a meter check printer) which registers the numbers dialled on a particular telephone and the time and duration of each call (see paragraph 56 above). In making such records, the Post Office - now British Telecommunications - makes use only of signals sent to itself as the provider of the telephone service and does not monitor or intercept telephone conversations at all.

From this, the Government drew the conclusion that metering, in contrast to interception of communications, does not entail interference with any right guaranteed by Article 8 (art. 8).

84. As the Government rightly suggested, a meter check printer registers information that a supplier of a telephone service may in principle legitimately obtain, notably in order to ensure that the subscriber is correctly charged or to investigate complaints or possible abuses of the service. By its very nature, metering is therefore to be distinguished from interception of communications, which is undesirable and illegitimate in a democratic society unless justified. The Court does not accept, however, that the use of data obtained from metering, whatever the circumstances and purposes, cannot give rise to an issue under Article 8 (art. 8). The records of metering contain information, in particular the numbers dialled, which is an integral element in the communications made by telephone. Consequently, release of that information to the police without the consent of the subscriber also amounts, in the opinion of the Court, to an interference with a right guaranteed by Article 8 (art. 8).

85. As was noted in the Commission's decision declaring Mr. Malone's application admissible, his complaints regarding metering are closely connected with his complaints regarding interception of communications. The issue before the Court for decision under this head is similarly limited to the supply of records of metering to the police "within the general context of a criminal investigation, together with the legal and administrative framework relevant [thereto]" (see paragraph 63 above).

86. In England and Wales, although the police do not have any power, in the absence of a subpoena, to compel the production of records of metering, a practice exists whereby the Post Office do on occasions make and provide such records at the request of the police if the information is essential to police enquiries in relation to serious crime and cannot be obtained from other sources (see paragraph 56 above). The applicant, as a suspected receiver of stolen goods, was, it may be presumed, a member of a class of persons potentially liable to be directly affected by this practice. The applicant can therefore claim, for the purposes of Article 25 (art. 25) of the Convention, to be a "victim" of a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) by reason of the very existence of this practice, quite apart from any concrete measure of implementation taken against him (cf., mutatis mutandis, paragraph 64 above). This remains so despite the clarification by the Government that in fact the police had neither caused his telephone to be metered nor undertaken any search operations on the basis of any list of telephone numbers obtained from metering (see paragraph 17 above; see also, mutatis mutandis, the above-mentioned Klass and Others judgment, Series A no. 28, p. 20, para. 37 in fine).

87. Section 80 of the Post Office Act 1969 has never been applied so as to "require" the Post Office, pursuant to a warrant of the Secretary of State, to make available to the police in connection with the investigation of crime information obtained from metering. On the other hand, no rule of domestic law makes it unlawful for the Post Office voluntarily to comply with a request from the police to make and supply records of metering (see paragraph 56 above). The practice described above, including the limitative conditions as to when the information may be provided, has been made public in answer to parliamentary questions (ibid.). However, on the evidence adduced before the Court, apart from the simple absence of prohibition, there would appear to be no legal rules concerning the scope and manner of exercise of the discretion enjoyed by the public authorities. Consequently, although lawful in terms of domestic law, the interference resulting from the existence of the practice in question was not "in accordance with the law", within the meaning of paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) (see paragraphs 66 to 68 above).

88. This conclusion removes the need for the Court to determine whether the interference found was "necessary in a democratic society" for one of the aims enumerated in paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) (see, mutatis mutandis, paragraph 82 above).

C. Recapitulation

89. There has accordingly been a breach of Article 8 (art. 8) in the applicant's case as regards both interception of communications and release of records of metering to the police.

II. ALLEGED BREACH OF ARTICLE 13 (art. 13)

90. The applicant submitted that no effective domestic remedy existed for the breaches of Article 8 (art. 8) of which he complained and that, consequently, there had also been a violation of Article 13 (art. 13) which provides:

> "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

91. Having regard to its decision on Article 8 (art. 8) (see paragraph 89 above), the Court does not consider it necessary to rule on this issue.

III. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 50 (art. 50)

92. The applicant claimed just satisfaction under Article 50 (art. 50) under four heads: (i) legal costs that he was ordered by Sir Robert Megarry to pay to the Metropolitan Commissioner of Police, assessed at £9,011.00, (ii) costs, including disbursements, paid by him to his own lawyers in connection with the same action, assessed at £5,443.20, (iii) legal costs incurred in the proceedings before the Commission and the Court, as yet unquantified, and (iv) "compensation of a moderate amount" for interception of his telephone conversations.

He further sought recovery of interest in respect of the first two items.

The Government have so far made no submissions on these claims.

93. The question is thus not yet ready for decision and must be reserved; in the circumstances of the case, it is appropriate to refer the matter back to the Chamber (Rule 53 paras. 1 and 3 of the Rules of Court).

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Holds unanimously that there has been a breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention;

2. Holds by sixteen votes to two that it is not necessary also to examine the case under Article 13 (art. 13);

3. Holds unanimously that the question of the application of Article 50 (art. 50) is not ready for decision;

accordingly,

(a) reserves the whole of the said question;

(b) refers back to the Chamber the said question.

PARTIALLY DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGES MATSCHER AND PINHEIRO FARINHA

(Translation)

We recognise that Article 13 (art. 13) constitutes one of the most obscure clauses in the Convention and that its application raises extremely difficult and complicated problems of interpretation. This is probably the reason why, for approximately two decades, the Convention institutions avoided analysing this provision, for the most part advancing barely convincing reasons.

It is only in the last few years that the Court, aware of its function of interpreting and ensuring the application of all the Articles of the Convention whenever called on to do so by the parties or the Commission has also embarked upon the interpretation of Article 13 (art. 13). We refer in particular to the judgments in the cases of Klass and Others (Series A no. 28, paras. 61 et seq.), Sporrong and Lönnroth (Series A no. 52, para. 88), Silver and Others (Series A no. 61, paras. 109 et seq.) and, most recently, Campbell and Fell (Series A no. 80, paras. 124 et seq.), where the Court has laid the foundation for a coherent interpretation of this provision.

Having regard to this welcome development, we cannot, to our regret, concur with the opinion of the majority of the Court who felt able to forego examining the allegation of a breach of Article 13 (art. 13). In so doing, the majority, without offering the slightest justification, have departed from the line taken inter alia in the Silver and Others judgment, which was concerned with legal issues very similar to those forming the object of the present case.

Indeed, applying the approach followed in the Silver and Others judgment, the Court ought in the present case, and to the same extent, to have arrived at a finding of a violation of Article 13 (art. 13).

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE PETTITI

(Translation)

I have voted with my colleagues for the violation of Article 8 (art. 8), but I believe that the European Court could have made its decision more explicit and not confined itself to ascertaining whether, in the words of Article 8 (art. 8), the interference was "in accordance with the law", an expression which in its French version ("prévue par la loi") is used in Article 8 para. 2, Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 and Article 2 of Protocol No. 4 (art. 8-2, P1-1, P4-2), the term "the law" being capable of being interpreted as covering both written law and unwritten law.

The European Court considered that the finding of a breach on this point made it unnecessary, in the Malone case, to examine the British system currently in force, which was held to have been at fault because of a lack of "law", and to determine whether or not adequate guarantees existed.

In my view, however, the facts as described in the Commission’s report and in the Court’s summary of facts also called for an assessment of the British measures and practices under Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2).

This appears necessary to me because of the major importance of the issue at stake, which I would summarise as follows.

The danger threatening democratic societies in the years 1980-1990 stems from the temptation facing public authorities to "see into" the life of the citizen. In order to answer the needs of planning and of social and tax policy, the State is obliged to amplify the scale of its interferences. In its administrative systems, the State is being led to proliferate and then to computerise its personal data-files. Already in several of the member States of the Council of Europe each citizen is entered on 200 to 400 data-files.

At a further stage, public authorities seek, for the purposes of their statistics and decision-making processes, to build up a "profile" of each citizen. Enquiries become more numerous; telephone tapping constitutes one of the favoured means of this permanent investigation.

Telephone tapping has during the last thirty years benefited from many "improvements" which have aggravated the dangers of interference in private life. The product of the interception can be stored on magnetic tapes and processed in postal or other centres equipped with the most sophisticated material. The amateurish tapping effected by police officers or post office employees now exists only as a memory of pre-war novels. The encoding of programmes and tapes, their decoding, and computer processing make it possible for interceptions to be multiplied a hundredfold and to be analysed in shorter and shorter time-spans, if need be by computer. Through use of the "mosaic" technique, a complete picture can be assembled of the life-style of even the "model" citizen.

It would be rash to believe that the number of telephone interceptions is only a few hundred per year in each country and that they are all known to the authorities.

Concurrently with developments in the techniques of interception, the aims pursued by the authorities have diversified. Police interception for the prevention of crime is only one of the practices employed; to this should be added political interceptions, interceptions of communications of journalists and leading figures, not to mention interceptions required by national defence and State security, which are included in the "top-secret" category and not dealt with in the Court's judgment or the present opinion.

Most of the member States of the Council of Europe have felt the need to introduce legislation on the matter in order to bring to an end the abuses which were proliferating and making vulnerable even those in power.

The legislative technique most often employed is that of criminal procedure: the interception of communications is made subject to the decision and control of a judge within the framework of a criminal investigation by means of provisions similar to those governing searches carried out on the authority of a warrant.

The order by the judge must specify the circumstances justifying the measure, if need be subject to review by an appeal court. Variations exist according to the types of system and code of criminal procedure.

The governing principle of these laws is the separation of executive and judicial powers, that is to say, not to confer on the executive the initiative and the control of the interception, in line with the spirit of Article 8 (art. 8).

The British system analysed in the Malone judgment - and held by the Court not to be "in accordance with the law" - is a typical example of a practice that places interception of communications within the sole discretion and under the sole control of the Minister of the Interior, this being compounded by the fact that intercepted material is not disclosed to the judicial authorities (in the form of evidence), which therefore have no knowledge of the interception (see paragraph 51).

Even in the case of interception of communications required by the imperative necessities of counter-espionage and State security, most systems of law include strict rules providing for derogations from the ordinary law, the intervention and control of the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice, and the recourse to boards or commissions composed of judges at the peak of the judicial hierarchy.

The European Court has, it is true, "considere[d] that it does not have to examine further the content of the other guarantees required by paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) and whether the system complained of furnished those guarantees in the particular circumstances" (paragraph 82).

This reservation makes clear that in limiting itself to finding a violation because the governmental interference was not in accordance with the law, the Court did not intend, even implicitly, to mark approval of the British system and thus reserved any adjudication on a possible violation of Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2).

In my opinion, however, the Court could at this point have completed its reasoning and analysed the components of the system so as to assess their compatibility and draw the conclusion of a breach of Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2), there being no judicial control.

Even if a "law", within the meaning of Article 8 paras. 1 and 2 (art. 8-1, art. 8-2), contains detailed rules which do not merely legalise practices but define and delimit them, the lack of judicial control could still entail, in my view, a violation of Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2), subject of course to review by the Court.

It must also be borne in mind that the practice of police interception leads to the establishment of "prosecution" files which thereafter carry the risk of rendering inoperative the rules of a fair trial provided for under Article 6 (art. 6) by building up a presumption of guilt. The judicial authorities should therefore be left a full power of appreciation over the field of decision and control.

The object of the laws in Europe protecting private life is to prevent any clandestine disclosure of words uttered in a private context; certain laws have even made illegal any tapping of a telephone communication, any interception of a message without the consent of the parties. The link between laws on "private life" and laws on "interception of communications" is very close.

German law enumerates the offences for the detection of which measures of interception may be ordered. The list of offences set out in this law is entirely directed towards the preservation of democracy, the sole justification for the attendant interference.

In the Klass case and the accompanying comparative examination of the rules obtaining in the different signatory States of the Convention, the need for a system of protection in this sphere was emphasised. It admittedly falls to the State to operate such a system, but only within the bounds set by Article 8 (art. 8).

There were, in the Malone case, factors permitting the Court to draw a distinction between the dangers of a crisis situation caused by terrorism (Klass case) and the dangers of ordinary criminality, and hence to consider that two different sets of rules could be adopted. In so far as the prevention of crime under the ordinary law is concerned, it is difficult to see the reason for ousting judicial control, at the very least such control as would secure at a later stage the right to the destruction of the product of unjustified interceptions.

Reasoning along these lines could have been adopted by the Court, even on an alterative basis. The interference caused by interception of communications is more serious than an ordinary interference since the "innocent" victim is incapable of discovering it.

If, as the British Government submitted, only the suspected criminal is placed under secret surveillance, there can be no ground for denying a measure involving judicial or equivalent control, or for refusing to have a neutral and impartial body situated between the authority deciding on the interception and the authority responsible for controlling the legality of the operation and its conformity with the legitimate aims pursued.

The requirement of judicial control over telephone interceptions does not flow solely from a concern rooted in a philosophy of power and institutions but also from the necessities of protecting private life.

In reality, even justified and properly controlled telephone interceptions call for counter-measures such as the right of access by the subject of the interception when the judicial phase has terminated in the discharge or acquittal of the accused, the right to erasure of the data obtained, the right of restitution of the tapes.

Other measures are necessary, such as regulations safeguarding the confidentiality of the investigation and legal professional privilege, when the interception has involved monitoring a conversation between lawyer and client or when the interception has disclosed facts other than those forming the subject of the criminal investigation and the accusation.

Provisions of criminal procedure alone are capable of satisfying such requirements which, moreover, are consistent with the Council of Europe Convention of 1981 (Private Life, Data Banks). It is in fact impossible to isolate the issue of interception of communications from the issue of data banks since interceptions give rise to the filing and storing of the information obtained. For States which have also ratified the 1981 Convention, their legislation must satisfy these double requirements.

The work of the Council of Europe (Orwell Colloquy in Strasbourg on 2 April 1984, and Data Bank Colloquy in Madrid on 13 June 1984) has been directed towards the same end, namely the protection of the individual threatened by methods of storing and transmission of information. The mission of the Council of Europe and of its organs is to prevent the establishment of systems and methods that would allow "Big Brother" to become master of the citizen’s private life. For it is just as serious to be made subject to measures of interception against one’s will as to be unable to stop such measures when they are illegal or unjustified, as was for example the case with Orwell’s character who, within his own home, was continually supervised by a television camera without being able to switch it off.

The distinction between administrative interceptions and interceptions authorised by a judicial authority must be clearly made in the law in order to comply with Article 8 (art. 8); it would appear preferable to lay down the lawfulness of certain interventions within an established legal framework rather than leaving a legal vacuum permitting arbitrariness. The designation of the collective institutions responsible for ensuring the ex post facto control of the manner of implementation of measures of interception; the determination of the dates of cancellation of the tapping and monitoring measures, the means of destruction of the product of interception; the inclusion in the code of criminal procedure of all measures applying to such matters in order to afford protection of words uttered in a private context or in a private place, verification that the measures do not constitute an unfair stratagem or a violation of the rights of the defence - all this panoply of requirements must be taken into consideration to judge whether or not the system satisfies the provisions of Article 8 (art. 8). The Malone case prompted queries of this kind since the State cannot enjoy an "unlimited discretion" in this respect (see the Klass judgment).

According to the spirit of the Council of Europe Convention of 1981 on private life and data banks, the right of access includes the right for the individual to establish the existence of the data, to establish the banks of which he is a "data subject", access properly speaking, the right to challenge the data, and the exceptions to and derogations from this right of access in the case notably of police or judicial investigations which must by nature remain secret during the initial phase so as not to alert the criminals or potential criminals.

Recommendation R (83) 10 of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe states that respect for the privacy of individuals should be guaranteed "in any research project requiring the use of personal data".

The nature and implications of data processing are totally different as soon as computerisation enters the picture. The Karlsruhe Constitutional Court has rightly identified the concept of "informational self-determination", that is to say, the right of the individual to decide within what limits data concerning his private life might be divulged and to protect himself against an increasing tendency to make him "public property".

In 1950, techniques for interfering in private life were still archaic; the meaning and import of the term interference as understood at that time cannot prevail over the current meaning. Consequently, interceptions which in previous times necessitated recourse to tapping must be classified as "interferences" in 1984, even if they have been effected without tapping thanks to "bugging" and long-distance listening techniques.

For it is settled, as was recalled in paragraph 42 of the Klass judgment, that Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2), since it provides for an exception to a guaranteed right, "is to be narrowly interpreted" and that "powers of secret surveillance of citizens, characterising as they do the police State, are tolerable under the Convention only in so far as strictly necessary for safeguarding the democratic institutions". To leave to the police alone, even subject to the control of the Home Office, the task of assessing the degree of suspicion or dangerousness cannot, in my opinion, be regarded as an adequate means consistent with the aim pursued, even if that aim be legitimate; and in any event, practices of systematic interception of communications in the absence of impartial, independent and judicial control would be disproportionate to the aim sought to be achieved. In this connection, the Malone judgment has to read with reference to the reasoning expounded in the Klass judgment.

States must admittedly be left a domestic discretion and the scope of this discretion is admittedly not identical in respect of each of the aims enumerated in Articles 8 and 10 (art. 8, art. 10), but the right to respect for private life against spying by executive authorities comes within the most exacting category of Convention rights and hence entails a certain restriction on this domestic "discretion" and on the margin of appreciation. In this sphere (more than in the sphere of morality - cf. the Handyside judgment), it can be maintained that it is possible, whilst still taking account of the circumstances resulting from the threat posed to democratic societies by terrorism, to identify European standards of State conduct in relation to surveillance of citizens. The shared characteristics of statutory texts or draft legislation on data banks and interception of communications is evidence of this awareness.

The Court in its examination of cases of violation of Article 8 (art. 8) must be able to inquire into all the techniques giving rise to the interference.

The Post Office Engineering Union, during the course of the Malone case, referred to proposals for the adoption of regulations capable of being adapted to new techniques as they are developed and for a system of warrants issued by "magistrates".

The Court has rightly held that there was also violation of Article 8 para. 1 (art. 8-1) in respect of metering.

On this point, it would likewise have been possible to have given a ruling by applying Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2). The comprehensive metering of telephone communications (origin, destination, duration), when effected for a purpose other than its sole accounting purpose, albeit in the absence of any interception as such, constitutes an interference in private life. On the basis of the data thereby obtained, the authorities are enabled to deduce information that is not properly meant to be within their knowledge. It is known that, as far as data banks are concerned, the processing of "neutral" data may be as revealing as the processing of sensitive data.

The simple reference in the judgment to the notion of necessity in a democratic society and to the requirement of "adequate guarantees", without any eludication of the principles and principal conditions attaching to these guarantees, might well be inadequate for the purposes of the interpretation that the State should give to the Convention and to the judgment.

The Malone judgment complementing as it does the Klass judgment, in that it arrives at a conclusion of violation by finding unsatisfactory a system that is laid down neither by statute nor by any statutory equivalent in Anglo-Saxon law, takes its place in that continuing line of decisions through which the Court acts as guardian of the Convention. The Court fulfils that function by investing Article 8 (art. 8) with its full dimension and by limiting the margin of appreciation especially in those areas where the individual is more and more vulnerable as a result of modern technology; recognition of his right to be "left alone" is inherent in Article 8 (art. 8). The Convention protects the community of men; man in our times has a need to preserve his identity, to refuse the total transparency of society, to maintain the privacy of his personality.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

COURT (CHAMBER)

CASE OF MALONE v. THE UNITED KINGDOM (ARTICLE 50)

(Application no. 8691/79)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

26 April 1985

In the Malone case[*],

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Court, as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr. G. WIARDA, President,
Mrs. D. BINDSCHEDLER-ROBERT,
Mr. G. LAGERGREN,
Mr. F. GÖLCÜKLÜ,
Mr. B. WALSH,
Sir Vincent EVANS,
Mr. J. GERSING,

and also of Mr. M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr. H. PETZOLD, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 25 April 1985,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on that date, on the application in the present case of Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention:

PROCEDURE AND FACTS

1. The present case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 16 May 1983. The case originated in an application (no. 8691/79) against the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland lodged with the Commission on 19 July 1979 by a United Kingdom national, Mr. James Malone.

2. On 27 October 1983, the Chamber constituted to consider the case relinquished jurisdiction in favour of the plenary Court (Rule 50 of the Rules of Court). By judgment of 2 August 1984, the plenary Court held, inter alia, that the applicant had been the victim of a breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention by reason of the existence in England and Wales of laws and practices permitting the interception of postal and telephone communications and the "metering" of telephones by or on behalf of the police within the context of criminal investigations (Series A no. 82, paragraphs 62-89 of the reasons and point 1 of the operative provisions, pp. 30-40).

[*] Note by the Registrar: The case is numbered 4/1983/60/94. The second figure indicates the year in which the case was referred to the Court and the first figure its place on the list of cases referred in that year; the last two figures indicate, respectively, the case's order on the list of cases and of originating applications (to the Commission) referred to the Court since its creation.

The only outstanding matter to be settled is the question of the application of Article 50 (art. 50) in the present case. Accordingly, as regards the facts, the Court will confine itself here to giving the pertinent details; for further particulars reference should be made to paragraphs 12 to 58 of the above-mentioned judgment (ibid., pp. 10-28).

3. In a memorial filed on 17 February 1984, the applicant had claimed just satisfaction under four heads: (i) legal costs, assessed at £9,011.00, that he had been ordered to pay to the Metropolitan Commissioner of Police in the unsuccessful High Court proceedings he had brought against the latter, (ii) costs, including disbursements, paid by him to his own lawyers in connection with the same action, assessed at £5,443.20, (iii) legal costs incurred in the proceedings before the Commission and the Court, at that stage unquantified, and (iv) "compensation of a moderate amount" for interception of his telephone conversations. He had further sought recovery of interest in respect of the first two items. A quantity of currency (in Pounds sterling, American Dollars and Italian Lire) seized by the police at the time of the applicant's arrest in 1977 was not returned to the applicant on his acquittal in the criminal proceedings but was retained by the Metropolitan Commissioner of Police in part satisfaction of the sum owed to him in costs by the applicant.

At the hearings on 20 February 1984, the Government of the United Kingdom ("the Government") indicated their intention to reply in writing to the applicant's claims for just satisfaction.

In its judgment of 2 August 1984, the Court reserved the matter and referred it back to the Chamber under Rule 53 §§ 1 and 3 (paragraph 93 of the reasons and point 3 of the operative provisions, ibid., pp. 39 and 40). On the same day, the Chamber invited the Government to submit, within the coming two months, their written observations on the question, including notification of any agreement at which they and the applicant might have arrived (ibid., p. 49). Subsequently, Mr. F. Gölcüklü, substitute judge, replaced Mr. E. Garcia de Enterria, who was prevented from taking part in the consideration of the case (Rules 22 § 1 and 24 § 1).

4. The Government's memorial concerning the application of Article 50 (art. 50) was lodged at the registry on 29 September 1984. Two days later the President of the Chamber directed that the Delegate of the Commission and the representatives of the applicant should have one month within which to file any comments or further comments, as the case might be, which they might wish to make in this connection. On 8 October 1984, the Secretary to the Commission advised the Registrar that the Delegate had no observations to make on the question. In view of the negotiations for a friendly settlement taking place between the Government and the applicant, the President of the Chamber on several occasions acceded to requests from the applicant to extend the time-limit fixed for the filing of his further comments.

5. By letter received on 25 February 1985, the applicant's representatives informed the Registrar that a settlement had been reached. The text of the agreement, set out in a letter from the Treasury Solicitor to the applicant's representatives, was communicated to the Court on 13 March 1985 and reads as follows:

> "I write to record the agreement reached between us in respect of your client's Article 50 (art. 50) claim. In full settlement of this, the Government will reimburse your client his costs in the domestic proceedings, pay the net amount of sterling and hand over the other currency held by the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis, and pay an agreed figure, less any legal aid, in respect of his costs before the Court and Commission.
> To be more specific, the Government will:
> 1. reimburse £5,443.20;
> 2. pay the further sum of £4,725.25 and hand over $4,445 and 3,010,000 lire; and
> 3. pay £3,774.10, this sum being subject to reduction by the amount of any legal aid that has been paid or is payable. You wrote to the Commission about this on 21 February 1985 and while the Government will make the payments and hand over in respect of 1 and 2 above within 14 days of receipt by the Government's Agent of the official notification of the Court's approval of the settlement, payment of the net sum due in respect of the Strasbourg proceedings will be made within 14 days of finalization of the legal aid position if this is later than the Court's approval."

6. On 13 March 1985, the President of the Chamber directed that the Delegate of the Commission should have until 25 March to file any observations which he might wish to present on the agreement reached. On 21 March, the Deputy Secretary to the Commission wrote to the Registrar to inform him that the Delegate had no comments to make.

7. Having regard to the respective standpoints adopted by the Government, the applicant and the Commission, the Court decided on 25 April 1985 that there was no need to hold oral hearings.

AS TO THE LAW

8. Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention provides as follows:

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the ... Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

9. Since its judgment of 2 August 1984 on the main issues in the present case, the Court has been notified of a friendly settlement reached between the Government and the applicant in respect of the latter's claims under Article 50 (art. 50) (see paragraph 5 above). Having regard to the nature of the terms agreed and to the absence of objection on the part of the Commission's Delegate (see paragraphs 5 and 6 above), the Court finds that the settlement reached is "equitable" within the meaning of Rule 53 § 4 of the Rules of Court. Accordingly, the Court takes formal note of the settlement and concludes that it would be appropriate to strike the case out of its list pursuant to that Rule.

Decides to strike the case out of its list.

Done in English and in French, and notified in writing under Rule 54 § 2, second sub-paragraph, of the Rules of Court on 26 April 1985.

COURT (PLENARY)

CASE OF MARKT INTERN VERLAG GMBH AND KLAUS BEERMANN v. GERMANY

(Application no. 10572/83)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

20 November 1989

In the case of markt intern Verlag GmbH and Klaus Beermann[*],

The European Court of Human Rights, taking its decision in plenary session pursuant to Rule 50 of the Rules of Court and composed of the following judges:

Mr R. RYSSDAL, President,
Mr J. CREMONA,
Mr Thór VILHJÁLMSSON,
Mr F. GÖLCÜKLÜ,
Mr F. MATSCHER,
Mr L.-E. PETTITI,
Mr B. WALSH,
Sir Vincent EVANS,
Mr R. MACDONALD,
Mr C. RUSSO,
Mr R. BERNHARDT,
Mr A. SPIELMANN,
Mr J. DE MEYER,
Mr J.A. CARRILLO SALCEDO,
Mr N. VALTICOS,
Mr S.K. MARTENS,
Mrs E. PALM,
Mr I. FOIGHEL,

and also of Mr M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr H. PETZOLD, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 26 April, 28 September and 25 October 1989,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 14 March 1988 and by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany ("the Government") on 18 April 1988, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 § 1 and Article 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention"). It originated in an application (no. 10572/83) against the Federal Republic of Germany lodged with the Commission under Article 25 (art. 25) on 11 July 1983 by a German firm of publishers, markt intern Verlag GmbH ("markt intern"), and the editor-in-chief of the information bulletins published by it, Mr Klaus Beermann.

[*] Note by the registry: The case is numbered 3/1988/147/201. The first number is the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court in the relevant year (second number). The last two numbers indicate the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court since its creation and on the list of the corresponding originating applications to the Commission.

The Commission's request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) and to the declaration whereby the Federal Republic of Germany recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46). The object of the request was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Article 10 (art. 10) of the Convention. The Government's application, which referred to Article 48 (art. 48), invited the Court to find that there had been no such breach.

2. In response to the enquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 § 3 (d) of the Rules of Court, the applicants stated that they wished to take part in the proceedings and designated the lawyer who would represent them (Rule 30).

3. The Chamber to be constituted included ex officio Mr R. Bernhardt, the elected judge of German nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr R. Ryssdal, the President of the Court (Rule 21 § 3 (b)). On 25 March 1988, in the presence of the Registrar, the President drew by lot the names of the other five members, namely Mr J. Cremona, Mr F. Gölcüklü, Mr L.-E. Pettiti, Mr C. Russo and Mr J. De Meyer (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 § 4) (art. 43).

4. Mr Ryssdal assumed the office of President of the Chamber (Rule 21 § 5) and, through the Deputy Registrar, consulted the Agent of the Government, the Delegate of the Commission and the applicants on the need for a written procedure (Rule 37 § 1). In accordance with the order made in consequence, the registry received the Government's memorial on 25 October 1988 and then, on 2 November 1988, the applicants' memorial, which, with the President's leave (Rule 27 § 3), was in German.

In a letter of 20 December 1988, the Secretary to the Commission informed the Registrar that the Delegate would submit his observations at the hearing.

5. Having consulted, through the Deputy Registrar, those who would be appearing before the Court, the President directed that the oral proceedings should open on 25 April 1989 (Rule 38). On 13 February 1989 he gave the representatives of the Government leave to plead in German (Rule 27 § 2).

On 17 March and 25 April 1989, the Registrar received from the Commission and the applicants various documents which, in accordance with the President's instructions, he had requested it to produce.

On 30 March 1989, the Chamber decided under Rule 50 to relinquish jurisdiction forthwith in favour of the plenary Court.

6. The hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on the appointed day. The Court had held a preparatory meeting immediately beforehand.

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government

Mr J. MEYER-LADEWIG, Ministerialdirigent,
Federal Ministry of Justice, Agent,
Mr A. VON MÜHLENDAHL, Regierungsdirektor,
Federal Ministry of Justice,
Mrs S. WERNER, Richterin am Amtsgericht, Advisers;

- for the Commission

Mr J.A. FROWEIN, Delegate;

- for the applicants

Mr C. TOMUSCHAT, Professor at Bonn University, Counsel.

The Court heard addresses by Mr Meyer-Ladewig and Mr von Mühlendahl for the Government, Mr Frowein for the Commission and Mr Tomuschat for the applicants, as well as their replies to its questions. Mr Tomuschat submitted a number of documents on the occasion of the hearing.

7. On various dates between 30 March and 17 May, the registry received the applicants' claims under Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention and the Government's observations relating thereto.

AS TO THE FACTS

8. The first applicant, markt intern, is a publishing firm, whose registered office is at Düsseldorf. The second applicant, Mr Klaus Beermann, is its editor-in-chief.

9. Markt intern, which was founded and is run by journalists, seeks to defend the interests of small and medium-sized retail businesses against the competition of large-scale distribution companies, such as supermarkets and mail-order firms. It provides the less powerful members of the retail trade with financial assistance in test cases, lobbies public authorities, political parties and trade associations on their behalf and has, on occasion, made proposals for legislation to the legislature.

However, its principal activity in their support is the publication of a number of bulletins aimed at specialised commercial sectors such as that of chemists and beauty product retailers ("markt intern - Drogerie- und Parfümeriefachhandel"). These are weekly news-sheets which provide information on developments in the market and in particular on the commercial practices of large-scale firms and their suppliers. They are printed by offset and are sold by open subscription. They do not contain any advertising or any articles commissioned by the groups whose cause they espouse.

Markt intern claims to be independent. Its income is derived exclusively from subscriptions. It also publishes other series of bulletins containing more general consumer information, such as "Steuertip", "Versicherungstip" and "Flugtip", which are aimed respectively at taxpayers, holders of insurance policies and air travellers.

10. On several occasions undertakings which had suffered from the applicants' criticism or their calls for boycotts instituted proceedings against them for infringement of the Unfair Competition Act of 7 June 1909 (Gesetz gegen den unlauteren Wettbewerb - "the 1909 Act").

1. The article published in the "markt intern - Drogerie- und Parfümeriefachhandel" of 20 November 1975

11. On 20 November 1975 an article by Mr Klaus Beermann appeared in the information bulletin for chemists and beauty product retailers. It described an incident involving an English mail-order firm, Cosmetic Club International ("the Club"), in the following terms:

> "'I ordered the April beauty set ... from Cosmetic Club International and paid for it, but returned it a few days later because I was not satisfied. Although the order-form clearly and expressly stated that I was entitled to return the set if I was dissatisfied, and that I would be reimbursed, I have not yet seen a pfennig. There was also no reaction to my reminder of 18 June, in which I gave them until 26 June to reply.' This is the angry report of Maria Lüchau, a chemist at Celle, concerning the commercial practices of this English Cosmetic Club.
> On 4 November we telexed the manager of the Club, Doreen Miller, as follows: 'Is this an isolated incident, or is this part of your official policy?' In its swift answer of the following day, the Club claimed to have no knowledge of the set returned by Mrs Lüchau or of her reminder of June. It promised however to carry out a prompt investigation of the case and to clarify the matter by contacting the chemist in Celle.
> Notwithstanding this provisional answer from Ettlingen, we would like to put the following question to all our colleagues in the chemists and beauty product trade: Have you had similar experiences to that of Mrs Lüchau with the Cosmetic Club? Do you know of similar cases? The question of whether or not this incident is an isolated case or one of many is crucial for assessing the Club's policy."
> "'Habe beim Cosmetic-Club International das Schönheits-Set ... von April bestellt und bezahlt, aber wegen Nichtgefallen nach wenigen Tagen zurückgesandt. Obwohl auf dem Bestellcoupon klar und deutlich geschrieben steht, dass ich bei Nichtgefallen berechtigt bin, das Set zurückzusenden und mir Erstattung zugesichert wird, habe ich bis heute keinen Pfennig wiedergesehen. Auch auf meine Abmahnung vom 18. Juni mit Fristsetzung 26. Juni erfolgte keine Reaktion.' So der empörte Bericht der Celler Drogistin Maria Lüchau über die Geschäftstätigkeit des aus England importierten Cosmetic-Clubs.

Unser Telex vom 4. November an CCI-Geschäftsführerin Doreen Miller: 'Handelt es sich hier um eine Einzelpanne, oder gehört dieses Verhalten zu Ihrer offiziellen Politik?' In seiner prompten Antwort tags drauf will der CCI weder etwas von Frau Lüchaus Set-Retoure noch von ihrer Abmahnung im Juni wissen. Er verspricht aber eine sofortige Untersuchung des Falles sowie eine klärende Kontaktaufnahme mit der Drogistin in Celle.

12. Previously, on 20 September and 18 October 1974 and on 29 October 1975, markt intern had already published articles on the Club and advised retailers and manufacturers to be cautious in their dealings with it because the Club had failed to respect certain dates and promises. On 29 October 1975 markt intern described as correct the Club's statement in a legal pleading that "a change in the attitude of the industry show[ed] that the call for a boycott [had] not failed to make an impression".

2. The interim injunction (einstweilige Verfügung)

13. The Club instituted proceedings in the Hamburg Regional Court (Landgericht) which, on 12 December 1975, pursuant to Articles 936 and 944 of the Code of Civil Procedure, issued an interim injunction prohibiting markt intern from repeating the statements published on 20 November.

3. The proceedings in the main action (Hauptsache)

(a) The proceedings in the Hamburg Regional Court

14. Since the applicants had requested a decision as to the main issue (Articles 936 and 926 of the Code of Civil Procedure), the Club instituted the appropriate proceedings within the time-limit laid down by the court. It asked the court

"to restrain markt intern from publishing in its information bulletins:

1. the statement that Mrs Lüchau had given an angry account of the Club's commercial activities to the effect that she had returned the beauty set - because she was dissatisfied with it - but had not been reimbursed despite sending a reminder, without stating at the same time that the Club had immediately sent to Mrs Lüchau an enquiry, which it had prepared, for submission to the postal authorities, and that it had assured her that it would reimburse her expenses;

2. the statement that in its immediate response to markt intern, sent on the following day, the Club had stated that it had no knowledge of the beauty set's being returned or of the reminder sent in June, without making clear at the same time that there was no intention to raise doubts as to the accuracy of the Club's statement;

3. the question asking colleagues of the chemists and beauty product retailers trade whether they had had similar experiences to that of Mrs Lüchau or knew of similar cases - because it was of the greatest importance in assessing the Club's policy to know whether this case was an isolated incident or whether there had been others, without making clear at the same time that it was not sought to insinuate that the Club's official policy was to accept payment without immediately supplying the products due".

15. The Regional Court gave its decision on 2 July 1976. It dismissed the Club's first head of claim because the statement was accurate and there was no reason to think that markt intern would disseminate it again without indicating what had occurred since the publication of its information sheet of 20 November 1975 (enquiries made to the postal authorities, etc.). On the other hand, it allowed the other two heads of claim, basing its decision on Article 824 of the Civil Code, according to which, "anyone who untruthfully alleges or disseminates a fact liable to affect adversely a person's creditworthiness or to cause him other disadvantages relating to his earning capacity or his career advancement, shall be liable to pay compensation for any such damage he may have caused". It found that Article 823 of the Civil Code was not applicable and left open the question whether the Club could also rely on the 1909 Act.

In the Regional Court's view, in writing that the Club claimed to have no knowledge of the return of the beauty set and of Mrs Lüchau's reminder (the Club's second head of claim), markt intern had not only expressed doubts as to the accuracy of this information but had also virtually asserted, without providing any proof, that the information provided was untruthful.

By inviting chemists to inform it of any "similar experiences" with the Club (the Club's third head of claim), markt intern had solicited information, which, if possible, was to be of a negative character regarding the Club, despite the fact that there were not at that stage sufficient grounds to suggest that the Club's commercial policy was reprehensible.

The Regional Court acknowledged that economic activities were subject to critical review by the press. However, it considered that the principles of the protection of legitimate interests (Article 193 of the Criminal Code) and of the freedom of expression (Article 5 of the Basic Law) did not protect the repetition of untruthful statements.

The court concluded that the applicants' conduct was culpable. Markt intern ought not to have generalised from the case of Mrs Lüchau, the circumstances of which had not yet been clarified, and used it to formulate criticism of the Club. This method of proceeding could not be reconciled with the obligations incumbent on journalists. The defendants ought to have begun by taking their enquiries further, but not in the form of their request for information from the retailers.

Under the terms of the judgment, for each contravention the applicants were liable to a fine (Ordnungsgeld) or detention (Ordnungshaft) to be fixed by the court, but not exceeding DM 500,000 or six months, respectively.

(b) The proceedings in the Hanseatic Court of Appeal (Hanseatisches Oberlandesgericht)

16. On 31 March 1977 the Hanseatic Court of Appeal found for the applicants and quashed the Regional Court's judgment.

In the Court of Appeal's view, the 1909 Act was not applicable because, by publishing its article on 20 November 1975, markt intern had not acted from competitive motives, in other words with a view to increasing the turnover of chemists and beauty shops, to the detriment of the Club; it had sought to inform its readers that the Club had not dealt as it should have done with a matter concerning one of its own customers. Nor could the Club rely on Articles 824 and 823 of the Civil Code because the allegations published on 20 November 1975 were not untruthful.

As regards the return of the beauty set and Mrs Lüchau's reminder (the Club's first head of claim), the applicants' statements had been consistent with their obligations as journalists. The Criminal Code (Article 193) in principle allowed unfavourable assessments regarding business services in so far as they sought to protect legitimate interests. Article 5 of the Basic Law recognised that the role of the press was to contribute to the forming of public opinion. Finally, there was no risk that markt intern would repeat this particular statement.

The statement that the Club had claimed to have no knowledge of the beauty set and Mrs Lüchau's reminder ("will ... weder ... noch ... wissen") was not objectionable in the circumstances of the case. The form of words merely indicated to the readers that markt intern could not confirm the information provided by the Club.

By its request for information from chemists (the Club's third head of claim), markt intern had not cited facts or made allegations suggesting that the incident in question represented the Club's official policy. It had simply recommended that its readers verify the Club's commercial practices and, indeed, had left open the question whether Mrs Lüchau's case was an isolated incident. It had of course expressed the opinion that it was, in its view, possible that there had been a number of other cases of the same type. This was, however, merely a value judgment.

(c) The proceedings in the Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof)

17. The Club appealed to the Federal Court of Justice which, on 16 January 1980, set aside the Hanseatic Court of Appeal's judgment and, varying the Hamburg Regional Court's judgment, ordered the applicants to refrain from publishing in their information bulletin the statements disseminated by markt intern on 20 November 1975 in the form referred to by the Club in its heads of claim at first instance (see paragraph 14 above).

For each contravention, the applicants were liable to a fine or detention to be fixed by the court, but not exceeding DM 500,000 or six months, respectively.

18. The Federal Court of Justice based its judgment on section 1 of the 1909 Act, according to which:

> "Any person who in the course of business commits, for purposes of competition, acts contrary to honest practices may be enjoined from further engaging in those acts and held liable in damages."

> "Wer im geschäftlichen Verkehre zu Zwecken des Wettbewerbes Handlungen vornimmt, die gegen die guten Sitten verstossen, kann auf Unterlassung und Schadensersatz in Anspruch genommen werden."

(a) Notwithstanding the lack of a competitive relationship between markt intern and the Club, the 1909 Act was said to apply because it was sufficient in this respect that the contested conduct was objectively advantageous to an undertaking, to the detriment of a competitor. That was exactly the aim pursued in this instance. On these points, the Federal Court referred to the established case-law, and in particular its own, concerning the 1909 Act.

In so far as the Court of Appeal had held that the applicants did not intend to intervene in favour of the specialised retail trade to the detriment of the Club, its judgment did not stand up to scrutiny. It had not taken sufficient account of all the circumstances nor attached the correct weight to the evidence adduced. Having regard in particular to the previous reports published by markt intern on the Club (see paragraph 12 above), the Court of Appeal ought to have found that the applicants had not merely provided information as an organ of the press, but had embraced the interests of the specialised chemists trade and, in order to promote those interests, had attacked the Club's commercial practices. The Court of Appeal ought consequently to have concluded that markt intern intended to act in favour of the specialised trade and to the detriment of the Club. In general, it was extremely unusual for the press and the news media to cite an isolated incident such as the case of Mrs Lüchau - according to markt intern it could even have been simply "a breakdown in communications" - in order to raise immediately in public the controversial question whether this case reflected the Club's official policy. The Court of Appeal ought to have regarded markt intern's call for information from its readers concerning negative experiences of a similar type as an even more unusual step, which again revealed the intention to influence the market.

(b) Section 1 of the 1909 Act was thus applicable in this case. It was infringed because the disputed statements were contrary to honest practices on the following grounds:

"By their publication of the article complained of ..., the respondents acted in a way contrary to honest practices within the meaning of section 1 of the 1909 Act. It is immaterial in this connection whether the statements regarding the witness Lüchau (first head of claim) were true. The mere fact that a commercially damaging statement is true does not necessarily constitute a defence against a charge of acting in breach of the principles of fair competition. According to the rules of competition, such statements are acceptable only if they are based on sufficient grounds and if the manner and extent of the criticism in question remains within the limits of what is required by the situation because it is contrary to honest practices to engage in competition by making disparaging statements about competitors (see Federal Court of Justice, Gewerblicher Rechtsschutz und Urheberrecht ("BGH GRUR") 1962, pp. 45 and 48 - Betonzusatzmittel). In this case, at the time of the publication there was not sufficient cause to report this incident. The exact circumstances had not yet been clarified. The appellant in its reply had agreed to undertake an immediate investigation and to contact Mrs Lüchau in order to clarify the position. The respondents were aware that criticism of the appellant could not be fully justified before further clarification had been sought, as they themselves had described the appellant's reply as a provisional answer. Accordingly, they should have taken into consideration that any such premature publication of this incident was bound to have adverse effects on the appellant's business, because it gave the specialised retailers an effective argument which was capable of being used against the appellant with their mutual customers, and one which could be used even if the incident should turn out to be an isolated mishap from which no conclusion could be drawn as to the appellant's business policy. In these circumstances, at all events at the time of the publication, there were not sufficient grounds for reporting this isolated incident. Such conduct is, moreover, very unusual in business competition.

As regards the second head of claim, the appeal on a point of law must be allowed for the simple reason that the sentence: 'The Club claimed to have no knowledge of the set returned by Mrs Lüchau or of her reminder of June' can be understood only in the light of the information contrary to honest competition which is referred to under the first head of claim. As, simply, an additional and related item of information, it qualifies for the same legal assessment, in particular because it was liable to strengthen the unfavourable impression which inevitably resulted from the mere recounting of the incident. The Court of Appeal considered that this was no more than an illustration of the fact that the journalist had not been in a position to verify what had been told to him, but this observation conflicts with its earlier conclusion that the wording used expressed at least serious doubts as to the accuracy of the information and that in this case, consequently, the description of events put forward by the appellant was presented as being, probably, unreliable. The Court of Appeal ought therefore to have stated on what basis it reached a conclusion contrary to the ordinary meaning of the words. It did not do so, so that it may be presumed that at least a significant proportion of the readers of the bulletin would interpret the words employed in accordance with general usage, which was liable to show the appellant in an even more unfavourable light.

The Court of Appeal's dismissal of the third head of claim was based on the following considerations. The question put to chemist and beauty store colleagues asking whether their experiences with the Club had been similar to that of Mrs Lüchau or whether they knew of similar cases, which was said to be very important in assessing the Club's policy, indicated that the respondents considered it possible that a number of cases of this type had occurred. However, this merely represented a value judgment, and as such could not give rise to objections. Yet, under section 1 of the 1909 Act, the decisive issue is not whether the statement is to be regarded as a value judgment or as an allegation of fact. The expression of a value judgment can also exert an unacceptable influence in the field of competition under section 1 of the 1909 Act (see BGH GRUR 1962, p. 47 - Betonzusatzmittel). In this case, there were in any event not sufficient grounds for such a sweeping suspicion. A single case of this type did not constitute evidence for suspecting immediately that the appellant's commercial policy was fraudulent. It is moreover contrary to honest commercial practices to solicit, in such circumstances and at such an early stage, compromising information.

As the respondents were aware of the circumstances giving rise to the criticism that they had acted contrary to honest practices, there can be no reservations, from the subjective point of view, against finding a contravention of section 1 of the 1909 Act. As regards the risk of repetition, regard must be had to the principle laid down by the Federal Court of Justice in its case-law, according to which, where the rules of competition are infringed, there is a presumption of fact that such a risk exists (see Federal Court of Justice, civil cases ("BGHZ") 14, pp. 163 and 171 - Constanze II). This is the case for articles in the press where - as here - the nature of the questions dealt with gives grounds for supposing that the debate was not closed by the publication of the first article (BGHZ 31, pp. 318 and 319 - Alte Herren; BGH, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift ("NJW") 1966, pp. 647 and 649 - Reichstagsbrand). The respondents have not put forward any legally valid evidence that the danger no longer existed."

19. The applicants then appealed to the Federal Constitutional Court, claiming a violation of the freedom of the press (Article 5 § 1 of the Basic Law).

Sitting as a committee of three judges, the Constitutional Court decided, on 9 February 1983, not to entertain the appeal. It considered that the appeal did not offer sufficient prospects of success, for the following reasons:

"As the Federal Constitutional Court held in its decision of 15 November 1982 (1 BvR 108/80 and others [Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts, volume 62, pp. 230-248]), the requirements which must be satisfied in order for freedom of expression and of the press to override other legal interests protected under statutes of general application are not fulfilled where an item published in the press is intended to promote, in the context of commercial competition, certain economic interests to the detriment of others. This is the case as regards the statements prohibited by the Federal Court of Justice. The second sentence of Article 5 § 1 of the Basic Law did not therefore require a different interpretation and application of section 1 of the 1909 Act from that given by the judgment appealed.

As that decision is not based on a violation of the second sentence of Article 5 § 1 of the Basic Law (freedom of the press), it is immaterial that the Federal Court did not, in the reasons given for its decision, expressly address the question of the scope of the freedom of the press in relation to the application of section 1 of the 1909 Act."

20. Mrs Lüchau was not the only customer to complain about the Club. Two others informed the applicants that they had encountered similar difficulties; the first approached them before the publication of the bulletin of 20 November 1975 and the second after it.

According to its own statements, the Club sold 157,929 beauty sets between 1 December 1974 and 30 November 1975. In 1975, 11,870 identifiable persons returned the sets and were reimbursed.

21. In their application of 11 July 1983 to the Commission (no. 10572/83), markt intern and Mr Beermann complained of the restrictions imposed on them by the German courts under section 1 of the 1909 Act.

22. The Commission declared the application admissible on 21 January 1986. In its report of 18 December 1987 (Article 31) (art. 31), it expressed the opinion, by twelve votes to one, that there had been a violation of Article 10 (art. 10). The full text of its opinion is reproduced as an annex to this judgment[*].

FINAL SUBMISSIONS BY THE GOVERNMENT TO THE COURT

23. At the hearing on 25 April 1989 the Government requested the Court to hold that this case disclosed no violation by "the Federal Republic of Germany of Article 10 (art. 10) of the European Convention on Human Rights".

AS TO THE LAW

24. The applicants claimed that the prohibition imposed on them by the German courts under section 1 of the 1909 Act and the broad interpretation which those courts gave to that provision had infringed Article 10 (art. 10) of the Convention, according to which:

> "1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article (art. 10) shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.

[*] Note by the Registrar. For practical reasons this annex will appear only with the printed version of the judgment (volume 165 of Series A of the Publications of the Court), but a copy of the Commission's report is obtainable from the registry.

2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary."

The applicants' view was contested by the Government but accepted by the Commission.

A. Applicability of Article 10 (art. 10)

25. The Government primarily disputed the applicability of Article 10 (art. 10). Before the Court they argued that if the case were examined under that provision, it would fall, by reason of the contents of the publication of 20 November 1975 and the nature of markt intern's activities, at the extreme limit of Article 10's (art. 10) field of application. The wording and the aims of the information bulletin in question showed that it was not intended to influence or mobilise public opinion, but to promote the economic interests of a given group of undertakings. In the Government's view, such action fell within the scope of the freedom to conduct business and engage in competition, which is not protected by the Convention.

The applicants did not deny that they defended the interests of the specialised retail trade. However, they asserted that markt intern did not intervene directly in the process of supply and demand. The undertaking depended exclusively on its subscribers and made every effort, as was proper, to satisfy the requirements of its readers, whose preoccupations the mainstream press neglected. To restrict the freedom of expression to news items of a political or cultural nature would result in depriving a large proportion of the press of any protection.

26. The Court recalls that the writer of the article in question reported the dissatisfaction of a consumer who had been unable to obtain the promised reimbursement for a product purchased from a mail-order firm, the Club; it asked for information from its readers as to the commercial practices of that firm. It is clear that the contested article was addressed to a limited circle of tradespeople and did not directly concern the public as a whole; however, it conveyed information of a commercial nature. Such information cannot be excluded from the scope of Article 10 § 1 (art. 10-1) which does not apply solely to certain types of information or ideas or forms of expression (see, mutatis mutandis, the Müller and Others judgment of 24 May 1988, Series A no. 133, p. 19, § 27).

B. Compliance with Article 10 (art. 10)

27. In the Court's view, the applicants clearly suffered an "interference by public authority" in the exercise of the right protected under Article 10 (art. 10), in the form of the injunction issued by the Federal Court of Justice restraining them from repeating the statements appearing in the information bulletin of 20 November 1975. Such an interference infringes the Convention if it does not satisfy the requirements of paragraph 2 of Article 10 (art. 10-2). It should therefore be determined whether it was "prescribed by law", whether it pursued one or more of the legitimate aims set out in that paragraph and whether it was "necessary in a democratic society" to achieve such aims.

1. "Prescribed by law"

28. In the Government's view, the legal basis for the interference is to be found not only in section 1 of the Unfair Competition Act of 1909 but also, with regard to two of the three contested statements, in section 14 of the same Act ("prohibition of disparaging statements") and Article 824 of the Civil Code (see paragraph 15 above), as applied by the Hamburg Regional Court.

Like the Commission, the Court notes that, while the Federal Court of Justice reinstated for the most part the judgment delivered on 2 July 1976 at first instance, the grounds given for its decision of 16 January 1980 were its own. The Federal Court of Justice based its decision solely on section 1 of the 1909 Act (see paragraph 18 above). It is not necessary to consider whether it could also have relied on the other provisions cited by the Government.

29. The applicants argued that the disputed interference was not "prescribed by law", because it was not foreseeable. The relevant German legislation did not indicate the dividing line between freedom of the press and unfair competition. In the first place, section 1 suffered from an indisputable lack of clarity; it was drafted in vague terms ("gute Sitten"/"honest practices") and conferred a wide discretion on the courts. It did not enable the citizen to foresee, to a degree that was reasonable, whether he would be committing an offence. Secondly, its application was not justified in this case because there was no direct competition between markt intern and the Club. The applicants had not acted "for purposes of competition", as is required under the section in question, but merely carried out their duty as journalists.

The Government maintained, on the other hand, that, because of their considerable experience of litigation, the applicants had been familiar with the text and the interpretation of the 1909 Act long before the contested article was published. On this question the Commission shared the Government's view. The Government added that the relevant provisions of section 1 satisfied the requirements of accessibility and foreseeability laid down in the Court's case-law.

30. The Court has already acknowledged the fact that frequently laws are framed in a manner that is not absolutely precise. This is so in spheres such as that of competition, in which the situation is constantly changing in accordance with developments in the market and in the field of communication (see the Barthold judgment of 25 March 1985, Series A no. 90, p. 22, § 47, and, mutatis mutandis, the Müller and Others judgment, cited above, Series A no. 133, p. 20, § 29). The interpretation and application of such legislation are inevitably questions of practice (see the Sunday Times judgment of 26 April 1979, Series A no. 30, p. 31, § 49).

In this instance, there was consistent case-law on the matter from the Federal Court of Justice (see, inter alia, BGHZ 14, pp. 163, 170-172 - Constanze II; BGHZ 31, pp. 308, 318-319 - Alte Herren; BGH GRUR 1962, pp. 45 and 48 - Betonzusatzmittel; BGH NJW 1966, pp. 647 and 649 - Reichstagsbrand). This case-law, which was clear and abundant and had been the subject of extensive commentary, was such as to enable commercial operators and their advisers to regulate their conduct in the relevant sphere.

2. Legitimate aim

31. In the view of the Government and the Commission, the contested interference was intended to protect "the rights of others". Initially, the Government also cited the "prevention of disorder" and the "protection of morals", but they did not pursue these submissions before the Court.

According to the actual wording of the judgment of 16 January 1980, the contested article was liable to raise unjustified suspicions concerning the commercial policy of the Club and thus damage its business. The Court finds that the interference was intended to protect the reputation and the rights of others, legitimate aims under paragraph 2 of Article 10 (art. 10-2).

3. "Necessary in a democratic society"

32. The applicants argued that the injunction in question could not be regarded as "necessary in a democratic society". The Commission agreed with this view.

The Government, however, disputed it. In their view, the article published on 20 November 1975 did not contribute to a debate of interest to the general public, but was part of an unlawful competitive strategy aimed at ridding the beauty products market of an awkward competitor for specialist retailers. The writer of the article had sought, by adopting aggressive tactics and acting in a way contrary to usual practice, to promote the competitiveness of those retailers. The Federal Court of Justice and the Federal Constitutional Court had ruled in accordance with well established case-law, having first weighed all the interests at stake (Güter- und Interessenabwägung).

In addition, in the field of competition, States enjoyed a wide discretion in order to take account of the specific situation in the national market and, in this case, the national notion of good faith in business. The statements made "for purposes of competition" fell outside the basic nucleus protected by the freedom of expression and received a lower level of protection than other "ideas" or "information".

33. The Court has consistently held that the Contracting States have a certain margin of appreciation in assessing the existence and extent of the necessity of an interference, but this margin is subject to a European supervision as regards both the legislation and the decisions applying it, even those given by an independent court (see, as the most recent authority, the Barfod judgment of 22 February 1989, Series A no. 149, p. 12, § 28). Such a margin of appreciation is essential in commercial matters and, in particular, in an area as complex and fluctuating as that of unfair competition. Otherwise, the European Court of Human Rights would have to undertake a re-examination of the facts and all the circumstances of each case. The Court must confine its review to the question whether the measures taken on the national level are justifiable in principle and proportionate (see, inter alia, the above-mentioned Barthold judgment, Series A no. 90, p. 25, § 55).

34. In this case, in order to establish whether the interference was proportionate it is necessary to weigh the requirements of the protection of the reputation and the rights of others against the publication of the information in question. In exercising its power of review, the Court must look at the impugned court decision in the light of the case as a whole (see the above-mentioned Barfod judgment, Series A no. 149, p. 12, § 28).

Markt intern published several articles on the Club criticising its business practices and these articles, including that of 20 November 1975, were not without a certain effect (see paragraph 12 above). On the other hand, the Club honoured its promises to reimburse dissatisfied customers and, in 1975, 11,870 of them were reimbursed (see paragraph 20 above).

The national courts did weigh the competing interests at stake. In their judgments of 2 July 1976 and 31 March 1977, the Hamburg Regional Court and the Hanseatic Court of Appeal explicitly referred to the right to freedom of expression and of the press, as guaranteed by Article 5 of the Basic Law (see paragraphs 15 and 16 above) and the Federal Constitutional Court, in its decision of 9 February 1983, considered the case under that provision (see paragraph 19 above). The Federal Court of Justice based its judgment of 16 January 1980 on the premature nature of the disputed publication and on the lack of sufficient grounds for publicising in the information bulletin an isolated incident and, in doing so, took into consideration the rights and legal interests meriting protection (see paragraph 18 above).

35. In a market economy an undertaking which seeks to set up a business inevitably exposes itself to close scrutiny of its practices by its competitors. Its commercial strategy and the manner in which it honours its commitments may give rise to criticism on the part of consumers and the specialised press. In order to carry out this task, the specialised press must be able to disclose facts which could be of interest to its readers and thereby contribute to the openness of business activities.

However, even the publication of items which are true and describe real events may under certain circumstances be prohibited: the obligation to respect the privacy of others or the duty to respect the confidentiality of certain commercial information are examples. In addition, a correct statement can be and often is qualified by additional remarks, by value judgments, by suppositions or even insinuations. It must also be recognised that an isolated incident may deserve closer scrutiny before being made public; otherwise an accurate description of one such incident can give the false impression that the incident is evidence of a general practice. All these factors can legitimately contribute to the assessment of statements made in a commercial context, and it is primarily for the national courts to decide which statements are permissible and which are not.

36. In the present case, the article was written in a commercial context; markt intern was not itself a competitor in relation to the Club but it intended - legitimately - to protect the interests of chemists and beauty product retailers. The article itself undoubtedly contained some true statements, but it also expressed doubts about the reliability of the Club, and it asked the readers to report "similar experiences" at a moment when the Club had promised to carry out a prompt investigation of the one reported case.

According to the Federal Court of Justice (see paragraph 18 above), there was not sufficient cause to report the incident at the time of the publication. The Club had agreed to undertake an immediate investigation in order to clarify the position. Furthermore, the applicants had been aware that criticisms of the Club could not be fully justified before further clarification had been sought, as they themselves had described the reply of the Club as a provisional answer. In the opinion of the Federal Court they should therefore have taken into consideration that any such premature publication of the incident was bound to have adverse effects on the Club’s business because it gave the specialised retailers an effective argument capable of being used against the Club with their customers, and one which could be used even if the incident should turn out to be an isolated mishap from which no conclusion could be drawn as to the Club’s business policy.

37. In the light of these findings and having regard to the duties and responsibilities attaching to the freedoms guaranteed by Article 10 (art. 10), it cannot be said that the final decision of the Federal Court of Justice - confirmed from the constitutional point of view by the Federal Constitutional Court - went beyond the margin of appreciation left to the national authorities. It is obvious that opinions may differ as to whether the Federal Court's reaction was appropriate or whether the statements made in the specific case by markt intern should be permitted or tolerated. However, the European Court of Human Rights should not substitute its own evaluation for that of the national courts in the instant case, where those courts, on reasonable grounds, had considered the restrictions to be necessary.

38. Having regard to the foregoing, the Court reaches the conclusion that no breach of Article 10 (art. 10) has been established in the circumstances of the present case.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

Holds, by nine votes to nine, with the casting vote of the President (Rule 20 § 3 of the Rules of Court), that there has been no violation of Article 10 (art. 10) of the Convention.

(Translation)

I.

In the field of human rights, it is the exceptions, and not the principles, which "[are] to be interpreted narrowly"[1].

This proposition is especially true in relation to the freedom of expression.

That principle constitutes "one of the essential foundations" of a democratic society[2], "one of the basic conditions for its progress and for the development of every man"[3]; "it is applicable not only to 'information' or 'ideas' that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offend, shock or disturb ..."[4].

"Due regard being had to the importance of freedom of expression in a democratic society"[5], any interference with it must correspond to a "pressing social need", "be proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued" and be justified on grounds which are not merely "reasonable", but "relevant and sufficient"[6].

In the present case these conditions, which the Court has affirmed on several occasions in previous judgments, were not satisfied.

In any event, in the light of the criteria which the Court has applied hitherto, the "necessity" of the measures taken against the applicants was not "convincingly established"[7].

It is just as important to guarantee the freedom of expression in relation to the practices of a commercial undertaking as it is in relation to the conduct of a head of government, which was at issue in the Lingens case. Similarly the right thereto must be able to be exercised as much in the interests of the purchasers of beauty products as in those of the owners of sick animals, the interests at stake in the Barthold case. In fact, freedom of expression serves, above all, the general interest.

The fact that a person defends a given interest, whether it is an economic interest or any other interest, does not, moreover, deprive him of the benefit of freedom of expression.

In order to ensure the openness of business activities[8], it must be possible to disseminate freely information and ideas concerning the products and services proposed to consumers. Consumers, who are exposed to highly effective distribution techniques and to advertising which is frequently less than objective, deserve, for their part too, to be protected, as indeed do retailers.

In this case, the applicants had related an incident which in fact occurred, as has not been contested[9], and requested retailers to supply them with additional information. They had exercised in an entirely normal manner their basic right to freedom of expression.

This right was, therefore, violated in their regard by the contested measures.

II.

Having said this, we consider it necessary to make three further observations in relation to the present judgment.

We find the reasoning set out therein with regard to the "margin of appreciation" of States[10] a cause for serious concern. As is shown by the result to which it leads in this case, it has the effect in practice of considerably restricting the freedom of expression in commercial matters.

By claiming that it does not wish to undertake a re-examination of the facts and all the circumstances of the case[11], the Court is in fact eschewing the task, which falls to it under the Convention[12], of carrying out "European

On the question of the need to "weigh the competing interests at stake"[15], it is sufficient to note that in this case the interests which the applicants sought "legitimately" to protect[16] were not taken into consideration at all[17].

INDIVIDUAL DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE PETTITI

(Translation)

In addition to the observations put forward in the joint dissenting opinion, I wish to make the following comments.

Freedom of expression is the mainstay of the defence of fundamental rights. Without freedom of expression, it is impossible to discover the violation of other rights.

In this field the States have only a slight margin of appreciation, which is subject to review by the European Court. Only in rare cases can censorship or prohibition of publication be accepted. This has been the prevailing view in the American and European systems since 1776 and 1789 (cf. First Amendment, United States Constitution; case-law of the supreme courts of the United States, Canada, France, etc.).

This is particularly true in relation to commercial advertising or questions of commercial or economic policy, in respect of which the State cannot claim to defend the general interest because the interests of consumers are conflicting. In fact, by seeking to support pressure groups - such as laboratories -, the State is defending a specific interest. It uses the pretext of a law on competition or on prices to give precedence to one group over another. The protection of the interests of users and consumers in the face of dominant positions depends on the freedom to publish even the harshest criticism of products. Freedom must be total or almost total, except where an offence is committed (for example misleading advertising) or where an action is brought for unfair competition, but in those circumstances the solution is not censorship but criminal prosecution or civil proceedings between the undertakings. The arsenal of laws caters for the punishment of misleading advertising.

The limitation of the freedom of expression in favour of the States' margin of appreciation, which is thereby given priority over the defence of fundamental rights, is not consistent with the European Court's case-law or its mission. Such a tendency towards restricting freedoms would also run counter to the work of the Council of Europe in the field of audio-visual technology and trans-frontier satellites aimed at ensuring freedom of expression and protecting the rights of others including those of users and consumers of communication media.

The problem is all the more serious because often the States which seek to restrict the freedom use the pretext of economic infringements or breaches of economic legislation such as anti-competition or anti-trust provisions to institute proceedings for political motives or to protect "mixed" interests (State - industrial) in order to erect a barrier to the freedom of expression (the Eastern block countries provide numerous examples, but the States of the Council of Europe follow this practice too).

The economic pressure which groups or laboratories can exert should not be underestimated. In certain cases this pressure has been such that it has delayed the establishment of the truth and therefore put back the prohibition of a medicine or substance dangerous for the public health.

The economic press of numerous member States publishes each day articles, millions of copies of which are circulated, containing criticism of products in terms a hundred times stronger than those in question in the markt intern case. It is this freedom accorded to that press which ensures the protection of the public at large.

INDIVIDUAL DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DE MEYER

(Translation)

In addition to the observations contained in the joint dissenting opinion[1], I consider it to be necessary to make the following comments.

1. It is questionable whether the "aim" of the interference contested by the applicants was sufficiently "legitimate" to justify that interference, because in fact the measure was designed not to protect "rights of others" in the strict sense, but rather to defend mere commercial interests.

2. Ultimately the Court undertook "a re-examination of the facts and all the circumstances" of the case by adopting, in paragraphs 34 to 37 of the judgment, the disputed assessment of the national courts.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE MARTENS, APPROVED BY JUDGE MACDONALD

(Translation)

1. I am entirely convinced of the correctness of the Court's view that the contested article published by markt intern is in principle protected by the freedom of expression secured under Article 10 (art. 10) of the Convention. The socio-economic press is just as important as the political and cultural press for the progress of our modern societies and for the development of every man. In this connection I refer to the joint dissenting opinion of Judges Gölcüklü, Pettiti, Russo, Spielmann, De Meyer, Carrillo Salcedo and Valticos (hereinabove "the joint dissenting opinion"), and I express my agreement with part I of that opinion.

I also share the Court's opinion that the injunction issued by the Federal Court of Justice constituted an "interference by public authority" which infringes the Convention if it does not satisfy the requirements of paragraph 2 of Article 10 (art. 10-2). Here again I refer to the joint dissenting opinion.

Finally, I agree with the Court that these requirements are satisfied as regards the necessity of being "prescribed by law" and having a "legitimate aim", but I cannot follow the Court in its view that, taking account of the margin of appreciation which the Contracting States enjoy, it should accept that the interference was "necessary in a democratic society". On this point I feel that it is necessary to take the analysis set out in the joint dissenting opinion a step further; indeed this is one of the reasons why I did not feel that I could fully support it.

2. In relation to the third sub-paragraph of paragraph 34 of the Court's judgment, I should like to observe in the first place that, in carrying out the review referred to in the preceding paragraph, the Court ought not to have taken into consideration the decisions of the Hamburg Regional Court and the Hanseatic Court of Appeal, which were both quashed by the decision of a higher court: that of the Federal Court of Justice, which is the only relevant decision as the Constitutional Court found the appeal inadmissible.

3. The Federal Court takes the view that the question whether the contested article published by markt intern was acceptable is to be classified under the law on unfair competition and it is this classification, and the assessments inferred therefrom, which the European Court has endorsed (see paragraphs 33, 35, 36 and 37 of its judgment). In so doing, the European Court has subscribed to an approach which, in my view, is incompatible with the right to the freedom of expression, which the Convention also guarantees to a partisan press organ.

4. The law on unfair competition governs the relationships between competitors on the market. It is based on the assumption that in engaging in competition the competitors seek only to serve their own interests, while attempting to harm those of others. That is why (as the Federal Court notes in its judgment) the German law on unfair competition prohibits persons from engaging in competition by making denigrating statements about their competitors. It is permissible for a competitor to criticise another publicly only if he has sufficient reasons for so doing and if the nature and scope of his criticism remain within the limits required by the situation. In this field, the prohibition on publishing criticism is therefore the norm and it falls to the person who takes the risk of publishing such criticism to show that there were sufficient grounds for his criticism and that it remains within the strictest limits. In considering whether this proof has been furnished, the court weighs up only the interests of the two competitors.

In the field of freedom of expression the converse is true. In this field the basic assumption is that this right is used to serve the general interest, in particular as far as the press is concerned, and that is why in this context the freedom to criticise is the norm. Thus in this field it falls to the person who alleges that the criticism is not acceptable to prove that his claim is well-founded. In determining whether he has done so, the court must weigh up the general interest, on the one hand, and the individual interests of the party who claims to have been injured, on the other.

5. It follows that to classify under the law on unfair competition the question whether an article published by an organ of the press is acceptable is to place that organ of the press in a legal position which is fundamentally different from that to which it is entitled under Article 10 (art. 10) of the Convention and one which is clearly unfavourable to it. That is why, in my view, for that organ of press, such a classification constitutes a considerable restriction on the exercise of the freedoms guaranteed to it under Article 10 (art. 10). It should therefore be asked whether it can be necessary in a democratic society to restrict the rights and fundamental freedoms of an organ of the press in this way solely because that organ has espoused the cause of specific economic interests, namely those of a particular sector of a specialised trade. I am in no doubt that this question must be answered in the negative. This is clear from the fact that, as far as I know, such a rule extending the scope of the law on unfair competition to the detriment of freedom of the press is unknown in the other member States of the Council of Europe, and rightly so because, in certain respects, all newspapers may be regarded as partisan, having espoused the cause of certain specific interests.

6. In my view, it follows from the foregoing that the Court ought to have considered that in this instance it had to examine a case in which the assessment of the national authorities suffered from a fundamental defect and that, accordingly, it ought itself to have determined whether the interference was necessary in a democratic society. Indeed, in such circumstances the margin of appreciation plays no role because this margin cannot justify assessments incompatible with the freedoms guaranteed under the Convention. I emphasise this point because, for my part, I do not deny that in the field of freedom of expression the European Court can limit the scope of its review by leaving the States a certain margin of appreciation.

7. In this context I should like to make clear that I cannot agree, either, with the opinion of the Court in so far as it considers that in this instance, in order to determine whether the interference was proportionate, it is necessary to weigh up the requirements of the protection of the reputation and rights of others, on the one hand, and the publication of the information in question on the other (see paragraph 34 of the Court's judgment).

In my view - and here too I find myself in agreement with the joint dissenting opinion - it is necessary to ask whether it was established convincingly (see the Barthold judgment of 25 March 1985, Series A no. 90, p. 25, § 58) that the private interests of the Club were more important than the general interest, in accordance with which not only the specialised reader but also the public as a whole should have been able to acquaint themselves with facts having a certain importance in the context of the struggle of small and medium-sized retail undertakings against the large-scale distribution companies. In answering this question, I, like the authors of the joint dissenting opinion, reach the conclusion that the reply must be negative. Like the Court (see paragraph 35 of its judgment), I take into account the fact that in a market economy an undertaking which seeks to set up a business inevitably exposes itself to close scrutiny of its practices. That is why the Club, which was in that situation, cannot in principle complain that the specialised press, which has given itself the task of defending the interests of its competitors on that market, analyses its commercial strategy and publishes its criticisms thereof. Such criticism contributes, as the Court stressed, to the openness of business activities. Since the freedom of expression also applies to "statements" which hurt, care should be taken not to find such criticism unacceptable too quickly simply because it harms the undertaking criticised. In this instance, it cannot be denied that the article published by markt intern is unfavourable to the Club and reveals a very critical attitude in the latter's regard. On the other hand, it reported an incident which, as has not been contested, in fact occurred and it did not purport to offer a definitive assessment of the Club's commercial practices, but invited retailers to supply additional information. For my part, I am not convinced that it is truly necessary to prohibit such an article in a democratic society.

8. It is for the above reasons that I voted in favour of finding a violation of Article 10 (art. 10).

In the case of Miailhe v. France (no. 2) (1),

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") and the relevant provisions of Rules of Court A (2), as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr R. Bernhardt, President,
Mr L.-E. Pettiti,
Mr C. Russo,
Mr N. Valticos,
Mrs E. Palm,
Mr R. Pekkanen,
Mr A.N. Loizou,
Mr P. Jambrek,
Mr P. Kuris,

and also of Mr H. Petzold, Registrar, and Mr P.J. Mahoney, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 28 March and 27 August 1996,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

1. The case is numbered 47/1995/553/639. The first number is the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court in the relevant year (second number). The last two numbers indicate the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court since its creation and on the list of the corresponding originating applications to the Commission.

2. Rules A apply to all cases referred to the Court before the entry into force of Protocol No. 9 (P9) (1 October 1994) and thereafter only to cases concerning States not bound by that Protocol (P9). They correspond to the Rules that came into force on 1 January 1983, as amended several times subsequently.

1. The case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 29 May 1995, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 para. 1 and Article 47 of the Convention (art. 32-1, art. 47). It originated in an application (no. 18978/91) against the French Republic lodged with the Commission under Article 25 (art. 25) by a French national, Mr William Miailhe, who also has Philippine nationality, on 16 September 1991.

The Commission's request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) and to the declaration whereby France recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46). The object of the request was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Article 6 para. 1 of the Convention (art. 6-1).

2. In response to the enquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 para. 3 (d) of Rules of Court A, the applicant stated that he wished to take part in the proceedings and designated the lawyers who would represent him (Rule 30).

3. The Chamber to be constituted included ex officio Mr L.-E. Pettiti, the elected judge of French nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr R. Bernhardt, the Vice-President of the Court (Rule 21 para. 4 (b)). On 8 June 1995, in the presence of the Registrar, the President of the Court, Mr R. Ryssdal, drew by lot the names of the other seven members, namely Mr B. Walsh, Mr C. Russo, Mr N. Valticos, Mrs E. Palm, Mr A.N. Loizou, Mr P. Jambrek and Mr P. Kuris (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 para. 5) (art. 43). Subsequently Mr R. Pekkanen, substitute judge, replaced Mr Walsh, who was unable to take part in the further consideration of the case (Rules 22 para. 1 and 24 para. 1).

4. As President of the Chamber (Rule 21 para. 6), Mr Bernhardt, acting through the Registrar, consulted the Agent of the French Government ("the Government"), the applicant's lawyer and the Delegate of the Commission on the organisation of the proceedings (Rules 37 para. 1 and 38). Pursuant to the order made in consequence, the Registrar received the applicant's and the Government's memorials on 20 and 28 November 1995 respectively. On 1 February 1996 the Secretary to the Commission informed the Registrar that the Delegate did not wish to reply in writing.

On 13 December 1995 and 22 January 1996 the Commission produced the documents of the proceedings before it, as requested by the Registrar on the President's instructions.

5. In accordance with the President's decision, the hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 26 March 1996. The Court had held a preparatory meeting beforehand.

There appeared before the Court:

(a) for the Government

Mr M. Perrin de Brichambaut, Director of Legal Affairs, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Agent,
Mr B. Nedelec, magistrat, on secondment to the Legal Affairs Department, Ministry of Foreign Affairs,
Mr E. Bourgoin, Director of Taxes, Legal Department, Ministry of the Budget,
Mr B. Hacquin, département Director of Taxes, on secondment to the Ministry of Justice, Counsel;

(b) for the Commission

Mr J.-C. Soyer, Delegate;

(c) for the applicant

Mr D. Baudin, of the Conseil d'Etat and Court of Cassation Bar,
Mr F. Goguel, of the Paris Court of Appeal Bar, Counsel.

The Court heard Mr Soyer, Mr Baudin, Mr Goguel and Mr Perrin de Brichambaut.

AS TO THE FACTS

I. Circumstances of the case

6. Mr Miailhe has dual French and Philippine nationality. He was honorary consul of the Philippines in Bordeaux from 1960 to May 1983 and also looked after that country's consulate in Toulouse.

A. The origins of the case - the customs prosecution

7. On 5 and 6 January 1983 customs officers seized nearly 15,000 documents at the applicant's Bordeaux residence, on premises housing the head offices of companies he managed and the consulate of the Republic of the Philippines. This operation was part of an investigation to determine, among other things, whether the applicant and his mother were to be regarded as being resident in France.

The judicial investigation that had been commenced on a complaint lodged by the director of customs investigations alleging unlawful accumulation and holding of assets abroad ended in a judgment of the Criminal Court of 2 December 1992 in which the court ruled that the public prosecution and the proceedings for imposition of customs penalties in respect of Mr and Mrs Miailhe were barred as a result of changes in the criminal law and ordered the return of the seized documents. These were returned in January 1993.

8. Mr Miailhe challenged before the Strasbourg institutions the lawfulness of the customs seizures made pursuant to Articles 64 and 454 of the Customs Code. Those proceedings led to two judgments of the European Court of Human Rights. In the first of these it was held that there had been a breach of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8), on the ground that the house searches and seizures made by customs officers without a judicial warrant had interfered with the private life of the applicant, his mother and his wife; and in the second, France was ordered to pay Mr Miailhe 50,000 French francs (FRF) in respect of non-pecuniary damage and FRF 60,000 for costs and expenses (see the Miailhe v. France (no. 1) judgments of 25 February 1993, Series A no. 256-C, and 29 November 1993, Series A no. 277-C).

B. The administrative tax-inspection proceedings

9. On 4 March 1983 the National Head Office for Tax Investigations sent the applicant notice of a full audit of his overall tax position in respect of his income for the years 1979, 1980, 1981 and 1982.

Since Mr Miailhe regarded himself as being resident for tax purposes in the Philippines, and accordingly not under an obligation to pay tax to the French State, the Revenue asked him to produce copies of his tax assessment notices in the Philippines and documents giving details of all bank accounts in his name both in France and abroad.

On 20 April 1983 Mr Miailhe replied that it was impossible for him to forward some of the documents that had been kept by the customs and which he had asked to have returned to him.

10. During May 1983 the tax inspector exercised the right of inspection provided in Articles L.81 et seq. of the Code of Tax Procedure and Article 64A of the Customs Code.

At the offices of his customs colleagues he examined the 9,478 documents that had been kept and classified by the customs authorities and made copies of 1,200 to 1,300 of them.

11. On 9 February 1984 the tax inspector asked the Philippine authorities for administrative assistance as provided for in Article 26 of the Franco-Philippine Tax Convention of 9 January 1976 "for the avoidance of double taxation and prevention of fiscal evasion in relation to income tax" (see paragraph 27 below).

On 21 March 1985 he inspected 41 sheets concerning returns and annexes of the applicant and his mother for the years 1980 and 1982, 27 sheets concerning returns, appended financial statements and certificates from the accountant of the AMIBU company managed by the applicant in respect of the years 1979, 1980 and 1981, and three sheets relating to a provisional accounting statement and a bank reconciliation as at 15 September 1982.

These documents reached the Revenue's administrative headquarters in Paris on 8 November 1984.

12. At the end of the tax audit four supplementary assessments were served on Mr Miailhe: on 22 December 1983 for the year 1979, on 4 December 1984 for the year 1980, on 19 February 1985 for the year 1981 and on 12 March 1985 for the year 1982. The Revenue subsequently amended the notices in respect of the years 1979, 1980 and 1981, once on 16 July 1985, in the light of comments by the applicant, and again on 8 November 1985, to correct erroneous reasons.

13. The relevant documents to be studied for each category of proceedings - administrative, tax and criminal - were not all the same, since different tax years and bases of assessment were involved, as were failures to make returns and real-property and agricultural taxes distinct from the general income tax to which the dispute over tax residence related more particularly.

C. Appeals against the assessments to the administrative courts

14. Mr Miailhe challenged the supplementary tax assessments for the years 1979-82 in the administrative courts, which have jurisdiction in tax matters, by lodging an appeal founded partly on the non-adversarial nature of the Revenue's preparation of the case against him.

In a judgment of 12 December 1991 the Bordeaux Administrative Court held that the applicant had not proved that he had expressly asked the Revenue to produce the documents on which it had allegedly based the assessments for the years 1980, 1981 and 1982 and ordered further inquiries on this point. As to the assessment raised for the year 1979, on the other hand, the court found that the Revenue had failed to accede to an application for production made by the applicant's lawyer and accordingly remitted the additional tax sought from the applicant in the category of income from movable assets and in respect of income from undetermined sources for that year. An appeal by the Minister for the Budget regarding the remission of tax granted for the single year 1979 was dismissed by the Bordeaux Administrative Court of Appeal.

An appeal on points of law against the Administrative Court's judgment is pending before the Conseil d'Etat. The Administrative Court has not yet ruled on the merits as regards the supplementary tax assessments for the years 1980, 1981 and 1982.

15. In other proceedings brought against the Revenue by the AMIBU company, managed by the applicant, the Bordeaux Administrative Court of Appeal found that the tax assessment challenged by the company was based in part on documents seized by the customs in circumstances that had been held to be contrary to Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8). In a judgment of 15 June 1995 it allowed the company's application for remission of tax as follows:

> "While the unlawfulness of the seizure, in proceedings brought under different legislation, of documents on the basis of which the Revenue, exercising its right of inspection, assessed the taxes has no effect on the lawfulness of the tax proceedings, it is such as to deprive those documents of any probative value, including inasmuch as they revealed to the Revenue that the taxpayer was in a position to have his tax assessed by the Revenue of its own motion. Where an international judicial body set up by an international treaty or agreement that has been lawfully ratified or approved has ruled that the seizure of documents did not comply with the said treaty or agreement, the court having jurisdiction in tax matters must regard the seized documents as having no probative value ..."

D. The criminal proceedings for tax evasion

16. On 15 April 1986 the Tax Offences Board ("the CIF") gave approval for a complaint to be lodged seeking the imposition of criminal tax penalties, pursuant to Article L.228 of the Code of Tax Procedure (see paragraph 29 below).

In consequence, the Department of Revenue lodged a complaint, together with an application to join the proceedings as a civil party, against the applicant for tax evasion in respect of the years 1981 and 1982. It accused him of not having made any general tax return for 1981 and of having understated his agricultural income for 1982.

17. The Revenue annexed to its complaint some of the documents given to it by the customs authorities. It did not at that juncture append any of the documents forwarded by the Philippine authorities, although the tax inspector's summary report that had been placed in the file of the judicial investigation mentioned the correspondence between the French and the Philippine authorities.

The investigating judge raised this point with the tax inspector, who referred back to his central authorities and subsequently told the judge that his authorities had hesitated to produce in criminal proceedings documents which the ordinary judicial authorities could not have procured for themselves. At the judge's request, the inspector added to the file the documents from the Philippines provided by his authorities, that is to say the only documents concerning Mr Miailhe in respect of the offences charged. The documents not placed in the file related either to Mrs Miailhe and the AMIBU company - and neither of these was implicated - or, in respect of the defendant, to the years 1980 and 1982, which the proceedings for failure to make a tax return were not concerned with.

18. On 6 May 1988 the investigating judge committed the applicant for trial at the Bordeaux Criminal Court on a charge of having fraudulently evaded, in part, assessment and payment of income tax for the years 1981 and 1982 "by having failed to make certain category-specific returns (in respect of income from movable assets, 'RCM', and industrial and commercial profits, 'BIC', Article 92 of the General Tax Code) within the prescribed time-limits (in respect of 1981) and by having omitted from his returns (for 1981 and 1982) part of his income from farming and real property, thus deliberately concealing in his overall returns part of the sums liable to tax".

1. In the Bordeaux Criminal Court

19. Before any defence on the merits Mr Miailhe filed submissions in which he sought to have the Revenue's complaint and the judicial investigation proceedings declared null and void. He argued that the customs seizures were null and void, that the adversarial principle had not been respected by the Revenue and that the latter, in particular during the judicial investigation, had withheld documents from the judicial authorities and made false statements.

He himself filed certain documents that he had been able to obtain from the Philippine authorities: the French tax authorities' request to their Philippine opposite numbers, the Philippine authorities' reply indicating that Mr and Mrs Miailhe had been resident for tax purposes in the Philippines for 1980 and 1982, information concerning the AMIBU company, untranslated bank documents, a certificate by a registered accountant to the effect that Mr Miailhe's tax return for 1982 had been made in good faith, a statement of his income and expenditure for 1982, an amortisation table for 1981, a statement of his income for 1981, the tax return he made in the Philippines for 1981 and a tax return for 1982.

20. On 11 January 1989 the Criminal Court gave its judgment.

It began by dismissing all Mr Miailhe's preliminary objections.

As regards the first of those, it pointed out that on an appeal by the applicant concerning the lawfulness of the seizures, the Court of Cassation had upheld a judgment of the Paris Court of Appeal in which that court had said that "the customs officials did not exceed their powers and that there was no manifest, deliberate violation of a personal freedom"; the customs seizures were covered by paragraph 2 of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8-2) and the seized documents had been lawfully made available to the Revenue.

It dealt with the second objection as follows:

> "... on account of the principle that tax and criminal proceedings are independent, the [criminal] courts cannot rule on the nullity of tax proceedings. The only exception to this principle is provided in Article L.47 of the Code of Tax Procedure ... This Article provides that proceedings shall be null and void where a notice of audit does not mention that the taxpayer has the right to be assisted by an adviser of his own choosing. As the defendant does not dispute that this information was given to him, he cannot rely on any other argument in order to obtain from the criminal courts a declaration that the tax proceedings are null and void."

As to the last objection, the court found, in the light of the documents produced by the applicant at the hearing, that the letters and documents exchanged by the French and Philippine authorities were not in the file and it held:

> "... The failure to place in the file some documents of importance to the accused's defence, which had been sought in their entirety by the investigating judge, amounts to a breach of his rights.
> That breach of the rights of the defence cannot, however, have the consequence that the earlier proceedings were a nullity. By producing these documents at the hearing, the accused was able to explain their content and have them submitted to adversarial argument. The breach of his rights did not therefore have the effect of prejudicing his interests."

21. Ruling on the question whether Mr Miailhe was under an obligation to make a return in France of his category-specific income and whether he had with fraudulent intent evaded paying that tax for the year 1981, the court held that the applicant was resident for tax purposes in France at the time, both under French law and under the Franco-Philippine Convention. In order to determine whether there had been fraudulent intent, it relied among other things on a manuscript document written by Mr Miailhe that was reproduced in the tax-audit report and on the applicant's conduct in producing only at the hearing his full return for 1981, which had been submitted to the tax inspector with the figures whited out.

As to the undeclared income from farming and real property for the years 1981 and 1982, the court found that the applicant had lent money to himself through the bank accounts of his companies and subsequently deducted from his agricultural income the interest charges and exchange losses. He thus realised a tax loss for those years and legally exported his capital by means of the repayments.

The court concluded that Mr Miailhe had personally put in place fraudulent arrangements designed to evade liability to and payment of tax in France. It sentenced him to three years' imprisonment, of which six months were to be served immediately, and a fine of FRF 150,000. Extracts from the judgment were ordered to be published in the French Official Gazette and in the daily newspapers Le Monde, Le Figaro and Sud-Ouest.

2. In the Bordeaux Court of Appeal

22. The defendant appealed and in the Bordeaux Court of Appeal reiterated the three objections of nullity already raised, stating as to the last of them that:

> "... although he ha[d] been able to obtain a number of withheld documents by seeking them from the Philippine authorities, he ha[d] been unable to inspect most of the documents attached to the correspondence, he still [did] not know what they contained and ha[d] been unable to give explanations concerning them; in particular, he ha[d] not been able to refer to the withheld documents before the Tax Offences Board; ..."

23. The Court of Appeal gave judgment on 7 June 1989.

It joined the objections to the merits and dismissed them, referring "in the case of the first two applications for a declaration of nullity that were reiterated but not strongly argued" to the reasoning of the Criminal Court. The last objection, concerning the withholding of documents and the false statements, it dismissed as follows:

> "These documents should have been handed over but provide no information that could have any bearing on the decision of the court below or of this court: for the most part they did not concern Miailhe or the period in question, 1981; ... the documents not filed were of no relevance to the case and, at all events, were produced at the hearing in the court below and examined adversarially on that occasion; the same reasoning, except for the adversarial examination of the documents, applies to the Tax Offences Board; moreover, at first instance no application was made for a declaration that the proceedings before the Board were null and void.
> As regards the very large number of other documents handed over but not placed in the file, their existence, alleged by [the applicant], has not been proved and they cannot be taken into account in any way."

24. On the merits the court held, as to the first offence of failure to declare income for 1981, that the applicant was a French resident for tax purposes under French law alone, as the Franco-Philippine Convention did not operate in the instant case since there was no conflict between the two sets of national legislation. The court pointed out that the Revenue's calculations had been based on documents signed in France by Mr Miailhe, which it listed. The court held that he had had fraudulent intent from a scrutiny of notes by him that had been seized and were in the file and documents that he had placed in it himself, which showed that notwithstanding his alleged status as Philippine resident and citizen, he had not discharged his obligation to declare his world income in the Philippines either.

The Court of Appeal, which upheld the Criminal Court's judgment in its entirety, sentenced the defendant to three years' imprisonment, of which ten months were to be served immediately, and a fine of FRF 250,000.

3. In the Court of Cassation

25. Mr Miailhe lodged an appeal on points of law, which was dismissed by the Court of Cassation (Criminal Division) on 18 March 1991.

The judgment read as follows:

> "As to the second ground of appeal, based on the breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the ... Convention ...
> ...
> The ground must therefore fail;
> As to the third ground of appeal, based on a breach of ...

Article 6 (art. 6) of the ... Convention ...

Firstly, the accused merely raised, in the court of trial before any defence on the merits, an objection of nullity going to the lawfulness of the supplementary tax assessment proceedings, which, as they are purely administrative, are irrelevant to the criminal proceedings.

That being so, the first limb of the ground of appeal, which raises for the first time before the Court of Cassation the objection based on the alleged nullity of the proceedings before the Tax Offences Board gave its opinion, is inadmissible under Article 385 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Secondly, as a ground for refusing to allow the objection that the ordinary criminal proceedings were a nullity on account of the Revenue's withholding of documents useful to the defence, the Court of Appeal noted that under the Franco-Philippine Tax Convention of 9 January 1976, the French authorities sought administrative assistance from the Philippine authorities. The accused maintained that 71 documents were sent to the French authorities in this way. The accused, who had been able to obtain some of these documents, produced them at the hearing in the Criminal Court. After studying these documents, the Court of Appeal found that they were of no relevance to the case, most of them not concerning [William] Miailhe or the period referred to in the charge. At all events, they were produced at the hearing in the Criminal Court and examined adversarially on that occasion. The Court of Appeal added that the existence of the other documents allegedly sent and not placed in the file had not been proved.

In ruling as it did, the Court of Appeal, which based its judgment only on the documents produced at the hearing, provided a legal basis for its decision.

The second limb of the ground of appeal must likewise fail."

26. The applicant was committed to prison on 18 March 1991 and was released on licence on 21 July of the same year. He was placed under judicial supervision until 8 November 1991.

II. Relevant international and domestic law

A. The Franco-Philippine Convention of 9 January 1976

27. At Kingston on 9 January 1976 the French and Philippine Governments signed a convention "for the avoidance of double taxation and prevention of fiscal evasion in relation to income tax". Article 26 ("Exchange of information") provides:

"1. The competent authorities of the Contracting States shall exchange such information (being information which is at their disposal under their respective tax administrative practices and those which may be procured by special inquiry) as is necessary for the carrying out of this Convention and of the domestic laws of the Contracting States concerning taxes covered by this Convention, in particular, for the prevention of fraud or evasion of such taxes. Any information so exchanged shall be treated as secret and shall not be disclosed to any persons or authorities other than those (including a court or administrative body) concerned with the assessment, collection, or enforcement in respect of taxes which are the subject of the Convention or with the prosecution, claims and appeals relating thereto.

2. In no case shall the provisions of paragraph 1 be construed so as to impose on one of the Contracting States the obligation:

(a) to carry out administrative measures at variance with the laws or the administrative practices of that or of the other Contracting State;

(b) to supply particulars which are not obtainable under the laws or in the normal course of the administration of that or of the other Contracting State;

(c) ..."

B. The Code of Tax Procedure

28. Administrative tax-inspection proceedings are governed by the Code of Tax Procedure. By Article L.47 of that code,

"A full audit of the overall tax position of a natural person in regard to income tax or an audit of accounts cannot be undertaken unless the taxpayer has been informed of it by the sending or handing over of a notice of audit.

Such a notice must specify the years in respect of which the audit is to be made and expressly mention, failing which the proceedings will be null and void, that the taxpayer has the right to be assisted by an adviser of his own choosing.

In the event of an unannounced inspection for the purpose of identifying physical features of the business or establishing the existence and state of the books, the notice of an audit of the accounts shall be handed over at the beginning of the search operation. A thorough scrutiny of the books may only begin after the taxpayer has been given a reasonable time to seek the assistance of an adviser."

The courts with jurisdiction in tax matters, which in the case of direct taxes are the administrative courts, are competent in principle to deal with irregularities in administrative tax-inspection proceedings. They ensure that the safeguards afforded to taxpayers are complied with. Thus "a final decision by a criminal court cannot prevent a taxpayer from arguing before a court with jurisdiction in tax matters that the audit which gave rise to the impugned tax assessments was irregular" (Conseil d'Etat, 9 April 1986, no. 22691, Revue de jurisprudence fiscale, June 1986, no. 625).

29. Article L.228 of the Code of Tax Procedure provides:

"To be admissible, complaints seeking the imposition of > criminal penalties in respect of direct taxes, value-added tax and other turnover taxes, registration fees, land registry fees and stamp duty must be lodged by the administrative authorities after approval from the Tax Offences Board.

> The Board shall consider the cases submitted to it by the Minister of Finance. The taxpayer shall be given notice of the application to the Board, which shall invite him to send it, within thirty days, any information it considers necessary.
> The Minister shall be bound by the Board's opinions."

The Revenue is not required by any provision of statute or of regulations to institute criminal proceedings in respect of the offences referred to in Article 1741 of the General Tax Code (Conseil d'Etat, 5 November 1980, Droit fiscal 1981, p. 365).

The CIF was set up under the Act of 29 December 1977 in order to afford taxpayers fresh safeguards and it is made up of six senior members of the Conseil d'Etat (judges of the administrative courts) and six senior members of the Court of Audit (judges of the financial courts). Parliament absolutely excluded the possibility of the CIF being a court of first instance. It refused to allow the CIF's opinions to contain reasons, in order to avoid influencing the ordinary courts. As long as there is no breach of due process, a taxpayer accused of tax evasion may not challenge in the criminal courts the lawfulness of the administrative proceedings which took place prior to the CIF's favourable opinion; the criminal court must only establish the existence and date of that opinion (Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, 2 December 1985, Recueil Dalloz Sirey ("DS") 1986, p. 489).

The only function of the criminal courts that hear tax-evasion cases is to punish the offence. The Court of Cassation has held:

> "... Criminal proceedings instituted under Article 1741 of the General Tax Code and the administrative proceedings for establishing the tax base and the scope of tax are in their nature and purpose different and independent from each other ... the function of courts which try criminal cases under Article 1741 is limited to determining whether the defendant evaded or attempted to evade tax by reprehensible subterfuges in respect of sums exceeding the statutory allowance." (Criminal Division, 9 April 1970, DS 1970, p. 755)

Article L.47 provides that any breach of its provisions shall entail a nullity of the proceedings "without any distinction being made between administrative proceedings and criminal proceedings ... Since the latter proceedings may be based on findings made by the inspectors in the books and documents held by a taxpayer, compliance with the requirements of [Article L.47] is an essential safeguard of the rights of the defence, which it is for the criminal courts to ensure are respected" (Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, 4 December 1978, Venutolo, DS 1979, p. 90). However, "it is not within the jurisdiction of the criminal courts to assess the lawfulness of the tax proceedings ... The criminal courts' response to failure to comply with the provisions of Article L.47, in that it departs from the general principle of the separation of administrative and ordinary courts, must be based on a strict construction and accordingly cannot be extended beyond the cases to which the statute expressly meant to limit it" (Court of Cassation, Criminal Division, 9 May 1983, DS 1983, p. 621).

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

30. Mr Miailhe applied to the Commission on 16 September 1991. Relying on Article 6 of the Convention (art. 6), he complained firstly of a breach of the principle of equality of arms during the administrative phase of the proceedings, before the CIF gave its opinion, and secondly of a breach of the rights of the defence during the trial.

31. The Commission declared the application (no. 18978/91) admissible on 6 April 1994. In its report of 11 April 1995 (Article 31) (art. 31), it expressed the opinion by eleven votes to two that there had been a breach of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1). The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the dissenting opinion contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to this judgment (1).

FINAL SUBMISSIONS TO THE COURT BY THE GOVERNMENT

32. In their memorial the Government asked the Court to "dismiss all the applicant's complaints".

AS TO THE LAW

ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 6 PARA. 1 OF THE CONVENTION (art. 6-1)

33. Mr Miailhe complained that he had not had access to all the documents held by the Revenue and that this had contravened the principle of equality of arms during the administrative stage before the Tax Offences Board (CIF) gave its opinion and had infringed the rights of the defence during the criminal trial. He relied on Article 6 para. 1 of the Convention (art. 6-1), which provides:

> "In the determination of ... any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a ... hearing ... by an independent and impartial tribunal ..."

A. The Government's preliminary objections

34. Before the Court the Government reiterated the three objections they had already raised before the Commission. The first of these was that the application was incompatible ratione materiae with the Convention inasmuch as it related to the supplementary tax assessment proceedings; the second, that domestic remedies had not been exhausted in respect of the supplementary tax assessment proceedings and the procedure of consulting the CIF; and the third, that the applicant was not a victim in respect of the complaint that the documents seized by the customs had not been produced.

They maintained, firstly, that the application contained two separate complaints. The Court could not entertain the first of these since it concerned the administrative supplementary tax assessment stage and the Revenue's refusal to hand over documents seized by the customs, a refusal which had allegedly made it impossible for Mr Miailhe to meet the requests for proof or to respond to the supplementary tax assessment notices. The Commission had, the Government continued, unjustly dealt with the different sets of proceedings together notwithstanding that they were independent of each other. The administrative tax-inspection proceedings, disputes over which came within the jurisdiction of the administrative courts that were currently dealing with another identical complaint of Mr Miailhe's concerning failure to produce documents during the supplementary tax assessment proceedings, were not covered by Article 6 of the Convention (art. 6); they were unconnected with the administrative proceedings before the CIF, whose opinion, though certainly a mandatory prerequisite for lodging a criminal complaint of tax evasion, was not binding on the authorities and still less on the courts.

Furthermore, as the Court of Cassation had declared inadmissible the ground of appeal relating to the procedure of consulting the CIF, the Commission should have dismissed that part of the application.

Lastly, the applicant had never sought to obtain any of the documents seized by the customs relating to the years concerned in the present case; he could not therefore complain of a refusal by the authorities.

In short, the Court had to deal solely with the criminal proceedings that ended with the Court of Cassation's judgment of 18 March 1991 whereby Mr Miailhe's conviction for tax evasion became final.

35. According to the Delegate of the Commission, the CIF's favourable opinion, without which no application could be made to the criminal courts, had had a decisive bearing on the outcome of the criminal trial, and Mr Miailhe had properly exhausted domestic remedies by alleging in the national courts that all the proceedings that had taken place before the CIF's opinion was given were null and void. The proceedings before the CIF ought, under the Court's case-law in the Imbrioscia v. Switzerland case (judgment of 24 November 1993, Series A no. 275), to afford the safeguards required by Article 6 of the Convention (art. 6).

36. The applicant stated that his complaint of failure to respect the adversarial principle referred only to the procedure of consulting the CIF, which was decisive for the subsequent criminal trial. He was not for the time being attacking the proceedings relating solely to tax, which had not yet been concluded in the administrative courts. He added that he had continually asked for the seized documents.

37. The Court notes at the outset that the administrative supplementary tax assessment proceedings are currently pending before the Conseil d'Etat as the court which hears appeals on points of law (see paragraph 14 above). To that extent, the objection of incompatibility ratione materiae and, in so far as it relates to those proceedings, the objection that domestic remedies have not been exhausted are devoid of purpose.

The second objection, that domestic remedies have not been exhausted as regards the procedure of consulting the CIF, has already been considered by the Commission, which decided to dismiss it. The Court sees no reason to depart from the Commission's analysis and dismisses it likewise.

The third objection, that the applicant was not a victim, goes to the merits of the case, and the Court therefore joins it to them.

B. The merits of the complaint

38. In Mr Miailhe's view, Article 6 (art. 6) had the consequence that the Revenue could base its prosecutions only on information that had been obtained fairly. Yet all the documents used against him to determine his place of principal residence - which was at the heart of the case - had been found among documents that had been seized unlawfully and related to his or his family's private life. He had not had access to them to defend himself during the administrative proceedings, up to and including the CIF's decision.

Essentially, the applicant said he was the victim of the consequences of the original breach of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8) found by the Court in the Miailhe (no. 1) judgment; the prosecuting authorities had rendered his criminal conviction unfair, based as it was almost exclusively on the documents seized by the customs in circumstances held to have been contrary to the Convention.

Moreover, it was only at the stage of the judicial investigation in the criminal proceedings, on an order from the investigating judge, that the Revenue had placed in the file the documents it had obtained from the Philippine authorities, and then only some of them. Mr Miailhe had made an oral request to the judge to obtain all these documents. While he had himself been able to procure some of them from the Philippine authorities, he did not have a key document, the letter in which the Philippine authorities recognised his status as a Philippine resident.

By producing only the documents that supported its submissions to the trial court, the Revenue had therefore deprived him of the means of proving that he was resident for tax purposes in the Philippines and infringed the rights of the defence. The trial court had, moreover, acknowledged that documents had indeed been withheld.

39. The Commission accepted Mr Miailhe's submissions in substance. It pointed out that he had not been in a position to make useful submissions to the CIF on account of the refusal to hand over to him prosecution documents obtained by the customs in circumstances condemned by the European Court. Furthermore, the failure to produce all the documents supplied by the Philippine authorities had deprived the applicant of a fair trial.

40. In the Government's submission, the seized documents were passed on by the customs to the Revenue in accordance with national statutory provisions, and there was nothing at the time to warrant regarding those documents as having been seized unlawfully under French law. Moreover, in its judgment of 6 December 1995 in a leading case the Conseil d'Etat by implication invalidated the approach adopted in the applicant's favour by the Bordeaux Administrative Court of Appeal (see paragraph 15 above), as there was no "contamination by procedural defects" in respect of documents lawfully made available to the Revenue by the judicial authorities where the documents had subsequently been declared null and void by the criminal courts. Furthermore, Mr Miailhe, the Government said, had never sought production of the documents seized in respect of the relevant proceedings and supplementary tax assessment years. He had asked only for the documents from the Philippine assistance file.

Contrary to the Commission's findings on the consultation procedure prior to the lodging of a complaint for tax evasion, the Government continued to maintain that the CIF was a non-judicial body. It had been established to afford taxpayers new procedural safeguards and limited the discretion previously enjoyed by the Minister, who was now bound where an opinion was to the effect that a complaint should not be lodged. It ruled on the advisability of prosecution, and its opinion, which was purely advisory, could not in any circumstances be regarded as tantamount to a judgment at first instance in regard to the taxpayer.

As to the Philippine documents, the Government submitted that their existence had never been concealed and that the only ones relevant to the case had eventually been placed in the case file. The courts, which had considered the reasons put forward by the authorities to explain why they had not been produced, had based their judgments on grounds of fact and of law.

The applicant had been able to present argument on the whole of the file, which also contained other documents, and as he had enjoyed equality of arms at the trial, he had not found himself at a disadvantage.

41. The Court notes, firstly, that the documents seized by the customs were passed on by them to the Revenue in May 1983 (see paragraph 10 above). Three years later the Revenue lodged a complaint alleging tax evasion against Mr Miailhe, whom it accused of having fraudulently omitted to declare his general income for 1981 and of having understated his agricultural income for 1982 (see paragraph 16 above). It had already served supplementary tax assessments on him, on 19 February 1985 in respect of the year 1981 and on 12 March 1985 in respect of the year 1982 (see paragraph 12 above).

The applicant now complained that he had not been given the documents seized by the customs in breach of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8) so that he could contest the fraud charges by proving that he was resident for tax purposes in the Philippines, both during the criminal proceedings and during the preceding stage before the CIF.

The Court points out that the Miailhe (no. 1) judgment on the merits was given on 25 February 1993, that is to say after the customs had passed documents on to the Revenue.

Of the private letters and personal documents referred to in the judgment, those which were used for the judicial investigation in the criminal proceedings had been annexed to the summary tax-audit report filed by the Revenue in support of its complaint (see paragraph 17 above). At the investigating judge's request, the Revenue added documents from the Philippines (see paragraph 17 above). All those documents were in the criminal case file, to which the applicant had access.

42. Admittedly, that file did not contain all of the documents provided by the Philippine authorities (see paragraphs 11 and 17 above). However, the documents relevant to the criminal case were added to the file during the judicial investigation, at the request of the investigating judge alone.

On this point the Criminal Court held (see paragraph 20 above):

> "... The failure to place in the file some documents of importance to the accused's defence, which had been sought in their entirety by the investigating judge, amounts to a breach of his rights.
> [It] cannot, however, have the consequence that the earlier proceedings were a nullity. By producing these documents at the hearing, the accused was able to explain their content and have them submitted to adversarial argument. The breach of his rights did not therefore have the effect of prejudicing his interests."

The Court of Appeal held (see paragraph 23 above):

> "These documents should have been handed over but provide no information that could have any bearing on the decision of the court below or of this Court: for the most part they did not concern Miailhe or the period in question, 1981; ... the documents not filed were of no relevance to the case and, at all events, were produced at the hearing in the court below and examined adversarially on that occasion; the same reasoning, except for the adversarial examination of the documents, applies to the Tax Offences Board; ...
> As regards the very large number of other documents handed over but not placed in the file, their existence, alleged by [the applicant], has not been proved and they cannot be taken into account in any way."

By himself filing some of the documents from the Philippines (see paragraph 19 above), Mr Miailhe had the possibility of establishing the genuineness of his links with the Philippines. Such evidence, however, was relevant only to the first offence of failure to declare his general income for the year 1981, as the second offence concerned agricultural and land income that he had declared in France.

43. It is not for the Court to substitute its view for that of the national courts which are primarily competent to determine the admissibility of evidence (see, among other authorities, the Schenk v. Switzerland judgment of 12 July 1988, Series A no. 140, p. 29, para. 46). It must nevertheless satisfy itself that the proceedings as a whole were fair, having regard to any possible irregularities before the case was brought before the courts of trial and appeal and checking that those courts had been able to remedy them if there were any (see the Imbrioscia judgment previously cited, p. 14, para. 38).

44. The Court points out that in the instant case the ordinary courts did, within the limits of their jurisdiction, consider the objections of nullity raised by Mr Miailhe and dismissed them.

Furthermore, it appears clearly from their decisions that they based their rulings - among other things as to residence for tax purposes - solely on the documents in the case file, on which the parties had presented argument at hearings before them, thereby ensuring that the applicant had a fair trial. The failure to produce certain documents during the procedure of consulting the CIF or in the criminal proceedings therefore did not infringe Mr Miailhe's defence rights or the principle of equality of arms (see, among other authorities, the Bendenoun v. France judgment of 24 February 1994, Series A no. 284, p. 22, para. 53).

45. The Court notes, besides, that before the CIF the taxpayer may, within thirty days of the application to it, communicate any information he deems necessary.

When it is consulted on the advisability of lodging a complaint for the offences referred to in Article 1741 of the General Tax Code, the CIF gives an opinion which is binding on the Minister (Article L.228 of the Code of Tax Procedure - see paragraph 29 above).

The criminal courts - the Criminal Court and the Court of Appeal - have unfettered discretion to assess the facts of an alleged fraud and may acquit.

The fact that there are no adversarial proceedings before the CIF gives its opinion may in some cases give rise to a fear that the taxpayer will find himself in a more difficult position. Nevertheless, only the preliminary intervention of an advisory body is concerned. In the instant case there was a judicial investigation and no direct summons.

Furthermore, the criminal proceedings that were set in motion following the Revenue's complaint were conducted at two levels of jurisdiction - first instance and appeal - and this enabled Mr Miailhe, to whom it was further open to lodge an appeal on points of law, to present argument on the prosecution evidence and the charges against him.

46. In conclusion, the proceedings in issue, taken as a whole, were fair. There has therefore been no breach of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1).

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY

1. Holds that the objection of incompatibility ratione materiae with the Convention and the objection that domestic remedies have not been exhausted, in so far as the latter relates to the administrative supplementary tax assessment proceedings, are devoid of purpose;

2. Dismisses the objection that domestic remedies have not been exhausted as to the procedure of consulting the Tax Offences Board;

3. Joins to the merits the objection that the applicant is not a victim and dismisses it;

4. Holds that there has been no breach of Article 6 para. 1 of the Convention (art. 6-1).

COURT (CHAMBER)

CASE OF MIAILHE v. FRANCE (ARTICLE 50)

(Application no. 12661/87)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

29 November 1993

In the case of Miailhe v. France[*],

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention")[] and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Court, as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr R. BERNHARDT, President,
Mr Thór VILHJÁLMSSON,
Mr F. MATSCHER,
Mr L.-E. PETTITI,
Mr C. RUSSO,
Mr N. VALTICOS,
Mrs E. PALM,
Mr J.M. MORENILLA,
Mr M.A. LOPES ROCHA,
Mr L. WILDHABER,

and also of Mr M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 29 October and 25 November 1993,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE AND FACTS

1. The case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 13 December 1991, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 para. 1 and Article 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47) of the Convention. It originated in an application (no. 12661/87) against the French Republic lodged with the Commission under Article 25 (art. 25) by three French nationals, Mr William Miailhe, who also has Philippine nationality, his mother Victoria, née Desbarats, and his wife Brigitte, née Damade, on 11 December 1986.

2. In a judgment of 25 February 1993 ("the principal judgment") the Court found that there had been a breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention, as house searches and seizures by the customs had infringed the applicants' right to respect for their private life and their correspondence

[*] The case is numbered 86/1991/338/411. The first number is the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court in the relevant year (second number). The last two numbers indicate the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court since its creation and on the list of the corresponding originating applications to the Commission.

[] As amended by Article 11 of Protocol No. 8 (P8-11), which came into force on 1 January 1990.

Only the question of the application of Article 50 (art. 50) in the case remains to be determined. For the facts of the case, reference should be made to paragraphs 6-15 of the principal judgment (ibid., pp. 78-83).

3. As the question of awarding just satisfaction was not ready for decision, although the criminal proceedings against Mr and Mrs Miailhe had already ended, it was reserved in whole in the principal judgment. The Court invited the Government and the applicants to submit in writing, within three months, their observations on the matter and, in particular, to notify it of any agreement they might reach (ibid., p. 91, para. 44 and point 4 of the operative provisions).

4. The Registrar received the applicants' memorial on 25 May 1993, the Government's memorial on 14 September and the observations of the Delegate of the Commission on 21 October.

5. At the deliberations on 25 November 1993 Mrs E. Palm, substitute judge, replaced Mr L. Wildhaber, who was unable to take part in the further consideration of the case (Rules 22 para. 1 and 24 para. 1 of the Rules of Court). The Court decided that in the circumstances of the case it was unnecessary to hold a hearing.

AS TO THE LAW

6. Under Article 50 (art. 50),

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the ... Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. Damage

1. Pecuniary damage

7. Mr Miailhe sought 300,000 French francs (FRF) in respect of three heads of pecuniary damage: the freezing of his bank accounts and shares in businesses for eight years owing to the registration of asset-freezing orders made by the authorities and the impossibility of taking out mortgage loans needed to finance his wine-growing business; secretarial expenses incurred in restoring order to his offices and to the documents seized by the customs; and travel expenses between Manila and France, in particular in order to attend interviews to which he had been summoned by the investigating judge.

For their part, Mrs Victoria Miailhe and Mrs Brigitte Miailhe each sought FRF 20,000 in respect of the deprivation of papers needed for day-to-day living, their contribution to the work and cost of reconstituting files, and travel expenses made necessary by the criminal proceedings.

8. In the Government's submission, the breach found in the principal judgment had had no influence on the asset-freezing orders, the journeys or the deprivation of private papers. While certain filing costs might have been necessary, they were entailed by all seizures, irrespective of the procedure used. Furthermore, the applicants had been entitled at any time to seek the return or a photocopy of any of the papers in question.

9. The Delegate of the Commission did not express any view.

10. The Court discerns no causal link between, on the one hand, the lack of judicial authorisation for the house searches and the seizures - a lack it held to be contrary to Article 8 (art. 8) - and, on the other hand, the pecuniary damage alleged by the applicants, and it accordingly disallows this part of their claim.

2. Non-pecuniary damage

11. In respect of non-pecuniary damage, Mr Miailhe sought FRF 300,000 and Mrs Victoria and Mrs Brigitte Miailhe each sought FRF 100,000. Mr Miailhe pleaded the loss of his consular duties, while the two Mrs Miailhe relied on their social position at the material time and the great age of the applicant's mother, whose personal souvenirs had been violated without notice and without any consideration for her.

12. The Government relied on the lack of any causal link between the breach of Article 8 (art. 8) and the alleged damage. As regards Mr Miailhe, they pointed out that the merits and length of the customs proceedings were not in issue before the Convention institutions and that the applicant was honorary consul - and not consul - of the Philippines in Bordeaux. As regards the two Mrs Miailhe, they said that if the house searches had been judicially authorised, this would not have entailed any prior warning or any listing of the documents to be seized.

13. The Delegate of the Commission thought that the finding of a breach constituted sufficient compensation.

14. The Court considers that the applicants must have sustained non-pecuniary damage for which the finding of a breach does not on its own afford sufficient reparation. Making its assessment on an equitable basis as required by Article 50 (art. 50), it awards Mr Miailhe FRF 50,000, Mrs Victoria Miailhe FRF 25,000 and Mrs Brigitte Miailhe FRF 25,000 under this head.

B. Costs and expenses

15. The applicants also each sought reimbursement of one-third of the costs and expenses incurred in the French courts and subsequently before the Convention institutions (lawyers - Mr Goguel: FRF 250,000; Mr Baudin: FRF 90,000; Mr Boerner: FRF 16,000; and Mr Régnier: FRF 9,637).

16. The Government maintained that the costs incurred in the domestic courts were unconnected with the breach found by the Court, and they referred to the Court's case-law as regards those incurred before the Convention institutions.

17. The Delegate of the Commission recommended reasonable compensation.

18. The Court notes that the applicants did not provide any detailed statements of costs or any vouchers. It considers, however, that it should, on an equitable basis, take into account the costs incurred at Strasbourg and part of those that were designed to bring the breach of Article 8 (art. 8) to an end and secure redress for it. Applying its usual criteria in the matter, it awards each of the applicants a lump sum of FRF 60,000.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY

1. Holds that the respondent State is to pay, within three months,
   (a) 50,000 (fifty thousand) French francs to Mr Miailhe, 25,000 (twenty-five thousand) francs to Mrs Victoria Miailhe and 25,000 (twenty-five thousand) francs to Mrs Brigitte Miailhe in respect of non-pecuniary damage; and
   (b) 60,000 (sixty thousand) francs to each of the applicants in respect of costs and expenses;

2. Dismisses the remainder of the applicants' claim.

Done in English and in French, and notified in writing on 29 November 1993 pursuant to Rule 55 para. 2, second sub-paragraph, of the Rules of Court.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

COURT (CHAMBER)

CASE OF MIAILHE v. FRANCE (No. 1)

(Application no. 12661/87)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

25 February 1993

In the case of Miailhe v. France[*],

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention")[] and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Court, as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr R. BERNHARDT, President,
Mr Thór VILHJÁLMSSON,
Mr F. MATSCHER,
Mr L.-E. PETTITI,
Mr C. RUSSO,
Mr N. VALTICOS,
Mr J.M. MORENILLA,
Mr M.A. LOPES ROCHA,
Mr L. WILDHABER,

and also of Mr M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr H. PETZOLD, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 24 September 1992 and 27 January 1993,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 13 December 1991, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 para. 1 and Article 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47) of the Convention. It originated in an application (no. 12661/87) against the French Republic lodged with the Commission under Article 25 (art. 25) by three nationals of that State, Mr William Miailhe, who also has Philippine nationality, his mother Victoria, née Desbarats, and his wife Brigitte, née Damade, on 11 December 1986.

The Commission's request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) and to the declaration whereby France recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46). The object of the request was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Articles 8 and 13 (art. 8, art. 13).

[*] The case is numbered 86/1991/338/411. The first number is the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court in the relevant year (second number). The last two numbers indicate the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court since its creation and on the list of the corresponding originating applications to the Commission.

[] As amended by Article 11 of Protocol No. 8 (P8-11), which came into force on 1 January 1990.

2. In response to the enquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 para. 3 (d) of the Rules of Court, the applicants stated that they wished to take part in the proceedings and designated the lawyers who would represent them (Rule 30).

3. On 24 January 1992 the President of the Court decided, under Rule 21 para. 6 and in the interests of the proper administration of justice, that a single Chamber should be constituted to consider the instant case and the cases of Funke and Crémieux v. France[*].

The Chamber to be constituted for this purpose included ex officio Mr L.-E. Pettiti, the elected judge of French nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr R. Ryssdal, the President (Rule 21 para. 3 (b)). On the same day, in the presence of the Registrar, the President drew by lot the names of the other seven members, namely Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F. Matscher, Mr C. Russo, Mr N. Valticos, Mr J.M. Morenilla, Mr M.A. Lopes Rocha and Mr L. Wildhaber (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 para. 4) (art. 43).

4. Mr Ryssdal assumed the office of President of the Chamber (Rule 21 para. 5) and, through the Registrar, consulted the Agent of the French Government ("the Government"), the Delegate of the Commission and the applicants' lawyers on the organisation of the proceedings (Rules 37 para. 1 and 38). Pursuant to the order made in consequence, the Registrar received the applicants' memorial on 12 June 1992 and the Government's memorial on 19 June. On 17 July the Secretary to the Commission informed the Registrar that the Delegate would submit his observations at the hearing.

On 24 July the Commission produced the file on the proceedings before it, as requested by the Registrar on the President's instructions.

5. In accordance with the President's decision, the hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 21 September 1992. The Court had held a preparatory meeting beforehand. Mr R. Bernhardt, the Vice-President of the Court, replaced Mr Ryssdal, who was unable to take part in the further consideration of the case (Rule 21 para. 5, second sub-paragraph).

There appeared before the Court:

-for the Government

Mr B. GAIN, Head of the Human Rights Section, Department of Legal Affairs, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Agent,
Miss M. PICARD, magistrat,
on secondment to the Department of Legal Affairs, Ministry of Foreign Affairs,
Mr J. CARRÈRE, magistrat,

[*] Cases nos. 82/1991/334/407 and 83/1991/335/408.

on secondment to the Department of Criminal Affairs and Pardons, Ministry of Justice, Mrs C. SIGNERINICRE, Head of the Legal Affairs Office, Department of Customs, Ministry of the Budget,
Mrs R. CODEVELLE, Inspector of Customs, Department of Customs, Ministry of the Budget,
Mr G. ROTUREAU, Chief Inspector of Customs, Strasbourg Regional Head Office of Customs, Counsel;

- for the Commission
Mr S. TRECHSEL, Delegate;

- for the applicants
Mr D. BAUDIN, of the Conseil d'État and Court of Cassation Bar,
Mr F. GOGUEL, avocat, Counsel.

The Court heard addresses by Mr Gain for the Government, Mr Trechsel for the Commission and Mr Baudin and Mr Goguel for the applicants.

On 3 November Mr Baudin confirmed his submissions concerning the possible application of Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention.

AS TO THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

6. Mr William Miailhe has dual French and Philippine nationality and has his home at Malate (Greater Manila) in the Philippines. He is a company director and in early 1983 was also honorary consul of the Philippines in Bordeaux, having just resigned as French foreign-trade counsellor in Manila.

Mrs Victoria Miailhe and Mrs Brigitte Miailhe, both of French nationality, are respectively the mother and the wife of the first applicant. They are housewives.

A. The house searches and seizures of documents

7. On 5 and 6 January 1983 officers from the Bordeaux customs, accompanied by a senior police officer (officier de police judiciaire), made two searches of premises in Bordeaux which housed the head offices of the companies managed by Mr Miailhe and which served as the Philippines consulate. The applicants - who in France lived at Château Siran (Labarde, Gironde) - used to receive there all private mail that was not sent direct to Manila. The searches took place from 9.15 a.m. to 3.50 p.m. on the first day and from 9.15 a.m. to 12.50 p.m. on the second day, the applicant and his secretary being present on both occasions.

The officers seized nearly 15,000 documents. They placed them unsorted in eight cardboard boxes which they sealed and took away to the customs' regional head office.

Work on removing the seals and classifying the documents began on 21 January 1983, in the presence of a senior police officer and Mr Miailhe. The latter asked for and obtained a photocopy of documents that he said he needed urgently for his work.

After being suspended at the applicant's request, the work resumed on 28 January in the presence of two senior police officers; Mr Miailhe's lawyer had indicated by telephone that his client refused to attend.

In all, the customs registered 9,478 documents. They considered the remainder to be of no relevance to their inquiries and returned them in two sealed boxes.

8. The searches and seizures in issue were based on Articles 64 and 454 of the Customs Code (see paragraphs 17-18 below) and were part of an investigation to determine whether the applicants were to be regarded as being resident in France and whether they had contravened the legislation on financial dealings with foreign countries.

B. The court proceedings

1. The criminal proceedings against the applicants

9. On a complaint lodged by the director of customs investigations on 29 January 1985, the Bordeaux public prosecutor's office began a judicial investigation in respect of the three applicants on 19 February 1985.

A local investigating judge charged them on 20 June 1985 with offences against the legislation and regulations governing financial dealings with foreign countries.

In a final application of 18 June 1991 the Bordeaux public prosecutor requested the investigating judge to commit Mr and Mrs Miailhe for trial at the Bordeaux Criminal Court and to discharge Mrs Victoria Miailhe. On 3 July 1991 the judge made orders to this effect.

The trial was due to begin on 17 June 1992 but was postponed to 25 November 1992 at Mr and Mrs Miailhe's request. In a judgment of 2 December 1992 the Criminal Court ruled that the public prosecution and the proceedings for imposition of customs penalties in respect of Mr and Mrs Miailhe were barred as a result of changes in the criminal law. It also ordered the return of the seized documents.

2. The applicants' proceedings to have the reports and seizures declared null and void

(a) In the Paris District Court

10. On 11 August 1983 the three applicants had instituted proceedings against the Director-General of Customs and Excise in the Paris District Court (1st district), which they asked to > "Hold that under domestic law customs officers may make house searches as provided in Articles 454 and 64 of the Customs Code only in order to look for goods.

> Hold that seizure of documents by customs officers cannot be regarded as being in accordance with the provisions of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.
> Hold that seizure of letters from lawyers to their clients amounts to an interference with the rights of the defence.
> And consequently,
> Declare the seizures of 5 and 6 January 1983 null and void."

11. On 20 December 1983 the court declined jurisdiction in favour of the Paris tribunal de grande instance.

(b) In the Paris tribunal de grande instance

12. The Miailhes applied to the Paris tribunal de grande instance, which likewise held that it had no jurisdiction. In its judgment of 16 May 1984 it gave the following reasons:

> "That being so, as was held in the aforementioned judgment of 20 December 1983, the ordinary courts have no jurisdiction to assess the lawfulness of the actions in issue unless there has been a flagrantly unlawful act (voie de fait).
> The customs officers made the seizures under Article 454 of the Customs Code.
> That Article, which empowers authorised officers to establish offences against the regulations governing financial dealings with foreign countries as provided in Article 64 of the Customs Code, lays down a rule that applies not only to searches for goods held unlawfully but also to those for documents likely to constitute the subject-matter or evidence of these offences.
> The seizures that are alleged to be null and void were therefore carried out by the authorities within the framework laid down by law for establishing offences against the regulations governing financial dealings with foreign countries, whose constitutionality is not for the Court to review.
> Although the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms provides in Article 8 (art. 8) that 'everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence', interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right is provided for in the same Article (art. 8) where such interference 'is in accordance with the law and is necessary ... in the interests of ... the economic well-being of the country, [and] for the prevention of ... crime ...'. The customs' action was taken in that context.

The provisions of Article 136 of the Code of Criminal Procedure on house searches relate to operations referred to in that code and do not apply to searches made under the Customs Code, which continue to be governed by the special legislation on the matter. The Act of 29 December 1977, which requires the intervention of the judicial authorities in respect of house searches during the investigation and establishment of offences against tax and business regulations, moreover provides in section 17 that 'house searches made pursuant to the Customs Code shall continue to be governed by existing legislation'.

The Constitutional Council's decision on which the plaintiffs relied is likewise irrelevant to that legislation.

The ordinary courts consequently have no jurisdiction to review the lawfulness of the seizures made at the home of Mr and Mrs Miailhe. The Court must decline jurisdiction."

(c) In the Paris Court of Appeal

13. The Miailhes appealed, seeking a declaration that the seizures on 5 and 6 January 1983 were null and void and an order for return of the documents held by the customs.

14. On 23 October 1984 the Paris Court of Appeal upheld the judgment of 16 May 1984 in the following terms:

"The seizures in issue were not challenged on the ground of any formal defect.

The courts below correctly held that the powers conferred on customs officers by Articles 64 and 454 of the Customs Code, special provisions which are not overridden by the more general ones of Article 136 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Act of 29 December 1977, cover the seizure of documents likely to constitute the subject-matter or evidence of offences against the regulations governing financial dealings with foreign countries.

To this extent the principles relating to the protection of private life, the home and correspondence cannot be an obstacle to applying these provisions.

However, although coming within the ambit of the aforementioned Articles 64 and 454, the unlawful seizure or retention of purely private documents that were manifestly irrelevant to the financial or business transactions which prompted the authorities' intervention could amount to a flagrantly unlawful act, since such an infringement of civil liberties would then be wholly severable from the authorities' powers.

In the instant case it appears from the search and seizure reports which have been put in evidence that on 5 and 6 January 1983 the authors of them placed a very large number of documents under seal in the offices of Mr Miailhe and in his presence, and that he, while protesting against the principle of the seizure, made no objection based on the nature of any given document. On 21 January 1983 the seals were removed and all the documents were classified, and Mr Miailhe and his secretary availed themselves of the opportunity they were afforded to take a photocopy of those documents 'which they needed for their work in the coming days'. Once again, Mr Miailhe made no reference to the presence of purely private papers or letters among his business papers.

On 28 January 1983 the same customs officers proceeded to go through the documents in detail and seized them. Mr Miailhe had been summoned to attend but made it known that he refused to do so. Notwithstanding his absence, numerous documents were exempted from seizure 'as being of no relevance to their inquiries' and were placed in two sealed cardboard boxes and returned to Mr Miailhe some days later.

In these circumstances it appears that the officials took the most meticulous precautions in order not to exceed their powers under the law and that if it is subsequently shown that they have inadvertently kept purely private papers unconnected with their investigation - papers of which the three appellants have never given any particulars -, Mr Miailhe must be held largely responsible, and at all events it could only have occurred as a result of an involuntary mistake and not of a manifest, deliberate violation of a personal freedom."

(d) In the Court of Cassation

15. An appeal on points of law by the applicants was dismissed by the Commercial Division of the Court of Cassation on 17 June 1986. Its judgment read as follows:

"As to the first ground:

The Court of Appeal is criticised for having ruled as it did, in that, according to the applicants, in confining itself to noting that the seizure in dispute was made as part of an investigation into the status as a French resident of Mr Miailhe, the Philippines consul in Bordeaux, without even determining whether the purpose of the operation was to seize documents likely to constitute the subject-matter or evidence of an offence against the regulations governing financial dealings with foreign countries, the Court of Appeal infringed Articles 64 and 454 of the Customs Code.

It appears from the Court of Appeal's own reasons and those it adopted, however, that the disputed seizures were made during an investigation to ascertain whether Mr Miailhe had, as a French resident, committed offences against the legislation governing financial dealings with foreign countries. The ground has not been made out.

As to the second ground:

The Court of Appeal is further criticised for having ruled as it did, in that, according to the applicants, it could not, without infringing Article 455 of the New Code of Civil Procedure, omit to answer the submission in which Mr and Mrs Miailhe argued that, independently of the existence of any flagrantly unlawful act which might have been committed against them, Article 66 of the Constitution entrusted the judiciary with the protection of every aspect of the liberty of the individual, and in particular the inviolability of the home.

In its judgment, however, the Court of Appeal held that, although coming within the ambit of the aforementioned Articles 64 and 454, the unlawful seizure or retention of purely private papers that were manifestly irrelevant to the transactions which had prompted the authorities' intervention could amount to a flagrantly unlawful act, since such an infringement of civil liberties would then be severable from the authorities' powers. The Court of Appeal also noted that the customs officials took the most meticulous precautions in order not to exceed their powers and that there was no manifest, deliberate violation of a personal freedom. In so holding, the Court of Appeal answered the submissions made, and it follows that the ground is not made out.

As to the third ground:

Lastly, the Court of Appeal is criticised for having ruled as it did, in that, according to the applicants, by raising of its own motion the points of pure fact that the customs officers classified the 15,000 documents seized and then went through them, which allegedly led to some of them being returned to Mr Miailhe on account of their irrelevance to the investigation, the Court of Appeal exceeded its powers and violated Articles 4, 7, 12 and 16 simultaneously of the New Code of Civil Procedure.

The Court of Appeal, however, held that the facts it noted appeared from the search and seizure reports put in evidence, which have been produced. Its judgment is therefore not susceptible to the criticism made in this ground."

II. RELEVANT CUSTOMS LAW

16. The criminal provisions of customs law in France are treated as a special body of criminal law.

A. Establishment of offences

1. Officials authorised to establish offences

17. Two provisions of the Customs Code are relevant as regards these officials:

Article 453

"The officials designated below shall be empowered to establish offences against the legislation and regulations governing financial dealings with foreign countries:

1. customs officers;

2. other officials of the Ministry of Finance with the rank of at least inspector;

3. senior police officers (officiers de police judiciaire).

The reports made by senior police officers shall be forwarded to the Minister for Economic Affairs and Finance, who shall refer cases to the prosecuting authorities if he thinks fit."

Article 454

"The officials referred to in the preceding Article shall be empowered to carry out house searches in any place as provided in Article 64 of this code."

2. House searches

(a) The rules applicable at the material time

18. When the house searches were made (5 and 6 January 1983), Article 64 of the Customs Code was worded as follows:

"1. When searching for goods held unlawfully within the customs territory, except for built-up areas with a population of at least 2,000, and when searching in any place for goods subject to the provisions of Article 215 hereinafter, customs officers may make house searches if accompanied by a local municipal officer or a senior police officer (officier de police judiciaire).

2. In no case may such searches be made during the night.

3. Customs officers may act without the assistance of a local municipal officer or a senior police officer

(a) in order to make searches, livestock counts, and inspections at the homes of holders of livestock accounts or owners of rights of pasture; and

(b) in order to look for goods which, having been followed and kept under uninterrupted surveillance as provided in Article 332 hereinafter, have been taken into a house or other building, even if situated outside the customs zone.

4. If entry is refused, customs officials may force an entry in the presence of a local municipal officer or a senior police officer."

(b) The rules applicable later

19. The Budget Acts of 30 December 1986 (section 80-I and II) and 29 December 1989 (section 108-III, 1 to 3) amended Article 64, which now provides:

"1. In order to investigate and establish the customs offences referred to in Articles 414-429 and 459 of this code, customs officers authorised for the purpose by the Director- General of Customs and Excise may make searches of all premises, even private ones, where goods and documents relating to such offences are likely to be held and may seize them. They shall be accompanied by a senior police officer (officier de police judiciaire).

2. (a) Other than in the case of a flagrant offence (flagrant délit), every search must be authorised by an order of the President of the tribunal de grande instance of the locality in which the customs headquarters responsible for the department in charge of the proceedings is situated, or a judge delegated by him.

Against such an order there shall lie only an appeal on points of law as provided in the Code of Criminal Procedure; such an appeal shall not have a suspensive effect. The time within which an appeal on points of law must be brought shall run from the date of notification or service of the order.

The order shall contain:

(i) where applicable, a mention of the delegation by the President of the tribunal de grande instance;

(ii) the address of the premises to be searched;

(iii) the name and position of the authorised official who has sought and obtained leave to make the searches.

The judge shall give reasons for his decision by setting out the matters of fact and law that he has accepted and which create a presumption in the case that there have been unlawful activities of which proof is sought.

If, during the search, the authorised officials discover the existence of a bank strongbox which belongs to the person occupying the premises searched and in which documents, goods or other items relating to the activities referred to in paragraph 1 above are likely to be found, they may, with leave given by any means by the judge who made the original order, immediately search the strongbox. Such leave shall be mentioned in the report provided for in paragraph 2(b) below.

The judge shall take practical steps to check that each application for leave made to him is well-founded; each application shall contain all information in the possession of the customs authorities that may justify the search.

He shall designate the senior police officer responsible for being present at the operations and keeping him informed of their progress.

The search shall be carried out under the supervision of the judge who has authorised it. Where it takes place outside the territorial jurisdiction of his tribunal de grande instance, he shall issue a rogatory letter, for the purposes of such supervision, to the President of the tribunal de grande instance in the jurisdiction of which the search is being made.

The judge may go to the scene during the operation.

He may decide at any time to suspend or halt the search.

The judicial order shall be notified orally to the occupier of the premises or his representative on the spot at the time of the search, who shall receive a complete copy against acknowledgement of receipt or signature in the report provided for in paragraph 2(b) below. If the occupier of the premises or his representative is absent, the judicial order shall be notified after the search by means of a registered letter with recorded delivery. Notification shall be deemed to have been made on the date of receipt entered in the record of delivery.

Failing receipt, the order shall be served as provided in Articles 550 et seq. of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The time-limits and procedures for appeal shall be indicated on notification and service documents.

(b) Searches may not be commenced before 6 a.m. or after 9 p.m. They shall be made in the presence of the occupier of the premises or his representative; if this is impossible, the senior police officer shall requisition two witnesses chosen from persons not under his authority or that of the customs.

Only the customs officers mentioned in paragraph 1 above, the occupier of the premises or his representative and the senior police officer may inspect documents before they are seized.

The senior police officer shall ensure that professional confidentiality and the rights of the defence are respected in accordance with the provisions of the third paragraph of Article 56 of the Code of Criminal Procedure; Article 58 of that code shall apply.

The report, to which shall be appended an inventory of the goods and documents seized, shall be signed by the customs officers, the senior police officer and the persons mentioned in the first sub-paragraph of this section (b); in the event of a refusal to sign, mention of that fact shall be made in the report.

Where an on-the-spot inventory presents difficulties, the documents seized shall be placed under seal. The occupier of the premises or his representative shall be informed that he may be present at the removal of the seals, which shall take place in the presence of the senior police officer; the inventory shall then be made.

A copy of the report and of the inventory shall be given to the occupier of the premises or his representative.

A copy of the report and the inventory shall be sent to the judge who made the order within three days of its being drawn up.

3. Customs officers may act without the assistance of a senior police officer

(a) in order to make searches, livestock counts and inspections at the homes of holders of livestock accounts or owners of rights of pasture; and

(b) in order to look for goods which, having been followed and kept under uninterrupted surveillance as provided in Article 332 hereinafter, have been taken into a house or other building, even if situated outside the customs zone.

4. If entry is refused, customs officers may force an entry in the presence of a senior police officer."

B. Prosecution of offences

20. Article 458 of the Customs Code provides:

> "Offences against the legislation and regulations governing financial dealings with foreign countries may be prosecuted only on a complaint by the Minister for Economic Affairs and Finance or one of his representatives authorised for the purpose."

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

21. The three applicants applied to the Commission on 11 December 1986. They complained of the searches and seizures made on premises of theirs by customs officers. They relied on Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention (infringement of their right to respect for their private life, their home and their correspondence) and Article 13 (art. 13) (lack of any effective remedy before a national authority).

22. The Commission declared the application (no. 12661/87) admissible on 3 October 1990. In its report of 8 October 1991 (made under Article 31) (art. 31), the Commission expressed the opinion that there had been no breach of Article 8 (art. 8) (by eleven votes to seven) or Article 13 (art. 13) (unanimously). The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the dissenting opinion contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to this judgment[*].

FINAL SUBMISSIONS TO THE COURT

23. In their memorial the Government requested the Court to dismiss all the complaints raised by the applicants.

24. Counsel for the applicants asked the Court to > "hold [that their clients] ha[d] been victims of a breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention ... by the authorities of the French Republic;

> reserve the application of Article 50 (art. 50) of the said Convention until the conclusion of the criminal proceedings in France against William and Brigitte Miailhe for offences against French exchange-control regulations; and award William and Brigitte Miailhe, on an interim basis, and Mrs Victoria Miailhe, in final settlement, the sums indicated in the foregoing reasons in compensation for their non- pecuniary damage and the expenses incurred in upholding their rights".

AS TO THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 (art. 8)

25. In the applicants' submission, the house searches and seizures made in the instant case were in breach of Article 8 (art. 8), which provides:

"1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

A. The Government's preliminary objection

26. As they had done before the Commission, the Government raised an objection of inadmissibility on the ground that the application to Strasbourg had been lodged prematurely, as Mr and Mrs Miailhe could, at the outset of their trial at the Bordeaux Criminal Court on 25 November 1992 (see paragraph 9 above), complain that the customs' action forming the basis of the prosecution had been unlawful.

27. The Court notes that Mr and Mrs Miailhe brought proceedings to have customs reports on the facts and on the seizures declared null and void (see paragraphs 10-15 above) and pursued them to a conclusion, without omitting to plead Article 8 (art. 8). They cannot be criticised for not having - or not yet having - made use of a legal remedy which would have been - or would be - directed to essentially the same end. The objection must therefore be dismissed.

Besides, the Bordeaux Criminal Court ruled on 2 December 1992 that the criminal proceedings were barred (see paragraph 9 above).

B. Merits of the complaint

28. The Government conceded that there had been an interference with the applicants' right to respect for their private life, and the Commission additionally found that there had been an interference with their right to respect for their home.

The Court considers it pointless in this instance to ascertain whether the premises occupied by the applicants could be considered as a home; it refers, mutatis mutandis, to the Niemietz v. Germany judgment of 16 December 1992 (Series A no. 251-B, p. 34, paras. 30-31). In the present case, it is sufficient to note that there was an interference with the applicants' private life and their correspondence.

29. It must accordingly be determined whether the interferences in question satisfied the conditions in paragraph 2 (art. 8-2).

1. "In accordance with the law"

30. The applicants contended that the interferences had no legal basis. As worded at the time, Article 64 of the Customs Code was, they claimed, contrary to the 1958 Constitution because it did not make house searches and seizures subject to judicial authorisation. Admittedly, its constitutionality could not be reviewed, since it had come into force before the Constitution had. Nevertheless, in the related field of taxation the Constitutional Council had rejected section 89 of the Budget Act for 1984, concerning the investigation of income-tax and turnover-tax offences holding, inter alia:

> "While the needs of the Revenue's work may dictate that tax officials should be authorised to make investigations in private places, such investigations can only be conducted in accordance with Article 66 of the Constitution, which makes the judiciary responsible for protecting the liberty of the individual in all its aspects, in particular the inviolability of the home. Provision must be made for judicial participation in order that the judiciary's responsibility and supervisory power may be maintained in their entirety." (Decision no. 83-164 DC of 29 December 1983, Official Gazette (Journal officiel), 30 December 1983, p. 3874)

31. The Government, whose arguments the Commission accepted in substance, maintained that in Article 64 of the Customs Code, as supplemented by a fairly substantial body of case-law, the power to search houses was defined very closely and represented a transposition to customs legislation and the regulations governing financial dealings with foreign countries of the power of search provided for in ordinary criminal procedure. Provision was first made for it in an Act of 6 August 1791 and subsequently in a legislative decree of 12 July 1934, and it had been widened in 1945 to cover investigations into exchange- control offences and confirmed on several occasions. In the Government's submission, its constitutionality could not be put in doubt, any more than that of Article 454 of the same code, since review of the constitutionality of statutes took place between their enactment by Parliament and promulgation and was within the sole competence of the Constitutional Council, to the exclusion of all other courts.

As to the "quality" of the national legal rules vis-à-vis the Convention, it was ensured by the precision with which the legislation and case-law laid down the scope and manner of exercise of the relevant power, and this eliminated any risk of arbitrariness. Thus even before the reform of 1986-89 (see paragraph 19 above), the courts had supervised customs investigations ex post facto but very efficiently. And in any case, Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention contained no requirement that house searches and seizures should be judicially authorised in advance.

32. The Court does not consider it necessary to determine the issue in this instance, as at all events the interferences complained of are incompatible with Article 8 (art. 8) in other respects (see paragraphs 38-40 below).

2. Legitimate aim

33. The Government and the Commission considered that the interferences in question were in the interests of "the economic well- being of the country" and "the prevention of crime".

Notwithstanding the applicants' arguments to the contrary, the Court is of the view that the interferences were in pursuit of at any rate the first of these legitimate aims.

3. "Necessary in a democratic society"

34. In the applicants' submission, the interferences could not be regarded as "necessary in a democratic society". The authorities, they said, had misused their powers under Article 64 of the Customs Code for the specific purpose of collecting evidence to establish that there had been an interruption in their permanent residence in Manila (see paragraph 6 above) at a time of strict exchange controls. In their view, the needs of the investigation in no way justified either the mass seizure of all Mr Miailhe's papers, including ones belonging to other members of the family, or the refusal to return a set of personal documents (doctor's prescriptions, correspondence with lawyers, etc.). More generally, the applicants complained that there were no curbs on customs powers or safeguards against abuse by customs officers, a situation which they claim had been typical of the French system before the reform of 1986-89.

35. The Government, whose contentions the Commission accepted in substance, argued that house searches and seizures were the only means available to the authorities for investigating offences against the legislation governing financial dealings with foreign countries and thus preventing the flight of capital and tax evasion. In such fields there was a corpus delicti only very rarely if at all; the "physical manifestation" of the offence therefore lay mainly in documents which a guilty party could easily conceal or destroy. Such persons, however, had the benefit of substantial safeguards, strengthened by very rigorous judicial supervision: decision-making by the head of the customs district concerned, the rank of the officers authorised to establish offences, the presence of a senior police officer (officier de police judiciaire), the timing of searches, the preservation of lawyers' and doctors' professional secrecy, the possibility of invoking the liability of the public authorities, etc. In short, even before the reform of 1986-89, the French system had ensured that there was a proper balance between the requirements of law enforcement and the protection of the rights of the individual.

As regards the circumstances of the case, the Government made two observations. Firstly, the Bordeaux public prosecutor's final application (see paragraph 9 above) made clear the scale of the offences with which Mr and Mrs Miailhe were charged. Secondly, the latter had never indicated to the national courts what personal documents the customs had seized wrongly.

36. The Court has consistently held that the Contracting States have a certain margin of appreciation in assessing the need for an interference, but it goes hand in hand with European supervision. The exceptions provided for in paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2) are to be interpreted narrowly (see the Klass and Others v. Germany judgment of 6 September 1978, Series A no. 28, p. 21, para. 42), and the need for them in a given case must be convincingly established.

37. Undoubtedly, in the field under consideration - the prevention of capital outflows and tax evasion - States encounter serious difficulties owing to the scale and complexity of banking systems and financial channels and to the immense scope for international investment, made all the easier by the relative porousness of national borders. The Court therefore recognises that they may consider it necessary to have recourse to measures such as house searches and seizures in order to obtain physical evidence of exchange-control offences and, where appropriate, to prosecute those responsible. Nevertheless, the relevant legislation and practice must afford adequate and effective safeguards against abuse (see, among other authorities and mutatis mutandis, the Klass and Others judgment previously cited, Series A no. 28, p. 23, para. 50).

38. This was not so in the instant case. At the material time - and the Court does not have to express an opinion on the legislative reforms of 1986 and 1989, which were designed to afford better protection for individuals (see paragraph 19 above) - the customs authorities had very wide powers; in particular, they had exclusive competence to assess the expediency, number, length and scale of inspections. Above all, in the absence of any requirement of a judicial warrant the restrictions and conditions provided for in law, which were emphasised by the Government (see paragraph 35 above), appear too lax and full of loopholes for the interferences with the applicants' rights to have been strictly proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued.

39. To these general considerations may be added a particular observation. The seizures made on the applicants' premises were wholesale and, above all, indiscriminate, to such an extent that the customs considered several thousand documents to be of no relevance to their inquiries and returned them to the applicants (see paragraph 7 above).

40. In sum, there has been a breach of Article 8 (art. 8).

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 13 (art. 13)

41. In the proceedings before the Commission, the applicants also relied on Article 13 (art. 13), but they did not do so before the Court, which does not consider that it must examine the issue of its own motion.

III. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 50 (art. 50)

42. Under Article 50 (art. 50),

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the ... Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

43. The applicants invited the Court to defer its decision on the application of this provision until the criminal proceedings in France against Mr and Mrs Miailhe had been concluded. They asked it, however, to award each of them - in final settlement in the case of Mrs Victoria Miailhe, and on an interim basis in the cases of Mr Miailhe and his wife - 100,000 French francs (FRF) for non-pecuniary damage and FRF 100,000 for costs.
The Government and the Delegate of the Commission expressed no opinion.

44. In the Court's view, the question is not ready for decision although the criminal proceedings against Mr and Mrs Miailhe have ended with the Bordeaux Criminal Court's judgment of 2 December 1992 (see paragraph 9 above). Accordingly, it must be reserved and the further procedure must be fixed, due regard being had to the possibility of an agreement between the respondent State and the applicants (Rule 54 paras. 1 and 4 of the Rules of Court).

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Dismisses unanimously the Government's preliminary objection;

2. Holds by eight votes to one that there has been a breach of Article 8 (art. 8);

3. Holds unanimously that it is not necessary also to examine the case under Article 13 (art. 13);

4. Holds unanimously that the question of the application of Article 50 (art. 50) is not ready for decision;

accordingly,

(a) reserves it in whole;

(b) invites the Government and the applicants to submit in writing, within three months, their observations on the matter and, in particular, to notify the Court of any agreement they may reach;

(c) reserves the further procedure and delegates to the President of the Chamber power to fix the same if need be.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE THÓR VILHJÁLMSSON

I have voted against the finding of a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention in this case. My reasons are much the same as those set out by the majority of the Commission in its report.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

SECOND SECTION

CASE OF MONORY v. ROMANIA AND HUNGARY

(Application no. 71099/01)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

5 April 2005

05/07/2005

This judgment will become final in the circumstances set out in Article 44 § 2 of the Convention. It may be subject to editorial revision.

In the case of Monory v. Hungary and Romania,

The European Court of Human Rights (Second Section), sitting as a Chamber composed of:

Mr J.-P. COSTA, President,
Mr A.B. BAKA,
Mr R. TÜRMEN,
Mr C. BÎRSAN,
Mr K. JUNGWIERT,
Mr M. UGREKHELIDZE,
Mrs A. MULARONI, judges,
and Mrs S. DOLLÉ, Section Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 17 February 2004 and 15 March 2005,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case originated in an application (no. 71099/01) against Romania and Hungary lodged with the Court under Article 34 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") by a Hungarian national, Mr György Monory ("the applicant"), on 23 November 2000.

2. The applicant was represented by Mrs L. Farkas, a lawyer practising in Budapest. The Hungarian Government were represented by Mr L. Höltz, Deputy-State Secretary in the Ministry of Justice. The Romanian Government ("the Government") were represented by their Agents, Mr B. Aurescu succeeded by Mrs R. Rizoiu.

3. The applicant alleged, in particular, that the Romanian authorities had failed to make sufficient efforts to secure to him the return of his child with a view to reasserting the exercise of his parental rights, following his wife's wrongful removal of the child, and that no effective remedy existed at his disposal to bring his complaint before the Romanian courts, in violation of Articles 8 and 13 of the Convention.

The applicant's complaint against Hungary concerns the length of proceedings for divorce and child custody, allegedly in violation of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention.

4. The application was allocated to the Second Section of the Court (Rule 52 § 1 of the Rules of Court). Within that Section, the Chamber that would consider the case (Article 27 § 1 of the Convention) was constituted as provided in Rule 26 § 1.

5. By a decision of 17 February 2004, the Court declared the application partly admissible.

6. The applicant and the Governments filed observations on the merits (Rule 59 § 1). The Chamber having decided, after consulting the parties, that no hearing on the merits was required (Rule 59 § 3 in fine), the parties replied in writing to each other's observations.

7. On 1 November 2004 the Court changed the composition of its Sections (Rule 25 § 1). This case was assigned to the newly composed Second Section (Rule 52 § 1).

THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

8. The applicant was born in 1946 and lives in Nagymaros, Hungary.

A. Abduction of the applicant's daughter and divorce proceedings initiated in Romania

9. In 1994 the applicant married Ms C.M., who is a national of both Romania and Hungary. On 16 February 1995 their daughter V. was born. The parents had joint custody in respect of the child, according to Hungarian law. They lived in Nagymaros.

10. In December 1998 they visited the wife's family in Romania. The applicant returned to Hungary, while C.M. stayed in Romania with V. and promised to return by 30 January 1999.

11. On 4 January 1999 C.M. filed for divorce, custody of V. and maintenance before the Satu Mare District Court in Romania. On 17 January 1999, she informed the applicant by telephone that she had decided to live in Romania and would not allow him to take V. to Hungary, despite him still being her husband and having joint custody of their daughter.

12. In a decision of 8 October 2003, the Satu Mare District Court established the residence of the child with her mother, pending the outcome of the divorce proceedings and required the applicant to pay alimony for his daughter. It also granted the applicant visiting rights to his child. On 19 February 2004 the decision became final.

B. Proceedings under the Hague Convention before the Romanian courts

13. In the meantime, on 20 January 1999 the applicant submitted a request for the return of his daughter to Hungary under Article 3 of the Hague Convention of 25 October 1980 on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction ("the Hague Convention"). The request was submitted through the Hungarian Ministry of Justice ("the Hungarian Ministry") to the Romanian Ministry of Justice ("the Romanian Ministry"). He argued that V. was the victim of international kidnapping and had been retained in Romania unlawfully within the meaning of Article 72 § 1 of the Hungarian Code on Family Law.

14. The Romanian Ministry, acting as the Central Authority responsible for the obligations established by the Hague Convention, instituted proceedings on behalf of the applicant before the Satu Mare District Court. On 8 June 1999 the District Court found no violation of the relevant Articles of the Hague Convention and refused the applicant's request. It considered that the retention of the child was not unlawful in so far as the applicant did not have exclusive custody rights in respect of his daughter and, thus, Article 3 of the Hague Convention was not applicable. The court considered that, in any case, the return of the child would constitute a great risk for her since she was already integrated into the new environment created by the mother during her stay in Romania.

15. On 5 October 1999 the Hungarian Nagymaros Guardianship Authority, at the applicant's request, declared that C.M. had not instituted the correct administrative proceedings, as required by the Hungarian Code on Family Law, with respect to their daughter's lawful removal to, and retention in Romania. It proposed that the child's residence be established with her father.

16. On 22 October 1999 the Satu Mare County Court dismissed the applicant's appeal against the decision of 8 June 1999. It recalled that the applicant did not have exclusive custody rights with respect to his daughter. It further considered that the return of the child would deprive the mother of the exercise of her parental rights. Lastly, the county court stated that, as long as the marriage of the parents was still valid, they should have the custody matters resolved by a competent court.

17. The Romanian Ministry appealed on points of law against this decision, alleging that the county court had incorrectly interpreted the applicable law and the facts of the case. They recalled that, according to the Hague Convention, the court should have applied Hungarian law, by which the retention of the child across the border by her mother without the father's consent was illegal.

18. On 2 February 2000 the Oradea Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. It recalled that under Hungarian law the parents exercised parental rights jointly. However, due to the concrete family situation, it was normal that the parent living abroad would have to make more effort in order to exercise these rights. Furthermore, it considered that the child had already become integrated into the new environment. It held therefore that it was in the best interests of the child that she remain with her mother.

C. Proceedings for divorce and custody, mainly before the Hungarian courts

19. In parallel, on 28 April 1999 the applicant filed for the custody of V. before the Vác District Court in Hungary. On 17 May 1999 the applicant requested the court to proceed with the case as a matter of urgency and to hear witnesses.

20. On 21 May 1999 the District Court, via the Ministry of Justice, notified the defendant in Romania of the action.

21. On 30 August 1999 the applicant requested, by way of an interim measure, that V. be temporarily placed in his care and that the mother's custody rights be terminated.

22. On 8 September 1999 the District Court held a hearing, dismissed the applicant's request for interim measures and suspended the case until the proceedings on the Hague Convention issues had been finalised. The District Court noted that the divorce proceedings before the Romanian Satu Mare District Court had also been suspended on an earlier date for the same reason. The applicant appealed against this decision on 16 September 1999.

23. On 21 September 1999 the Pest County Public Prosecutor's Office interceded in the proceedings for the applicant and endorsed his appeal of 16 September filed against the decision of the Vác District Court. On 30 September 1999 both the applicant's and the public prosecutor's appeals were served on the defendant, who received them on 28 December 1999.

24. On 29 October 1999 the applicant requested the District Court to grant him, by way of an interim measure, custody of the child, to terminate the mother's parental rights and to proceed with the case urgently.

25. On 31 January 2000 the applicant renewed his request for custody of the child. He also filed a motion for bias against the District Court and the presiding judges. He renewed this motion on 21 February 2000.

26. On 29 February 2000 the Pest County Regional Court upheld the dismissal of the applicant's request for interim measures but instructed the District Court to resume its proceedings. This decision, notified via the Hungarian Ministry, reached the defendant on 29 May 2000.

27. On 19 May 2000 the District Court ordered that a study be made in the homes of both parties in order to ascertain their living conditions. A study was carried out in the applicant's home on 8 June 2000. The order was served on the defendant on 10 July 2000 and the relevant documents forwarded on 23 January 2001 to the Ministry of Justice with a view to carrying out a similar study in the defendant's home in Romania.

28. The applicant's repeated motions for bias were dismissed on 27 September, 26 and 30 October and 11 December 2000.

29. On 5 January 2001 the District Court joined to the proceedings the applicant's further claim for divorce which had been filed on 3 July 2000. The defendant was notified of this step on 1 March 2001.

30. On 21 and 30 January 2001 respectively, the applicant submitted further documents and requested the court to summon other witnesses.

31. The applicant's renewed request of 31 January 2001 for an interim measure was dismissed by the District Court on 15 February 2001.

32. On 6 June 2001 the District Court held a hearing and heard four witnesses. The defendant failed to appear. The court therefore requested her to submit her observations on the minutes of the hearing within 15 days and ordered her to submit a written response to the applicant's claim for custody of the child.

33. On 8 June 2001 a lawyer practising in Hungary informed the court that the defendant had authorised him to represent her in the case. On 2 July 2001 the defendant submitted her counter-claim and motions for evidence.

34. On 5 July and 30 October 2001 the Hungarian Ministry made an enquiry with its Romanian counterpart as to whether the envisaged study of the defendant's home could be carried out. In their reply of 10 December 2001, the Romanian Ministry stated that the relevant documents had been lost.

35. A hearing was held on 7 November 2001 at which the District Court heard a witness. The defendant's representative informed the court that the request to carry out a study of the defendant's living conditions had been served on the defendant by mistake. Consequently, the District Court asked the Hungarian Ministry to send the request again to the Satu Mare District Court.

36. On 8 November 2001 the District Court refused to regulate the applicant's access rights by way of an interim measure.

37. On 22 and 29 November 2001 the District Court invited the applicant to update the addresses of two of his witnesses who could not be summoned. On the previous day the applicant had appealed against the order of 8 November 2001.

38. On 19 December 2001 the District Court held a hearing and heard witnesses. It also set a statutory three-month time-limit for the parties to reconsider or confirm the continuation of the divorce proceedings.

39. Meanwhile, on 14 November 2001 the witness requested by the Vác District Court was heard by the Satu Mare District Court. The minutes were forwarded to the Hungarian Ministry and their translation was completed on 3 December 2001 and 27 February 2002, respectively.

40. On the applicant's appeal, the Pest County Regional Court quashed the order of 8 November 2001 and requested the District Court to take a new decision.

41. After the Hungarian Ministry had replaced the lost documents, on 13 February 2002 the Romanian Satu Mare District Court carried out the requested home study. The translation of the resultant documents reached the Hungarian Vác District Court on 21 May 2002.

42. Meanwhile, on 15 February 2002 the District Court regulated the applicant's access rights. This order was amended by the Regional Court on 2 April 2002.

43. On 26 March 2002 the Pest County Regional Court rejected the applicant's renewed motion for bias against the Vác District Court and fined him 15,000 Hungarian forints (HUF) for having repeatedly challenged judges without substantiating the requests.

44. On 27 May 2002 the District Court appointed an expert in child psychology. The expert's examination of V., scheduled for 2 July 2002, was cancelled as the defendant was unwilling to attend because she was unable to meet the travel costs.

45. On 16 July 2002 the District Court dismissed the applicant's request for an interim measure of 4 July 2002 to order that V. spend her summer vacation in Hungary.

46. The defendant failed to appear with the child at examinations scheduled for 2 July and 11 November 2002, 13 January and 26 February 2003. On 4 December 2002 the District Court imposed a fine of HUF 20,000 on the defendant. On 22 January 2003 the court warned the defendant that she was obliged to appear at the examinations. At a later date, the court amended the instructions for the expert and ordered her to assess who was the most suitable parent to raise the child. The defendant was examined on 14 May 2003.

47. On 26 June 2003 the expert submitted her opinion, finding the mother more suitable to raise V.

48. On 4 July 2003 the District Court, as an interim measure, regulated the applicant's access rights for the summer of 2003.

49. The District Court held hearings on 12 September and 29 October 2003. In a judgment delivered on the latter date, the court declared the couple's divorce and divided the matrimonial property. It also granted the defendant custody of V. and ordered the applicant to pay her maintenance of HUF 10,000 per month.

50. On 5 January 2004 the applicant appealed against the judgment. He withdrew the appeal 15 days later. Consequently, on 21 January 2004 the judgment became final.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW

51. The relevant provisions of the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction provide as follows:

Article 3

"The removal or the retention of a child is to be considered wrongful where

a) it is in breach of rights of custody attributed to a person, an institution or any other body, either jointly or alone, under the law of the State in which the child was habitually resident immediately before the removal or retention; and

b) at the time of removal or retention those rights were actually exercised, either jointly or alone, or would have been so exercised but for the removal or retention..."

Article 5

"For the purposes of this Convention –

a) 'rights of custody' shall include rights relating to the care of the person of the child and, in particular, the right to determine the child's place of residence;..."

Article 7

"Central Authorities shall co-operate with each other and promote co-operation amongst the competent authorities in their respective States to secure the prompt return of children and to achieve the other objects of this Convention.

In particular, either directly or through any intermediary, they shall take all appropriate measures -

a) to discover the whereabouts of a child who has been wrongfully removed or retained;

b) to prevent further harm to the child or prejudice to interested parties by taking or causing to be taken provisional measures;

c) to secure the voluntary return of the child or to bring about an amicable resolution of the issues;

d) to exchange, where desirable, information relating to the social background of the child;

e) to provide information of a general character as to the law of their State in connection with the application of the Convention;

f) to initiate or facilitate the institution of judicial or administrative proceedings with a view to obtaining the return of the child and, in a proper case, to make arrangements for organizing or securing the effective exercise of rights of access;

g) where the circumstances so require, to provide or facilitate the provision of legal aid and advice, including the participation of legal counsel and advisers;

h) to provide such administrative arrangements as may be necessary and appropriate to secure the safe return of the child;

i) to keep other each other informed with respect to the operation of this Convention and, as far as possible, to eliminate any obstacles to its application."

Article 8

"Any person, institution or other body claiming that a child has been removed or retained in breach of custody rights may apply either to the Central Authority of the child's habitual residence or to the Central Authority of any other Contracting State for assistance in securing the return of the child..."

Article 10

"The Central Authority of the State where the child is shall take or cause to be taken all appropriate measures in order to obtain the voluntary return of the child."

Article 11

"The judicial or administrative authorities of Contracting States shall act expeditiously in proceedings for the return of children.

If the judicial or administrative authority concerned has not reached a decision within six weeks from the date of commencement of the proceedings, the applicant or the Central Authority of the requested State, on its own initiative or if asked by the Central Authority of the requesting State, shall have the right to request a statement of the reasons for the delay. If a reply is received by the Central Authority of the requested State, that Authority shall transmit the reply to the Central Authority of the requesting State, or to the applicant, as the case may be."

Article 18

"The provisions of this Chapter do not limit the power of a judicial or administrative authority to order the return of the child at any time."

52. Paragraph 68 of the Explanatory Report on the 1980 Hague Child Abduction Convention drafted by Elisa Pérez-Vera in 1980, interprets Article 3 of the Convention as follows:

"The first source referred to in Article 3 is law, where it is stated that custody 'may arise ... by operation of law'. That leads us to stress one of the characteristics of this Convention, namely its application to the protection of custody rights which were exercised prior to any decision thereon. This is important, since one cannot forget that, in terms of statistics, the number of cases in which a child is removed prior to a decision on its custody are quite frequent. Moreover, the possibility of the dispossessed parent being able to recover the child in such circumstances, except within the Convention's framework, is practically non-existent, unless he in his turn resorts to force, a course of action which is always harmful to the child."

The same Report, in its paragraph 84, comments on Article 5 in the following terms:

"...although nothing is said in this article about the possibility of custody rights being exercised singly or jointly, such a possibility is clearly envisaged... the whole tenor of Article 3 leaves no room for doubt that the Convention seeks to protect joint custody as well. As for knowing when joint custody exists, that is a question which must be decided in each particular case, and in the light of the law of the child's habitual residence."

53. The relevant provisions of the Hungarian Code on Civil Procedure are:

"(1) A court shall - in accordance with Section 1 - enforce the parties' right to have their disputes determined in fair proceedings and within a reasonable length of time."

Section 3

"(1) The task of a law court is to endeavour to find out the truth in accordance with the aim of the present Act. The court shall, therefore, see in its line of duties that the parties exercise their rights properly throughout the procedure and meet the obligations they are bound to meet in the lawsuit. The court is obliged to provide the necessary information to a party who has no counsel and to remind him of his rights and obligations. The court shall consider pleas and declarations submitted by a party not by their formal designation but according to their contents.

(2) The court shall see, in its line of duties, that cases be tried thoroughly and within a reasonable length of time."

THE LAW

I. COMPLAINTS AGAINST ROMANIA

A. Alleged violation of Article 8 of the Convention

54. The applicant complained that the Romanian authorities, namely courts and administrative bodies, had failed to ensure the swift return of his daughter after his wife had retained the child in Romania without his consent. In so doing, the authorities had failed to secure his parental rights with respect to his daughter, in violation of his right to respect for his family life enshrined in Article 8 of the Convention, which reads, in so far as relevant, as follows:

> "1. Everyone has the right to respect for his ... family life ...
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society ... for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

1. Scope of the issue before the Court

55. The Court recalls that the admissibility decision of 17 February 2004, based on the parties' submissions, limited the examination of the complaint to the proceedings concerning the return of the child to Hungary where the family had a common residence. The applicant also maintained in his observations that his aim was to have his child returned to Hungary. Therefore, reference to the proceedings for access or visiting rights was made only in so far as it was necessary to examine the Government's submissions concerning the other possible avenues which the applicant could have pursued.

56. In his supplementary observations of 15 April 2004, the applicant broadened the complaint and submitted that the failure of the Romanian authorities to return the child, and thus to re-establish his parental rights, had violated his access and visiting rights. By dismissing his request for the return of the child, the courts had obliged him to conduct two parallel sets of proceedings for divorce, custody and alimony before both the Romanian and Hungarian courts. This had led to a violation of his right to respect for his family life, in so far as the Romanian courts failed to take into account the proceedings before the Hungarian courts and to regulate visiting rights in his favour.

In this context, he claimed that the visiting rights which were granted to him by the Romanian courts, in the decision of 19 February 2004, might have proved difficult to implement should he have chosen to enforce them.

57. Subsequently, the applicant submitted, in his written observations on the merits of the complaint raised under this Article, that his visiting rights have been brought to the Court's attention only in so far as they were a direct consequence of the outcome of the Hague proceedings initiated before the Romanian courts. In a letter of 22 September 2004, he had recalled that, in the initial application submitted to the Court, he could not have raised the issue of visiting rights, as at that time the proceedings focused solely on the return of his child.

58. The Romanian Government pointed out that Article 21 of the Hague Convention creates a separate procedure for the establishment of visiting rights, distinct from proceedings for the return of a child. However, the applicant did not institute the former proceedings. Furthermore, although he was granted visiting rights in the decision of 19 February 2004, the applicant did not prove that he had taken any steps towards their implementation.

59. The Court agrees with the Government that, as regards visiting rights, the applicant did not exhaust all effective remedies as he did not institute proceedings for access rights under Article 21 of the Hague Convention, nor did he seek the enforcement of the decision granting him visiting rights.

60. Therefore, the Court will only take this matter into account to the extent that it is relevant to the applicant's complaint under Article 8 of the Convention due to the failure to return the child to Hungary. It will, therefore, limit its examination to the complaint as it was communicated and assessed in the admissibility decision of 17 February 2004.

2. Submissions of the parties

a) The applicant

61. The applicant contended that the decisions of the Romanian courts dealing with his request for the return of his child and the position of the Romanian Ministry throughout the proceedings, initiated at his request under the Hague Convention, constituted an interference with his right to respect for his family life. The authorities made it impossible for him to have his child returned to the family's common residence and to exercise his parental rights according to Hungarian law.

62. The proceedings, instituted by the applicant on 20 January 1999 and finalised by the courts on 2 February 2000, took too long for a case of this type. This contradicts the requirements of the Hague Convention to resolve the matter expeditiously. Furthermore, had the Romanian courts applied Hungarian law, as required by the Hague Convention, they would have acknowledged his custody rights as outlined in that Convention, and allowed his request for the return of his child. He concluded that there had been flaws and shortcomings in the proceedings that resulted in the violation of his Article 8 rights.

b) The Government

63. In the Government's view there was no interference with the applicant's right to respect for his family life.

64. Concerning the period before the final decision of the domestic courts, ruling on the Hague Convention procedure, the State authorities had fulfilled their duties under the Convention, which were limited to lodging the application for the return of the child, as requested by the applicant, representing him before the courts and availing themselves of all possible appeals against the court decisions that were unfavourable to him.

65. Moreover, the State authorities had no further obligations under the Hague Convention as no court had granted the applicant the right to exercise sole parental responsibility or any other right superior to that of the mother. The present case is therefore distinct from those of Ignaccolo-Zenide v. Romania (no. 31679/96, ECHR 25 January 2000), Maire v. Portugal (no. 48206/99, 26 June 2003) and Iglesias Gil and A.U.I. v. Spain (no. 56673/00, 29 April 2003), where the respective applicants had been granted such rights by means of final court decisions.

66. As for the proceedings for the return of the child and their outcome, no interference with the applicant's Article 8 rights occurred, in so far as the domestic courts had found that the removal of the child by the applicant's wife had not been "wrongful" within the meaning of the Hague Convention. The domestic courts, who were better placed to examine the issue, had dealt in substance with all the arguments presented by the parties and had reached their decisions based on Hungarian law concerning custody matters, which conferred equal parental rights on the applicant and his wife. There was nothing in the reasoning of the domestic courts that could qualify their decisions as arbitrary. The Government relied on cases like Olsson v. Sweden ((No. 1), judgment of 24 March 1988, Series A no. 130, p. 32, § 68), Tiemann v. France and Germany ((dec.), no. 47457/99 and 47458/99, ECHR 2000-IV), Hokkanen v. Finland (judgment of 23 September 1994, Series A no. 299-A, p. 20, § 55) and Bronda v. Italy (judgment of 9 June 1998, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1998-IV, p. 1491, § 59).

67. The Government contended, therefore, that once the domestic courts had established that the removal of the child had not been unlawful, the applicant's request for the return of his child no longer satisfied the requirements of the Hague Convention and the Romanian authorities had no further obligations towards the applicant. They relied on the ruling of the Court in the cases of Guichard v. France ((dec.), no. 56838/00, 2 September 2003) and Paradis and others v. Germany ((dec.), no. 4783/03, 15 May 2003).

68. Should the Court consider that there had been an interference with the applicant's rights, the Government contended that it was in accordance with Article 8 § 2 of the Convention. The domestic courts had rejected the applicant's request in the light of the provisions of the Hague Convention which had been incorporated into the domestic legal system by law no. 100/1992. The courts had adopted their decisions in the best interests of the child, as required by both the Hague and the European Conventions.

3. The Court's assessment

69. The Court notes, firstly, that it is common ground that the relationship between the applicant and his daughter came within the sphere of family life under Article 8 of the Convention.

70. The Court reiterates that the mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constitutes a fundamental element of family life and domestic measures hindering such enjoyment amount to an interference with the right protected by Article 8 (see, among other authorities, Tiemann (dec.) and Bronda, p. 1489, § 51, cited above).

The events under consideration in the instant case, in so far as they give rise to the responsibility of the respondent States, clearly amounted to an interference with the applicant's right to respect for his family life, as it restricted his enjoyment of his daughter's company.

71. The Court must accordingly determine whether there has been a breach of the right of the applicant to respect for his family life.

72. Although the essential object of Article 8 is to protect the individual against arbitrary action by the public authorities, there are in addition positive obligations inherent in effective "respect" for family life. However, the boundaries between the State's positive and negative obligations under this provision do not lend themselves to precise definition. The applicable principles are nonetheless similar. In both contexts regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole, and in both contexts the State enjoys a certain margin of appreciation (see Ignaccolo-Zenide, cited above, § 94; Iglesias Gil and A.U.I., cited above, § 48, and Sylvester v. Austria, no. 36812/97, 40104/98, § 51, 24 April 2003).

73. The positive obligations imposed on States by Article 8 include taking measures to ensure a parent's reunification with his or her child (see Ignaccolo-Zenide, cited above, § 94, and Nuutinen v. Finland, no. 32842/96, § 127, ECHR 2000-VIII). The Court has already interpreted these positive obligations in the light of the Hague Convention, Article 7 of which contains a non-exhaustive list of measures to be taken by States in order to secure the prompt return of the child, including the institution of judicial proceedings (see Ignaccolo-Zenide, cited above, § 95). The same interpretation can be followed in the present case in so far as, at the material time, both Romania and Hungary were parties to the Hague Convention.

74. The Court notes that the Romanian Ministry, acting as the Central Authority for the purpose of the Hague Convention, had chosen to act upon the applicant's request for the return of his child. It transpires that the authorities acted genuinely as if the removal had been unlawful.

75. The Court recalls that Article 13 of the Hague Convention allows the Central Authority to reject applications which are clearly ill-founded. Such a decision has already been found to comply with Article 8 of the Convention in the case of Guichard, cited above. However, in the present case, the State organs did not reject the applicant's request and, by choosing to act upon it, they must be presumed to have consented to all the obligations arising under that Convention. The Court therefore disagrees with the Government's view that their duties were limited to bringing the law suit for the return of the child before the competent courts.

76. Moreover, the Court does not share the Government's view that no further obligation lay with the State authorities under the Hague Convention as no court had granted the applicant sole parental responsibility. The Court recalls that joint custody, exercised by parents who are not divorced, is recognised by Article 3 paragraph (b) of the Hague Convention. This is supported by the Explanatory Report on the Hague Convention (see paragraph 52 above). There is nothing in the Convention excluding married couples. Moreover, the Hague Convention has been interpreted by domestic courts of other European States as being applicable prior to the proceedings on divorce and child custody (see, inter alia, Sylvester, cited above, §§ 13 and 16, and Couderc v. Czech Republic (dec.), no. 54429/00, 30 January 2001).

77. The Hungarian law applicable in the present case granted the parents joint custody. Neither of them, therefore, had superior parental rights over their daughter (see paragraph 9 above). As for the residence of the child, Hungarian law imposed an obligation on the mother to obtain the approval of the father or of the Hungarian Guardianship Authority if she wished to change the child's residence (see paragraph 15 above). It appears from the file that she did not fulfil this obligation. Moreover, it was not until 8 October 2003 that the child's residence was formally established with her mother in Romania (see paragraph 12 above).

78. The Court acknowledges that the present case is to be distinguished from the cases of Ignaccolo-Zenide, Maire and Iglesias Gil and A.U.I., cited above, where the applicants were in possession of a return order which the State authorities had failed to enforce. However, this distinction has little impact on the Article 8 issue in the present case. While in the previous cases the authorities' obligation to act arose from a court order, in the present case their obligation arose by virtue of the applicable Hungarian law and Article 3 of the Hague Convention.

79. Consequently, the Romanian authorities were bound to comply with all obligations set out in Article 7 of the Hague Convention. They should have taken or caused to be taken all provisional measures, including extra-judicial ones, which could have helped prevent "further harm to the child or prejudice to the interested parties". However, the authorities did not take any such measure but limited themselves to representing the applicant before the Romanian courts. The Court considers therefore that the authorities failed to observe their full obligations under Article 7 of the Hague Convention.

80. As for the interpretation given by the courts to the Hague Convention in the light of Hungarian law, it is to be noted that all court instances that dealt with the case dismissed from the outset the applicability of Article 3 of the Hague Convention. The courts found that, according to Hungarian law, the applicant did not have the right to have the child returned to him. However, it appears that the child had been removed from her usual place of residence in breach of the formalities under Hungarian law. Moreover, the applicant had not been successful in his attempt to have the legality of the situation restored, despite his joint custody rights over the child.

81. In the Court's view, this interpretation by the Romanian courts contradicts the obvious meaning of the Hague Convention which transpires from its very text, its Explanatory Report and the recognised common practice (see paragraph 76 above). It deprives Article 3 and, therefore, the Hague Convention itself, of much of its useful effect. Furthermore, as Article 8 of the European Convention was examined in the light of the Hague Convention, the national courts' interpretation of the latter weakened the guarantees of Article 8. In these circumstances, the Court considers that the matter went beyond a simple matter of the interpretation and application of domestic legislation falling within the exclusive competence of the national authorities. The Court concludes that the domestic courts' interpretation of the guarantees of the Hague Convention led to a violation of Article 8 of the European Convention (see, mutatis mutandis, Iglesias Gil and A.U.I., cited above, § 61).

82. Furthermore, in matters pertaining to the reunification of children with their parents, the adequacy of a measure is also to be judged by the swiftness of its implementation, such cases requiring urgent handling, as the passage of time can have irremediable consequences for the relations between the children and the parent who does not live with them (see Ignaccolo-Zenide, cited above, § 102, and Nuutinen, cited above, § 110). Indeed, Article 11 of the Hague Convention imposes a six-week time-limit for the required decision, failing which the decision body may be requested to give reasons for the delay. Despite this recognised urgency, in the instant case a period of more than twelve months elapsed from the date on which the applicant lodged his request for the return of the child to that on which the final decision was taken. However, no satisfactory explanation was put forward by the Government for this delay.

83. The Court recalls that the interests of the child are paramount in such cases. Thus it may well have been justified, eight months after the removal from Hungary of the applicant's daughter, for the courts to hold that the child had adapted to her new environment and that it was in her best interests to remain in Romania with her mother although, at that time, no final decision had established her residence there (see paragraphs 12 and 15 above). However, where the Court accepts that a change in the relevant facts may exceptionally justify such a decision, it must be satisfied that the change was not brought about by the State's actions or inactions (see, mutatis mutandis, Sylvester, cited above, § 59).

84. Having found that the time it took for the courts to adopt the final decision in the present case failed to meet the urgency of the situation, the Court concludes that the change in the child's circumstances was considerably influenced by the slow reaction of the authorities.

85. Based on its conclusions reached at paragraphs 79, 81 and 84 above, and notwithstanding the respondent States' margin of appreciation in the matter, the Court concludes that the Romanian authorities failed to make adequate and effective efforts to assist the applicant in his attempt to have his child returned to him with a view to exercising his parental rights. Consequently, there has been a breach of Article 8 of the Convention.

B. Alleged violation of Article 13 of the Convention

86. The applicant contended that the Romanian authorities did not provide him with an effective remedy for his Article 8 complaint, in violation of Article 13 of the Convention, which reads as follows:

> "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in [the] Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

87. The Government submitted that the applicant was able to bring his claim for the return of his child before the judicial bodies in Romania. The domestic courts ruled on the matter with full jurisdiction and examined the merits of the applicant's arguments. They recalled that Article 13 did not require the successful outcome of the proceedings (see, mutatis mutandis, Lindberg v. Sweden (dec.), no. 48198/99, 15 January 2004).

88. However, having regard to its conclusion in paragraph 85 above, the Court does not find it necessary to rule separately on this complaint (see, mutatis mutandis, Pavletic v. Slovakia, no. 39359/98, § 101, 22 June 2004).

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 6 § 1 OF THE CONVENTION BY HUNGARY

89. The applicant complained that the length of the proceedings for divorce and child custody in his case exceeded a reasonable time within the meaning of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention, which, in so far as relevant, reads:

> "In the determination of his civil rights and obligations ..., everyone is entitled to a ... hearing within a reasonable time by [a] ... tribunal ..."

90. The Government contested this view. They maintained that the international aspects of the dispute – namely, the involvement of the Romanian authorities in the examination of the parties' living conditions, the correspondence between the Hungarian and the Romanian authorities and the translation of documents – had inevitably slowed down the proceedings.

A. Period to be taken into consideration

91. The Court observes that the proceedings commenced on 28 April 1999 and ended on 21 January 2004. They thus lasted nearly four years and nine months. Despite the fact that the examination of interim measures on most occasions involved two court instances, the merits of the case were determined by only one instance. However, as of 29 October 2003, the applicant was solely responsible for the further delay, as he lodged an appeal which he subsequently withdrew.

B. Reasonableness of the length of the proceedings

92. The Court reiterates that the reasonableness of the length of proceedings must be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and with reference to the following criteria: the complexity of the case, the conduct of the applicant and the relevant authorities and what was at stake for the applicant in the dispute (see, among many other authorities, Frydlender v. France [GC], no. 30979/96, § 43, ECHR 2000-VII). Regarding this latter element, special diligence is required in child custody disputes (Laino v. Italy [GC], no. 3158/96, § 18, ECHR 1999-I). The Court has frequently found violations of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention in cases raising issues similar to the one in the present case (see Frydlender, cited above). Having examined all the material submitted to it, the Court considers that the Government have not put forward any fact or argument capable of persuading it to reach a different conclusion in the present case. Having regard to its case-law on the subject, the Court considers that in the instant case the overall length of the proceedings was excessive and failed to meet the "reasonable time" requirement.

There has accordingly been a breach of Article 6 § 1.

III. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 41 OF THE CONVENTION

93. Article 41 of the Convention provides:

> "If the Court finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. Damage

1. Non-pecuniary damage in respect of Romania

94. The applicant claimed non-pecuniary damage of 80,000 euros (EUR) in respect of the violation of his rights by Romania.

95. The Romanian Government contended that the amount claimed by the applicant was excessive and asked for an assessment on an equitable basis inspired by the case-law of the Court in the matter.

96. The Court sees no reason to doubt that the applicant suffered distress as a result of the impossibility to have his child returned to him or to exercise his parental rights. It considers that sufficient just satisfaction would not be provided solely by a finding of a violation. Having regard to the sums awarded in comparable cases (see Ignaccolo-Zenide, §117; Sylvester, § 84; Iglesias Gil and A.U.I., § 67, and Maire, § 82, cited above, as well as Sophia Gudrun Hansen v. Turkey, no. 36141/97, § 115, 23 September 2003), and making an assessment on an equitable basis as required by Article 41, the Court awards the applicant EUR 15,000 under this head.

2. Non-pecuniary damage in respect of Hungary

97. The applicant claimed EUR 60,000 in respect of non–pecuniary damage from Hungary.

98. The Hungarian Government found the applicant's claim excessive.

99. The Court considers that the applicant must have sustained some non-pecuniary damage. Ruling on an equitable basis, it awards award him EUR 3,000 under this head.

B. Costs and expenses

100. The applicant claimed HUF 1,100,000, around EUR 4,550, for costs and expenses incurred during the proceedings before both the Romanian and Hungarian courts, and HUF 424,000 (around EUR 1,750) in attorneys' fees, of which HUF 100,000 (around EUR 415) is owed to his previous legal counsellor, Mr L. Molnar.

101. Both Governments agreed to reimburse those legal costs and expenses which the applicant could prove he had actually advanced in respect of the proceedings concerning them, in so far as they had been actually and necessarily incurred and were reasonable as to quantum.

102. According to Rule 60 § 2 of the Rules of the Court, which was brought to the applicant's attention in a letter of 23 February 2004, itemised particulars of all claims made, together with the relevant supporting documents, are to be submitted, failing which the Chamber may reject the claim in whole or in part.

103. The applicant submitted his claims without any supporting documents. Therefore the full claim cannot be awarded. Nevertheless, it accepts that the applicant must have incurred some legal costs and expenses. Accordingly, it considers it reasonable to make an award of EUR 1,000 in this respect (EUR 500 to be paid by each respondent Government).

C. Default interest

104. The Court considers it appropriate that the default interest should be based on the marginal lending rate of the European Central Bank, to which should be added three percentage points.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY

1. Holds that there has been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention by Romania;

2. Holds that it is not necessary to examine separately whether there has been a violation of Article 13 of the Convention by Romania;

3. Holds that there has been a violation of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention by Hungary;

4. Holds

(a) that the Romanian Government is to pay the applicant, within three months from the date on which the judgment becomes final according to Article 44 § 2 of the Convention, EUR 15,000 (fifteen thousand euros) in respect of non-pecuniary damage, plus EUR 500 (five hundred euros) in costs and expenses, to be converted into Hungarian forints at the rate applicable at the date of settlement, plus any tax that may be chargeable;

(b) that the Hungarian Government is to pay the applicant, within three months from the date on which the judgment becomes final according to Article 44 § 2 of the Convention, EUR 3,000 (three thousand euros) in respect of non-pecuniary damage, plus EUR 500 (five hundred euros) in costs and expenses, to be converted into Hungarian forints at the rate applicable at the date of settlement, plus any tax that may be chargeable;

(c) that from the expiry of the above-mentioned three months until settlement simple interest shall be payable on the above amounts at a rate equal to the marginal lending rate of the European Central Bank during the default period plus three percentage points;

5. Dismisses the remainder of the applicant's claim for just satisfaction.

Done in English, and notified in writing on 5 April 2005, pursuant to Rule 77 §§ 2 and 3 of the Rules of Court.

EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

FIRST SECTION

CASE OF NEWS VERLAGS GmbH & Co.KG v. AUSTRIA

(Application no. 31457/96)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

11 January 2000

FINAL

11/04/2000

In the case of News Verlags GmbH & Co.KG v. Austria,

The European Court of Human Rights (First Section), sitting as a Chamber composed of:

Mrs E. PALM, President,
Mr J. CASADEVALL,
Mr R. TÜRMEN,
Mr C. BÎRSAN,
Mr W. FUHRMANN,
Mrs W. THOMASSEN,
Mr R. MARUSTE, judges, and Mr M. O'BOYLE, Section Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 31 August and 7 December 1999,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case originated in an application (no. 31457/96) against the Republic of Austria lodged with the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") under former Article 25 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") by a company with its seat in Austria, News Verlags GmbH & Co.KG ("the applicant company"), on 13 March 1996.

The applicant company complained that court decisions prohibiting it from publishing the picture of the suspect in the context of reports on the criminal proceedings against him violated its right to freedom of expression and discriminated against it. It invoked Article 10 of the Convention taken alone and in conjunction with Article 14.

2. On 16 April 1998 the Commission (First Chamber) decided to give notice of the application to the Austrian Government ("the Government") and invited them to submit their observations on its admissibility and merits.

3. The Government submitted their observations on 20 July 1998, after an extension of the time-limit fixed for that purpose. The applicant company replied on 16 November 1998, also after an extension of the time-limit.

4. Following the entry into force of Protocol No. 11 to the Convention on 1 November 1998, and in accordance with Article 5 § 2 thereof, the application was examined by the Court.

5. In accordance with Rule 52 § 1 of the Rules of Court, the President of the Court, Mr L. Wildhaber, assigned the case to the First Section. The Chamber constituted within that Section included ex officio Mr W. Fuhrmann, the judge elected in respect of Austria (Article 27 § 2 of the Convention and Rule 26 § 1 (a)), and Mrs E. Palm, President of the Section (Rule 26 § 1 (a)). The other members designated by the latter to complete the Chamber were Mr J. Casadevall, Mr R. Türmen, Mr C. Bîrsan, Mrs W. Thomassen and Mr R. Maruste (Rule 26 § 1 (b)).

6. On 1 June 1999 the Chamber declared the application admissible[1]. Furthermore, the Chamber decided, in case no friendly settlement could be reached, to hold a hearing in accordance with Rule 59 § 2.

7. The text of the Court's admissibility decision was sent to the parties on 18 June 1999 and the parties were invited to submit, before 2 August 1999, such further information or observations on the merits as they wished. The applicant company was also invited to submit its claims for just satisfaction under Article 41 of the Convention (Rule 60).

8. The Court placed itself at the disposal of the parties with a view to securing a friendly settlement (Article 38 § 1 (b) of the Convention and Rule 62).

9. The President of the Chamber granted the applicant company leave to use the German language at the hearing (Rules 34 § 3 and 36 § 5).

10. The Registrar received the Government's memorial on 2 August 1999 and the applicant company's memorial on 16 August 1999. The President of the Chamber decided that the applicant company's memorial was nevertheless to be included in the case file (Rule 38 § 1).

11. A public hearing was held on 31 August 1999 in the Human Rights Building in Strasbourg.

There appeared before the Court:

(a) for the Government
Mr W. OKRESEK, Federal Chancellery, Agent,
Mrs B. GÖTH, Federal Ministry of Justice, Counsel;

(b) for the applicant company
Mr G. LANSKY,
Mr D. HEINE, Counsel.

The Court heard addresses by Mr Lansky and Mr Okresek.

THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

12. The applicant, a limited liability company with its seat in Tulln, is the owner and publisher of the magazine News.

13. In December 1993 a series of letter bombs was sent to politicians and other persons in the public eye in Austria. Some of the addressees were severely injured.

14. On 10 December 1993 B., a right-wing extremist, was arrested on suspicion of having been involved in the so-called letter-bomb campaign. He was taken into detention on remand. Preliminary investigations were instituted against him on suspicion of attempted murder and of having committed offences under the National Socialism Prohibition Act (Verbotsgesetz – "the Prohibition Act"). He was later charged with offences under the Prohibition Act and with having aided and abetted assault.

15. In December 1993 the applicant company published a special issue and later an article in one of the regular issues of its magazine News, dealing with the letter-bomb campaign, the activities of the extreme right and, in particular, the suspect B. The respective reports were illustrated with several pictures of B. The cover page of the special issue for instance showed a small picture of B., subtitled in big letters "The Mad World of Perpetrators". Under the headline "Terror for the Führer" a full-page picture showed B. together with two other persons. According to the comments, this picture was taken in a courtroom, where B. stood up in protest when the verdict was pronounced against his "Führer", the neo-Nazi leader G.K. Furthermore, it was stated that, when G.K. was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, his companions, including B., swore vengeance. According to another comment on the same page, these companions who had been supposed to be harmless lunatics were now arrested as bomb terrorists. The cover page of the second issue carried the headline "Victims and Nazis" and showed a large picture of one of the victims and a smaller picture of B. and two others. The victim was quoted as saying: "I want to meet the perpetrators." At the bottom of the page the words "Nazi scene uncovered" appeared. In the article, a further picture of B. and another suspect, R., was shown. According to the comment, it had been taken on the occasion of the trial of the neo-Nazi leader G.K. The comment went on to state that R. and B., who had both wished to succeed G.K., were now suspected of having dispatched the bombs. Moreover, a wedding picture of B. was published. The comment accompanying it stated that, according to the investigations of the police, B. and R. had probably collaborated in order to organise the letter-bomb campaign. In the article itself, B. was described as pathologically ambitious, one of the most brutal members of the neo-Nazi scene and the possible successor to the neo-Nazi leader G.K.

16. On 21 January 1994 B. brought proceedings under section 78 of the Copyright Act (Urheberrechtsgesetz) against the applicant company, requesting that the latter be prohibited from publishing his picture in connection with reports on any criminal proceedings against him. He also requested a preliminary injunction (einstweilige Verfügung) to that effect.

17. On 9 March 1994 the Vienna Commercial Court (Handelsgericht) dismissed B.'s application for a preliminary injunction.

18. The court observed that section 78 of the Copyright Act prohibited publishing a person's picture if the publication violated that person's legitimate interests. However, where criminal proceedings were conducted against the person concerned, that interest had to be weighed against the public interest in receiving information. As the present case related to very serious offences based on anti-democratic, subversive ideology, the publication of a suspect's picture was justified in principle. Further, the court found that it did not have to examine whether the accompanying comment violated B.'s right to respect for his private life as he had failed to indicate which passages of the articles at issue might go beyond the limits of acceptable reporting.

19. On 22 September 1994 the Vienna Court of Appeal (Oberlandesgericht), upon B.'s appeal, issued a preliminary injunction prohibiting the applicant company from publishing B.'s picture in connection with reports on the criminal proceedings against him on suspicion of having committed offences under the Prohibition Act and of having aided and abetted assault through letter-bomb attacks.

20. The Court of Appeal pointed out that section 78 of the Copyright Act was directed against the abuse of pictures in public. Section 78 sought above all to prevent a person from being disparaged by the publication of a picture, or his private life being made public or his picture being used in a way giving rise to misinterpretation, or in a disparaging and degrading manner. Further, the court observed that section 78 of the said Act did not define the term “legitimate interests”, thus conferring discretion on the courts in order to enable them to take the particular circumstances of each case into account. It also required the courts to weigh the interest of the person concerned in the protection of his or her picture against the publisher's interest in conveying information.

21. The Court of Appeal went on to say that, in assessing whether a person's legitimate interests within the meaning of section 78 of the Copyright Act had been violated, not only the picture itself, but also the accompanying text had to be taken into account. Also, a person suspected of having committed an offence had a legitimate interest in not being denounced in public by the publication of a picture in connection with a disparaging text. In the present case, the contested publication constituted not only a gross insult, but also a serious violation of the presumption of innocence. Quoting some headlines and comments from the articles at issue, the Court of Appeal noted that the applicant company had called B. a "perpetrator" of the letter-bomb attacks, a "Nazi", a "terrorist for the 'Führer'" and a companion of the neo-Nazi G.K. who had been sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. These gross violations of B.'s legitimate interests justified a prohibition on the publication of his picture in the context of the criminal proceedings which were at the time conducted against him.

22. Despite this line of reasoning, the judgment had the effect of prohibiting the publication of B.'s picture not only in connection with a text that was prejudicial but – even more restrictively – in connection with reports on the criminal proceedings against him irrespective of the accompanying text.

23. On 22 November 1994 the Supreme Court (Oberster Gerichtshof) rejected both parties' extraordinary appeals on points of law (außerordentlicher Revisionsrekurs), finding that they did not raise any important legal issues. As to the applicant company's appeal, it found that section 7a of the Media Act (Mediengesetz), to which the applicant company had referred in its submissions, did not lead to the result that a suspect's legitimate interests could not be violated by the publication of his picture. There was thus no contradiction with section 78 of the Copyright Act. Further, there were no clear indications in the present case that the public interest justified the publishing of B.'s picture. Thus, the appellate court's decision was not based on a gross misinterpretation of the law.

24. Supplementing his application of 21 January 1994, B. had in the meantime filed an alternative claim (Eventualbegehren), requesting that the applicant company be ordered to refrain from publishing his picture in connection with such statements as had been made in the articles at issue and which he listed in detail.

25. On 19 April 1995 the Vienna Commercial Court, in the main proceedings, granted B.'s alternative claim, ordering the applicant company to refrain from publishing B.'s picture where the publication was likely to violate B.'s legitimate interests, namely in connection with statements in which B. was referred to as the perpetrator of the letter-bomb attacks or as being involved in terror or letter-bomb attacks, or in connection with such statements – listed in detail – as had been made in the articles at issue.

26. The court found that the publication of B.'s picture together with the accompanying text constituted not only a gross insult, but also a serious violation of the presumption of innocence. These gross violations of B.'s legitimate interests justified a prohibition on publishing his picture in the context of the criminal proceedings against him, but only if he was referred to as the perpetrator of the offences or if otherwise the rules of objective reporting were violated. Having regard to the seriousness of the charges brought against B. and the notoriety of the victims, the public interest in B.'s appearance outweighed his interest in not having his picture published as long as such reports did not overstep the boundaries of objective journalism. Further, the court emphasised that it did not intend to sanction reporting (Wortberichterstattung) as such. It repeated that, when assessing a person's claim under section 78 of the Copyright Act, the text accompanying the pictures was of importance. It made a difference whether a person, along with the publication of his picture, was stigmatised as the perpetrator of a crime or whether an objective report on the criminal proceedings against him was given.

27. On 30 August 1995 the Vienna Court of Appeal dismissed the applicant company's appeal but granted B.'s appeal. It ordered the applicant company to refrain from publishing B.'s picture in connection with reports on the criminal proceedings against him on suspicion of having committed offences under the Prohibition Act and of having aided and abetted assault through letter-bomb attacks.

28. The court recalled the reasons given in its decision of 22 September 1994 (see paragraphs 20-21 above) concluding once again that the publication of B.'s picture in the context of the accompanying comments had constituted a gross violation of his legitimate interests, which justified a prohibition on publishing his picture in the context of the criminal proceedings against him. It added that the onus was not upon B. to specify the statements which the applicant company had to refrain from publishing in connection with the pictures since, in general, new accusations were published in the course of the proceedings, and there was no interest in repeating the previous ones. Thus, the Commercial Court's judgment was worded too narrowly.

29. On 24 October 1995 the Supreme Court rejected the applicant company's extraordinary appeal on points of law. It found that the applicant company undoubtedly had a right to impart information about the proceedings conducted against B. However, the right to impart information had to be distinguished from the right to publish pictures of B., which had to be balanced against B.'s interest in the protection of his picture. Even the publication of a picture accompanied by a correct statement of facts, which violated neither section 7a nor section 7b of the Media Act, could infringe the legitimate interests of the person concerned. Finally, the Supreme Court, referring to Article 10 of the Convention, found that the applicant company's right to freedom of expression had not been violated, since it had not been prohibited from reporting on the proceedings, but only from publishing B.'s picture in that context.

30. In December 1995 a first-instance court acquitted B. of the charges of assault but convicted him of offences under the Prohibition Act. The criminal proceedings against B. received extensive news coverage. Contrary to the applicant company, other newspapers remained free to publish B.'s picture.

31. On 18 December 1995 the Vienna Court of Appeal, in proceedings brought by B. under section 7b of the Media Act, found that the applicant company had violated the presumption of innocence and ordered it to pay 50,000 Austrian schillings by way of compensation to B. The court found that in its articles of December 1993 the applicant company had referred to B. as the perpetrator of the "letter-bomb terror".

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW

A. The Copyright Act

32. The relevant provision of the Copyright Act reads as follows:

Section 78

"(1) Images of persons shall neither be exhibited publicly, nor disseminated in any other way in which they are made accessible to the public, where the legitimate interests of the person in question or, in the event that they have died without having authorised or ordered publication, of a close relative would be injured.

This provision has been interpreted in the Supreme Court's case-law. In particular the Supreme Court found that in determining whether the publication of a person's picture violated his or her "legitimate interests" regard was to be had to the accompanying text. Where the publisher of the picture claimed that there was a public interest in its publication, the courts had to carry out a weighing of the respective interests involved. As regards reporting on criminal cases, the Supreme Court constantly held that there was no predominating public interest in the publication of the suspect's picture if it had no additional independent information value. The only effect was that the intensity of such reporting was increased by joining the suspect's picture and, thus, made his or her appearance known to the public at large (see for instance, MuR 1990, p. 224; SZ 63/75, p. 373; MuR 1995, p. 64; MuR 1996, p. 33).

B. The Media Act

33. The relevant provisions of the Media Act read as follows:

Section 7a

"(1) Where publication is made, through any medium, of a name, image or other particulars which are likely to lead to the disclosure to a larger not directly informed circle of people of the identity of a person who

1. has been the victim of an offence punishable by the courts, or

2. is suspected of having committed, or has been convicted of, a punishable offence, and where legitimate interests of that person are thereby injured and there is no predominant public interest in the publication of such details on account of the person's position in society, of some other connection with public life, or of other reasons, the victim shall have a claim against the owner of the medium (publisher) for damages for the injury suffered. The award of damages shall not exceed 200,000 schillings; additionally, section 6(1), second sentence, shall apply.

(2) Legitimate interests of the victim shall in any event be injured if the publication

1. in the case of subsection (1)1 is such as to give rise to an interference with the victim's strictly private life or to his or her exposure,

2. in the case of subsection (1)2 relates to a juvenile or merely to a lesser indictable offence or may substantially prejudice the victim's advancement.

Section 7b

"(1) Where a person who is suspected of having committed a punishable offence but has not been finally convicted is portrayed in a medium as guilty, or as the offender and not merely a suspect, the victim shall have a claim in damages against the owner of the medium (publisher) for the injury suffered. The award of damages shall not exceed 200,000 schillings; additionally, section 6(1), second sentence, shall apply.

..."

FINAL SUBMISSIONS TO THE COURT

34. In their memorial, the Government asked the Court to declare that there had been no violation of Article 10.

35. The applicant company requested the Court to hold that there had been a violation of Article 10 of the Convention as well as of Article 14 taken in conjunction with Article 10.

THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 10 OF THE CONVENTION

36. The applicant company alleged that the injunctions, as issued by the Vienna Court of Appeal and confirmed by the Supreme Court, prohibiting it from publishing the picture of the suspect, B., in connection with reports on the criminal proceedings against him, irrespective of the accompanying text, constituted a violation of Article 10 of the Convention which reads:

> "1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.
> 2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary."

A. Whether there was an interference

37. The Government disputed that the contested injunctions constituted an interference with the applicant company's right to freedom of expression. They conceded that the publication of a picture may in some cases be protected by Article 10 of the Convention, but argued that this was not the case if a photograph published in the context of reporting had no information value either in itself or in connection with the information conveyed. In the Government's view, the publication of B.'s picture did not add any information to the applicant company's reports.

38. The applicant company contested this view. It maintained that the choice of the form and the means of communicating information was for the person conveying the information. It also stressed that the reporting at issue was a unity of text and pictures which was protected by Article 10 in its entirety as well as in its single components.

39. The Court recalls that it is not for the Court, or for the national courts for that matter, to substitute their own views for those of the press as to what technique of reporting should be adopted by journalists. Article 10 protects not only the substance of ideas and information but also the form in which they are conveyed (see the Jersild v. Denmark judgment of 23 September 1994, Series A no. 298, pp. 23-24, § 31).

40. The Court considers that the prohibition on the publication of B.'s picture in the context of reports on the criminal proceedings against him, which limited the applicant company's choice as to the form in which it could present such reports, constituted an interference with its right to freedom of expression, which is in breach of Article 10 unless it satisfies the requirements of the second paragraph of that Article.

B. Whether the interference was "prescribed by law"

41. The applicant company, in its memorial, conceded that the interference at issue was based on section 78 of the Copyright Act. At the hearing before the Court it expressed doubts as to whether this provision prescribed the conditions under which the publication of a person's picture may be prohibited with sufficient clarity, without however elaborating on the issue in detail. The Government for their part, asserted that section 78 of the Copyright Act formed the legal basis for the injunctions.

42. The Court recalls that the relevant national law must be formulated with sufficient precision to enable the persons concerned – if need be with appropriate legal advice – to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail (see the Worm v. Austria judgment of 29 August 1997, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1997-V, p. 1548, § 38).

43. Section 78 of the Copyright Act employs somewhat imprecise wording, namely "legitimate interests" and thereby confers broad discretion on the courts. The Court has, however, acknowledged the fact that frequently laws are framed in a manner that is not absolutely precise (see the markt intern Verlag GmbH and Klaus Beermann v. Germany judgment of 20 November 1989, Series A no. 165, pp. 18-19, § 30, with further references). Such considerations are particularly cogent in the sphere of the publication of a person's picture, where the courts are called upon to weigh that person's rights, such as for instance the right to respect for his or her private life, against the publisher's right to freedom of expression. Moreover, the Court notes that the notion of "legitimate interests" has been interpreted in the Supreme Court's case-law (see paragraph 32 above). The Court concludes that it cannot be said that the Vienna Court of Appeal's application of section 78 of the Copyright Act went beyond what could reasonably be foreseen in the circumstances.

Accordingly, the Court is satisfied that the interference was "prescribed by law".

C. Whether the interference pursued a legitimate aim

44. It was common ground that the contested injunctions aimed at "the protection of the reputation or rights of others". The Government emphasised that they aimed in particular at protecting B.'s right to a fair trial based on respect for the presumption of innocence and his right to respect for his private life. The Government added that the interference eventually also served to maintain the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.

45. The Court notes that the judgments of the domestic courts show that the injunctions were intended to protect B. against insult and defamation and against violations of the presumption of innocence. Thus they had the aim of protecting "the reputation or rights of others" and also "the authority and impartiality of the judiciary" in so far as that term has been interpreted to include the protection of the rights of litigants in general (see the Sunday Times v. the United Kingdom (no. 1) judgment of 26 April 1979, Series A no. 30, p. 34, § 56).

46. The interference complained of, thus, had aims that were legitimate under paragraph 2 of Article 10.

D. Whether the interference was "necessary in a democratic society"

47. The applicant company mainly disputed that the injunctions were "necessary" for achieving the aforementioned aims. It submitted in particular that the overall background of the publications had to be taken into account. The letter-bomb attacks were directed against politicians and other persons committed to protecting the rights of groups suffering persecution and discrimination. Being based on National Socialist ideology they were perceived as a threat to the democratic order of the Republic. Accordingly, its reporting in this context had to be seen as a contribution to a political debate. Moreover, the applicant company emphasised that B., who was the main suspect in the criminal proceedings reported upon, was not unknown to the public. Being a militant right-wing extremist, he had attracted public attention and received media coverage already before the letter-bomb attacks. The applicant company added that B.'s picture was published by all other media while the criminal proceedings against him were pending and that he was indeed convicted of offences under the National Socialist Prohibition Act by final judgment.

48. The applicant company conceded that in cases concerning the publication of an individual's picture in the context of reporting, a conflict may arise between the freedom of the press and the individual's right to protection of his or her private and family life. However, the photographs of B. used in its reports did not infringe B.'s personal integrity, as they were not in themselves degrading or defamatory. The applicant company also accepted that the State may be called upon to ensure that the media do not infringe the presumption of innocence, as reports on pending proceedings may endanger the impartiality of the courts. However, it argued that in the present case the injunctions were disproportionate as they contained an

49. The Government stressed that the publication of B.'s picture encroached upon his right to respect for his private life and, having regard to the disparaging text accompanying it, also violated the presumption of innocence. In such a case section 78 of the Copyright Act affords the person concerned the requisite protection of his or her rights under Articles 6 and 8 of the Convention. As this provision applies when "legitimate interests" of the person concerned are violated, it calls for weighing the person's interest in banning the publication against the interest of the media in providing information.

50. The Government asserted that the injunctions were proportionate, as the Austrian courts correctly weighed the interests involved. Having regard to the accompanying text in the original articles giving rise to the dispute, which referred to B. as the perpetrator of the letter-bomb attacks, and the extraordinary public attention any reporting on the issue attracted, the publication of B.'s picture constituted a particularly serious violation of his rights. The Government concluded that the relatively wide scope of the injunctions was necessary as the identification of which accompanying texts should be banned in connection with the publication of the pictures was not expedient. Moreover, the injunctions did not affect the applicant company's right to publish comments on the proceedings against B.

51. Finally, the Government contested that the applicant company's reporting contributed to a political debate and stressed that the applicant company's allegations that B. was the perpetrator of the letter-bomb attacks were simply false. In this context they pointed out that B. was acquitted of the charges of aiding and abetting assault, while the true perpetrator has meanwhile been convicted by final judgment.

52. The Court recalls its well-established case-law that the adjective "necessary", within the meaning of Article 10 § 2 implies the existence of a "pressing social need". The Contracting States have a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether such a need exists, but it goes hand in hand with a European supervision embracing both the law and the decisions applying it, even those given by an independent court. The Court is therefore empowered to give the final ruling on whether a "restriction" is reconcilable with freedom of expression as protected by Article 10.

In exercising its supervisory jurisdiction, the Court cannot confine itself to considering the impugned court decisions in isolation; it must look at them in the light of the case as a whole, including the articles held against the applicant company and the context in which they were written. The Court must determine whether the interference at issue was "proportionate to the legitimate aims pursued" and whether the reasons adduced by the national courts to justify it are "relevant and sufficient" (see for instance the Sunday Times (no. 1) judgment cited above, p. 38, § 62; the Observer and Guardian v. the United Kingdom judgment of 26 November 1991, Series A no. 216, pp. 29-30, § 59; and the recapitulation in Sürek v. Turkey (no. 1), [GC], no. 26682/95, § 58, ECHR 1999-IV).

53. In the present case the Vienna Court of Appeal, by judgment of 22 September 1994 in preliminary injunction proceedings (see paragraphs 19-22 above) and by judgment of 30 August 1995 in the subsequent main proceedings (see paragraphs 27-28 above), issued injunctions prohibiting the applicant company from publishing B.'s picture in the context of the criminal proceedings against him irrespective of the accompanying text. Its judgments were upheld by the Supreme Court (see paragraphs 23 and 29 above).

54. The articles which gave rise to the injunction proceedings were written against the background of a spectacular series of letter bombs which had been sent to politicians and other persons in the public eye in Austria and had severely injured several victims. The attacks, thus, were a news item of major public concern. The applicant company's articles dealt with the activities of the extreme right and in particular with B., who had been arrested as the main suspect. Being a right-wing extremist, he had entered the public scene well before the series of letter-bomb attacks. Moreover, it has to be borne in mind that the offences he was suspected of, namely offences under the Prohibition Act and aiding and abetting assault through letter bombs, were offences with a political background directed against the foundations of a democratic society. It may be added that the photographs of B., with the possible exception of one wedding picture, did not disclose any details of his private life. Thus, the Court cannot subscribe to the Government's argument that the publications at issue encroached upon B.'s right to respect for his private life.

These circumstances have to be taken into account when assessing whether the reasons adduced by the Austrian courts for justifying the injunctions were "relevant" and "sufficient" and whether the injunctions were "proportionate to the legitimate aims pursued".

55. Another factor of particular importance for the Court's determination in the present case is the essential function the press fulfils in a democratic society. Although the press must not overstep certain bounds, in particular in respect of the reputation and rights of others or of the proper administration of justice, its duty is nevertheless to impart – in a manner consistent with its obligations and responsibilities – information and ideas on all matters of public interest (see Bladet Tromsø and Stensaas v. Norway [GC], no. 21980/93, § 59, ECHR 1999-III).

56. This duty extends to the reporting and commenting on court proceedings which, provided that they do not overstep the bounds set out above, contribute to their publicity and are thus perfectly consonant with the requirement under Article 6 § 1 of the Convention that hearings be public. Not only do the media have the task of imparting such information and ideas: the public has a right to receive them (see the Worm judgment cited above, pp. 1551-52, § 50). This is all the more so where, as in the present case, a person is involved who has laid himself open to public scrutiny by expressing extremist views (see, mutatis mutandis, the Worm judgment, ibid.). However, the limits of permissible comment on pending criminal proceedings may not extend to statements which are likely to prejudice, whether intentionally or not, the chances of a person receiving a fair trial or to undermine the confidence of the public in the role of the courts in the administration of justice (ibid.). Thus, the fact that B. had a right under Article 6 § 2 of the Convention to be presumed innocent until proved guilty is also of relevance for the balancing of competing interests which the Court must carry out (see Bladet Tromsø and Stensaas cited above, § 65).

57. The Vienna Court of Appeal stated in the reasons for its decision of 22 September 1994 and its subsequent judgment of 30 August 1995 that it was not the publication of B.'s picture in itself but its combination with comments which were insulting and contrary to the presumption of innocence that violated B.'s legitimate interests within the meaning of section 78 of the Copyright Act. Notwithstanding these remarks, and contrary to the Vienna Commercial Court which had regard to this link between pictures and text and prohibited the applicant company only from publishing B.'s picture in connection with statements in which he was insulted or referred to as the perpetrator of the letter-bomb attacks, the Vienna Court of Appeal imposed an absolute prohibition on the applicant company. It considered that it was not for B. to specify the statements the applicant company had to refrain from making but, unlike the Commercial Court (see paragraphs 25-26 above), it failed to give reasons for its approach.

58. The Court acknowledges that there may be good reasons for prohibiting the publication of a suspect's picture in itself, depending on the nature of the offence at issue and the particular circumstances of the case. A similar line of argument was followed by the Supreme Court, which stated that even the publication of a picture accompanied by a correct statement of fact could infringe the legitimate interests of the person concerned. However, no reasons to that effect were adduced by the Vienna Court of Appeal. Nor did it, contrary to the Vienna Commercial Court, carry out a weighing of B.'s interest in the protection of his picture against the public interest in its publication which, as the Government pointed out, is required under section 78 of the Copyright Act. This is all the more surprising as the publication of a suspect's picture is not generally prohibited under section 7a of the Austrian Media Act unless the suspect is a juvenile or the offences are only of a minor nature, but depends precisely on a weighing of the respective interests. In sum the reasons adduced by the Vienna Court of Appeal, though “relevant”, are not “sufficient”.

59. It is true, as the Government pointed out, that the injunctions did not in any way restrict the applicant company's right to publish comments on the criminal proceedings against B. However, they restricted the applicant company's choice as to the presentation of its reports, while it was undisputed that other media were free to continue to publish B.'s picture throughout the criminal proceedings against him. Having regard to these circumstances and to the domestic courts' finding that it was not the pictures used by the applicant company but only their combination with the text that interfered with B.'s rights, the Court finds that the absolute prohibition on the publication of B.'s picture went further than was necessary to protect B. against defamation or against violation of the presumption of innocence. Thus, there is no reasonable relationship of proportionality between the injunctions as formulated by the Vienna Court of Appeal and the legitimate aims pursued.

60. It follows from these considerations that the interference with the applicant company's right to freedom of expression was not "necessary in a democratic society". Accordingly, there has been a violation of Article 10 of the Convention.

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 14 OF THE CONVENTION TAKEN IN CONJUNCTION WITH ARTICLE 10

61. The applicant company asserted that the injunctions also constituted a violation of Article 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with Article 10 as it was discriminated against in relation to other media.

62. Having regard to its findings under Article 10 of the Convention taken alone (see in particular paragraph 59 above), the Court does not consider it necessary to examine this complaint.

III. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 41 OF THE CONVENTION

63. Article 41 of the Convention provides:

> "If the Court finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. Damage

64. The applicant company claimed compensation for pecuniary as well as for non-pecuniary damage. As to pecuniary damage it submitted that it had, as a result of the prohibition on the publication of B.'s picture, suffered a loss of circulation and a loss of income from advertising which is directly dependent on circulation. As to non-pecuniary damage, the applicant company alleged that the impugned court decisions caused prejudice to its reputation. In its memorial the applicant company did not specify any amounts claimed as compensation. At the hearing it requested 50,000 euros in respect of non-pecuniary damage.

65. The Government asserted that the applicant company had failed to show that it had actually sustained pecuniary damage. As to non-pecuniary damage, the Government considered that the finding of a violation would constitute sufficient just satisfaction.

66. As to pecuniary damage, the Court, like the Government, finds that the applicant company has failed to substantiate its claim.

As to non-pecuniary damage for the alleged loss of reputation, the Court will leave open whether a corporate applicant can claim non-pecuniary damage of this sort (see, mutatis mutandis, Immobiliare Saffi v. Italy [GC], no. 22774/93, § 79, ECHR 1999-V) as, in the circumstances of the case, the finding of a violation provides sufficient just satisfaction as regards any non-pecuniary damage the applicant company might have sustained.

B. Costs and expenses

67. In its memorial the applicant company claimed 151,327.32 Austrian schillings (ATS) as costs and expenses incurred in the domestic proceedings and ATS 78,977.70 for the Strasbourg proceedings. It further claimed ATS 45,800 for its participation at the hearing before the Court.

68. The Government did not comment on these claims.

69. The Court recalls that, according to its case-law, it has to consider whether the costs and expenses were actually and necessarily incurred in order to prevent or obtain redress for the matter found to constitute a violation of the Convention and were reasonable as to quantum (see, for example, Bladet Tromsø and Stensaas cited above, § 80). The Court considers that these conditions are met as regards the costs and expenses incurred in the domestic proceedings and, consequently, awards the sum of ATS 151,327.32. As to the costs for the Strasbourg proceedings, the Court finds the claim reasonable and, consequently, awards the full amount, namely ATS 124,777.70.

C. Default interest

70. According to the information available to the Court, the statutory rate of interest applicable in Austria at the date of adoption of the present judgment is 4% per annum.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY

1. Holds that there has been a violation of Article 10 of the Convention;

2. Holds that it is not necessary to examine the complaint under Article 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with Article 10;

3. Holds that the present judgment constitutes in itself sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage sustained;

4. Holds
   (a) that the respondent State is to pay the applicant company, within three months from the date on which this judgment becomes final according to Article 44 § 2 of the Convention, ATS 276,105.02 (two hundred and seventy-six thousand one hundred and five Austrian schillings two groschen), for costs and expenses;
   (b) that simple interest at an annual rate of 4% shall be payable from the expiry of the above-mentioned three months until settlement;

5. Dismisses the remainder of the applicant company's claims for just satisfaction.

In the case of Olsson v. Sweden (no. 2)*,

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Court, as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr R. Ryssdal, President,
Mr F. Matscher,
Mr L.-E. Pettiti,
Mr B. Walsh,
Mr C. Russo,
Mr S.K. Martens,
Mrs E. Palm,
Mr A.N. Loizou,
Mr A.B. Baka,

and also of Mr M.-A. Eissen, Registrar, and Mr H. Petzold, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 24 April and 30 October 1992,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

Notes by the Registrar

* The case is numbered 74/1991/326/398. The first number is the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court in the relevant year (second number). The last two numbers indicate the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court since its creation and on the list of the corresponding originating applications to the Commission.

 As amended by Article 11 of Protocol No. 8 (P8-11), which came into force on 1 January 1990.

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court on 20 August 1991 by the Government of the Kingdom of Sweden ("the Government"), within the three-month period laid down in Article 32 para. 1 and Article 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47) of the Convention. It originated in an application (no. 13441/87) against Sweden lodged with the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") under Article 25 (art. 25) by two Swedish citizens, Mr Stig and Mrs Gun Olsson, on 23 October 1987.

The object of the application was to obtain a decision as to whether or not the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention.

2. In response to the enquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 para. 3 (d) of the Rules of Court, the applicants stated that they wished to take part in the proceedings and designated the lawyer who would represent them (Rule 30).

3. The Chamber to be constituted included ex officio Mrs E. Palm, the elected judge of Swedish nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr R. Ryssdal, the President of the Court (Rule 21 para. 3 (b)). On 28 September 1991 the President drew by lot, in the presence of the Registrar, the names of the seven other members, namely Mr F. Matscher, Mr L.-E. Pettiti, Mr B. Walsh, Mr C. Russo, Mr S.K. Martens, Mr A.N. Loizou and Mr A.B. Baka (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 para. 4) (art. 43).

4. Mr Ryssdal assumed the office of President of the Chamber (Rule 21 para. 5) and, through the Registrar, consulted the Agent of the Government, the Delegate of the Commission and the representative of the applicants on the organisation of the procedure (Rules 37 para. 1 and 38).

In accordance with the orders made in consequence the registry received, on 23 January 1992, the applicants' memorial and, on 6 February, the Government's. On 6 April the Secretary to the Commission informed the Registrar that the Delegate would submit his observations at the hearing.

On 7 and 27 April the Commission filed a number of documents which the Registrar had sought from it on the President's instructions. These included some, but not all, of the documents requested by the applicants.

5. A number of documents were filed by the applicants and by the Government on various dates between 3 February and 15 April 1992.

6. As further directed by the President, the hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 22 April 1992. The Court had held a preparatory meeting beforehand.

There appeared before the Court:

(a) for the Government

Mr C.H. Ehrenkrona, Legal Adviser,
Ministry for Foreign Affairs, Agent,
Mrs I. Stenkula, Legal Adviser,
Ministry of Health and Social Affairs,
Mrs B. Larson, Former Chief District Officer,
Social Services in Gothenburg, Advisers;

(b) for the Commission

Mr Gaukur Jörundsson, Delegate;

(c) for the applicants

Mrs S. Westerberg, lawyer, Counsel,
Mrs B. Hellwig, Adviser.

The Court heard addresses by Mr Ehrenkrona for the Government, by Mr Gaukur Jörundsson for the Commission and by Mrs Westerberg for the applicants, as well as replies to questions put by the Court and by its President.

AS TO THE FACTS

I. PARTICULAR CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

A. Introduction

7. The applicants, Mr Stig and Mrs Gun Olsson, who are husband and wife, are Swedish citizens and live at Angered, near Gothenburg in Sweden. There were three children of the marriage, namely Stefan, Helena and Thomas, born in June 1971, December 1976 and January 1979, respectively.

8. The present proceedings, which concern mainly Helena and Thomas, are a sequel to the case which the Court decided in its judgment of 24 March 1988, Series A no. 130 (hereinafter referred to as "Olsson I"). That case concerned the period from 16 September 1980, when the applicants' three children were taken into public care, to 18 June 1987, when the public care of Helena and Thomas was terminated (see paragraph 10 below). The main issue in that case was whether the decision to take the children into care, the manner in which it had been implemented and the refusals to terminate the care had given rise to violations of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention. In the context of the case now under review it is of importance to note that with regard to this issue the Court held that "the implementation of the care decision, but not that decision itself or its maintenance in force, gave rise to a breach of Article 8 (art. 8)" (Olsson I, p. 38, para. 84).

For the background to this case the Court refers in the first place to Part I of Olsson I (pp. 9-19, paras. 8-32).

B. Proceedings relating to the applicants' requests for termination of the public care order

9. A first request by the applicants for termination of the public care order was dismissed by the Social District Council no. 6 in Gothenburg ("the Social Council") on 1 June 1982. The dismissal was upheld by the County Administrative Court (länsrätten) on 17 November and by the Administrative Court of Appeal (kammarrätten) in Gothenburg on 28 December 1982. The applicants applied unsuccessfully for leave to appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court (regeringsrätten).

A fresh request, submitted to the Social Council in the autumn of 1983, was, according to the Government, rejected on 6 December 1983. Apparently, no appeal was lodged against this decision.

10. A further request by the applicants for termination of the public care, apparently lodged on 16 August 1984, was rejected by the Social Council on 30 October 1984 as far as concerns Helena and Thomas and, after further investigations, on 17 September 1985 as regards Stefan. Appeals by the parents against these decisions were dismissed by the County Administrative Court on 3 October 1985 and 3 February 1986, respectively, after it had obtained expert opinions from Chief Doctors Per H. Jonsson and George Finney and from a psychologist, Mr Göran Löthman, on 22 and 30 August 1985 and held a hearing on 20 September 1985 in the former case.

The applicants thereupon appealed to the Administrative Court of Appeal in Gothenburg, which joined the two cases. On 12 February 1986 the court decided to request an opinion from the County Administrative Board (länsstyrelsen), which it received on 15 April 1986. A hearing was scheduled for 21 August 1986 but was postponed until 4 February 1987. After the hearing, at which the applicants gave evidence, the court, by judgment of 16 February 1987, directed that the public care of Stefan be terminated and dismissed the appeal in so far as it concerned Helena and Thomas.

Following an appeal by the parents, the Supreme Administrative Court, by judgment of 18 June 1987, directed that the public care of Helena and Thomas should terminate, there being no sufficiently serious circumstances to warrant its continuation.

C. Prohibition on removal and related proceedings

1. Decision to prohibit removal and refusal to suspend its implementation

11. In the above-mentioned proceedings, the Supreme Administrative Court pointed out that the question to be determined in deciding whether care should be discontinued pursuant to section 5 of the 1980 Act (see the above-mentioned Olsson I judgment, pp. 25-26, para. 49) was whether there was still a need for care. The problems associated with the removal of a child from a foster home and its possible detrimental effects on him and with his reunion with his natural parents were matters to be considered not under section 5 but in separate proceedings, namely an examination under section 28 of the Social Services Act 1980 (socialtjänstlagen 1980: 620; see paragraph 57 below).

12. On 23 June 1987 the Social Council prohibited, pursuant to section 28 of the Social Services Act, the applicants from removing Helena and Thomas from their respective foster homes. This decision referred, inter alia, to the two reports by Chief Doctors Jonsson and Finney (see paragraph 10 above). The latter report noted that Thomas was no longer depressive but still had traits of a childhood disturbance, in the form of delayed development and anguish in unfamiliar situations.

The Social Council's decision took account of the fact that Helena and Thomas had not been under the care of the applicants for a long time, that the contacts between the parents and the children had been very sparse and that the children had become emotionally attached to their respective foster families and environment. Regard was also had to the fact that Thomas was showing signs of greater stability, that Helena had expressed a wish not to move and that increased demands had been placed upon the natural parents by reason of Stefan's return to their home. There was a risk, which was not of a minor nature, that if Helena and Thomas were to be removed from their foster homes, their physical and mental health would thereby be harmed.

13. On 25 June 1987 the County Administrative Court rejected a request by the applicants for suspension (inhibition) of the prohibition order. That decision was confirmed by the Administrative Court of Appeal on 2 July 1987 and, on 17 August, the Supreme Administrative Court refused leave to appeal.

2. First set of proceedings challenging the prohibition on removal

14. In the meantime, shortly after the decision of 23 June 1987 to prohibit removal, the applicants had appealed against it to the County Administrative Court. The court sought expert opinions from Chief Doctors Jonsson and Finney. According to these opinions, dated 14 July and 3 September 1987, the prohibition was in Helena's and Thomas's best interests because:

(a) Helena had shown signs of anxiety at the prospect of being forced to return to her biological parents. For instance, on learning about the lifting of the public care order, she had gone into hiding for two days; moreover, together with Thomas, she had worked out escape plans in the event of a return. Whilst deriving a feeling of support from her foster parents and friends, she felt extremely uncertain, critical and hesitant about her natural parents. Although the latter had demanded her return, they had not, in her view, indicated a willingness to form a relationship with her and this confused her. Removing Helena from her foster home against her own wishes would entail a substantial risk to her mental well-being and also to her physical health if, in desperation, she were to carry out her plan of escaping from the applicants' home;

(b) Thomas had suffered from certain childhood disturbances and had a retarded development. It was especially on the emotional plane that he was handicapped; he was very dependent upon his foster mother and was in a fragile phase of his development. To remove Thomas would have devastating effects on his mental development, both emotionally and intellectually.

Further, the psychologist Löthman, also considered, in an opinion supplied to the court on 3 September 1987, that remaining in the foster home was in Thomas's best interests. Mr Löthman observed that Thomas had developed in a positive manner, although he continued to be psychologically vulnerable and to have great emotional needs. His attachment to the foster family had clearly been strong and positive; he had dismissed the idea, which gave rise to fear and anxiety on his part, of returning to his natural parents. In that event he intended to escape.

Both the Social Council and the guardian ad litem, Mr Åberg, recommended that the appeal be rejected. The applicants did not ask for a hearing and the court did not hold one. By judgment of 3 November 1987, it dismissed the appeal.

15. The applicants appealed to the Administrative Court of Appeal, asking it to revoke the prohibition on removal or, in the alternative, to limit the measure in time, at the most until 6 January 1988. Again they did not ask for a hearing; the Social Council and the guardian ad litem recommended that the appeal be dismissed. The court examined the case on the basis of the case-file and, by judgment of 30 December 1987, rejected the appeal.

16. The applicants then proceeded with an appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court, reiterating their request for revocation of the prohibition on removal or, in the alternative, for limitation of the measure in time, until 15 March 1988. On this occasion they asked for an oral hearing.

Leave to appeal was granted on 4 February 1988. On the same date the court requested the National Board of Health and Welfare (socialstyrelsen - "the Board") and the Social Council to submit their opinions on the case, which they did on 22 and 23 March 1988, respectively.

Both opinions stressed the necessity of prohibiting removal of the children. The Social Council intended, should the appeal be dismissed, to ask for the custody of the children to be transferred to their respective foster parents.

The Board, for its part, pointed out that, having regard to the long duration of the placement of the children in foster homes and to the limited contacts they had had, further contacts must be arranged under such conditions as would make the children feel secure and would recognise their attachment to and feelings of security in the foster homes. Referring to the child psychiatrists' and the psychologist's reports, the Board made mainly the same observations as those mentioned above (see paragraphs 12 and 14). It further noted, with regard to Thomas, that whilst it would take time for a child of his character to build up confidence in adults, his foster mother had succeeded in creating an environment in which he could feel confident. With regard to Helena, the Board also stated that she had reached a phase of puberty and emancipation, the normal course of which might be disturbed if she were forced to leave the foster home.

The Board further stressed that the relationship between the natural parents and the children was of decisive importance for the question of removal where, as in this case, the children had been placed in foster homes for long periods of time. In order to bring about a good relationship, co-operation between - on the one hand - the applicants and - on the other hand - the social welfare authorities and the foster parents was essential. It appeared from the case-file that the applicants' lawyer had not sought to achieve such co-operation, which was unfortunate for the children. It had had the consequence that no such relationship had been established between the children and their parents as would make it possible for the children to move to their parents without there being a serious risk of harm to the children. The Board recommended that the Social Council examine the possibility of having the custody of the children transferred to the foster parents.

17. The Supreme Administrative Court rejected the applicants' request for a hearing. With regard to the merits, in a judgment of 30 May 1988 it dismissed their claim for revocation of the prohibition on removal; it accepted, on the other hand, that the measure should be limited in time and modified the decision under appeal in such a way that the prohibition was to run until 30 June 1989. The judgment contained the following reasons:

> "When section 28 ... is applied to this case a balance must be struck between, on the one hand, respect for the [applicants'] and their children's private and family life, including the [applicants'] rights as guardians according to the Parental Code, and, on the other hand, the need to safeguard the children's health (see the third paragraph of section 2 of Chapter 1 of the Instrument of Government [regeringsformen] and sections 1 and 12 of the Social Services Act; through these provisions the protection of private and family life referred to in Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention ... can be ensured) ...

... When [public] care is terminated according to section 5 of the 1980 Act reunion should normally take place as soon as possible [and] ... needs to be prepared in an active and competent manner. Appropriate preparations should be made immediately after the care has been terminated. This should be done even if a prohibition under section 28 ... has been issued ... . The character and the extent of the preparations, as well as the time required for them, depend on the circumstances in each case; one or more suitably arranged and successful visits by the children to their parents' home must always be required. The need for a prohibition on removal of a more permanent nature can normally only be assessed after appropriate preparations have been made. It is the Social Council's responsibility to arrange the ... preparations for reuniting parents and children after the care has been terminated ... [This] responsibility includes an obligation to try persistently to make the parents and their lawyer participate, actively and in the children's best interests, in the preparations. The Social Council is not discharged from its responsibility by the mere fact that [they], by appealing against the Council's decisions or in other ways, show that they dislike measures taken by the Council or its staff. According to section 68 of the Social Services Act, the County Administrative Board should assist the Council with advice and ensure that the Council performs its tasks properly.

Pending the beginning and completion of appropriate preparations for reunion of parents and children the question of a more temporary prohibition on removal under section 28 ... may also arise. Such a prohibition should be seen as a temporary measure until the child can be separated from the foster home without any risk of harm as mentioned in that provision.

It appears from the examination of the present case that no appropriate preparations have been made to reunite the parents and the children. Instead, the time which has elapsed since the Supreme Administrative Court decided to terminate the public care seems to have been spent on litigation.

The issue whether a prohibition on removal under section 28 ... is needed in this case must therefore be examined without taking account of the effect of preparations that have been made. The Supreme Administrative Court's decision should thus concern the kind of temporary prohibition on removal that, according to what has been stated above, can be issued pending more appropriate preparatory measures.

From the examination - above all the opinion given by the Board and the medical certificates it quotes - it appears clearly that for the time being, before any preparations have been made, there is a risk which is not of a minor nature that Helena's and Thomas's physical and mental health would be harmed were they to be separated from their foster homes. Accordingly, there are sufficient reasons for a prohibition on removal under section 28 ...

As regards the duration of a prohibition on removal, the Supreme Administrative Court has in a previous decision (see Regeringsrättens Årsbok, RÅ 1984 2:78) stated inter alia the following: if, when the prohibition is issued, it is already possible to assess with sufficient certainty that there will be no such risk after a specific date - when some measures will have been taken or they will have had time to produce effects -, the prohibition must run only until that date. If, on the other hand, it is uncertain when the child could be transferred to the parents without this involving a risk which is not of a minor nature, the prohibition ought to remain in force until further notice and the question of a removal ought to be raised again at a later stage, when the risk of harming the child's health can be better assessed.

An application of this rule to the present case would mean that a prohibition on removal should remain in force until further notice. However, the circumstances of this case are different from those of the previous case, as no appropriate preparations have been made to reunite the parents and the children, owing to the serious conflict between the Social Council, on the one hand, and the parents and their lawyer, on the other. Furthermore it must be presumed in this case that only a fixed time-limit might induce the parties - without any further litigation - to co-operate in taking appropriate preparatory steps in the children's interest. If, within a certain time-limit, no such preparations have been made or their result is unacceptable, the Social Council may raise the question of a prolonged prohibition based on the circumstances pertaining at that time.

Having regard to the foregoing, the Supreme Administrative Court finds that the prohibition on removal should remain in force until 30 June 1989.

The European Court of Human Rights has, in its judgment of 24 March 1988, found that Sweden violated Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention in one respect ... . This violation concerned the implementation of the care decision and, inter alia, the fact that the children were placed in foster homes situated so far away from their parents. The issue in this case is another, namely when and on what conditions the children can be reunited with their parents in view of the termination of the care by the Supreme Administrative Court on 18 June 1987. A prohibition on removal ... is therefore not in conflict with the judgment of 24 March 1988."

3. Request to return the children in accordance with Chapter 21 of the Parental Code

18. A request made by the applicants on 10 August 1987 that Helena and Thomas be returned to them in accordance with section 7 of Chapter 21 of the Parental Code (föräldrabalken; see paragraph 71 below) had been rejected by the County Administrative Court of Gävleborg, after a hearing on 1 March 1988, by two separate judgments of 15 March 1988. The court had found that there was a not insignificant risk of harming the children's mental health by separating them from the foster homes.

In a judgment of 11 July 1988 the Administrative Court of Appeal dismissed the applicants' appeal. On 23 September 1988 the Supreme Administrative Court refused them leave to appeal.

4. Appointments of a guardian ad litem

19. In connection with the above proceedings concerning the prohibition on removal, the District Court (tingsrätten) of Gothenburg, at the Social Council's request, had appointed Mr Claes Åberg on 17 July 1987 as guardian ad litem for Helena and Thomas (section 2 of Chapter 18 of the Parental Code). The appointment had not been notified to the applicants, who had not been heard on the matter; when their representative had learned about it, on 4 August, the time-limit for appealing against it had expired.

The applicants had asked the District Court to dismiss the guardian ad litem. It had done so on 26 October, on the ground that Mr Åberg, by having applied for legal aid on the children's behalf to the County Administrative Court on 31 July, had accomplished the task for which he had been appointed.

20. On 27 October 1987 the Social Council had again asked the District Court to appoint Mr Åberg as guardian ad litem. On this occasion the court had invited the applicants to state their views before it took a decision. It had granted the request on 12 February 1988.

The applicants appealed to the Court of Appeal (hovrätten) for Western Sweden, which dismissed the appeal on 23 August 1988. On 8 November 1988 the Supreme Court (högsta domstolen) refused them leave to appeal.

5. Second set of proceedings challenging the prohibition on removal

21. On 28 September 1988 the applicants made a fresh request to the Social Council to lift the prohibition on removal, invoking - as a new circumstance - the Commission's opinion in the Eriksson v. Sweden case (annexed to the Court's judgment of 22 June 1989, Series A no. 156, pp. 38-55). The request was rejected.

22. In a judgment of 12 December 1988 the County Administrative Court dismissed an appeal by the applicants against the Social Council's decision. The court, referring to the reasoning in the Supreme Administrative Court's judgment of 30 May 1988 (see paragraph 17 above), pointed out that no appropriate preparatory measures for reunion as mentioned therein had been taken. It considered that there would still be a risk of harm to the children if the prohibition on removal were lifted.

23. A further appeal by the applicants to the Administrative Court of Appeal was rejected on 22 December 1988. It noted that Mr Olsson had met the children on 11 and 12 October 1988 at their respective foster homes and schools and that the children had visited the applicants' home on 16 and 17 December, accompanied by the foster parents. The court found, nevertheless, for the reasons expressed in the County Administrative Court's judgment, that the prohibition should be maintained.

Leave to appeal was refused by the Supreme Administrative Court on 14 February 1989.

6. Renewal of prohibition on removal and related proceedings

24. On 27 June 1989, a few days before the expiry of the prohibition on removal, the Social Council decided to renew it until further notice. Moreover, it refused a request by the applicants that the children spend their summer holidays with them in Alingsås and visit them every weekend, unaccompanied by the foster parents (see paragraph 50 below).

25. On appeal, the County Administrative Court, by judgment of 4 September 1989, confirmed the prohibition on removal but decided that it was to run only until 31 March 1990. The court again relied on the reasoning in the Supreme Administrative Court's judgment of 30 May 1988 and noted, moreover, that few measures had been taken in preparation for removal. It was highly unsatisfactory that, as long as two years after the termination of the public care, the conditions for executing that decision had not been fulfilled. The court considered that reasons still existed for maintaining the prohibition on removal and that, accordingly, the Swedish judiciary and public authorities had failed in this respect. Even though the applicants and their lawyer had not contributed to a desirable extent to facilitating the children's reunion with their parents, the main responsibility for doing this lay with the Social Council, which, as stressed by the court, also had a duty to implement judgments.

26. Both the applicants and the Social Council appealed to the Administrative Court of Appeal; the applicants sought to have the prohibition lifted, whereas the Social Council asked for it to be maintained until further notice. By judgment of 23 January 1990 the court confirmed the lower court's decision, but extended the time-limit for the prohibition until 1 August 1990.

The applicants were refused leave to appeal by the Supreme Administrative Court on 8 March 1990.

7. Further renewal of the prohibition on removal and related proceedings

27. The Social Council asked the County Administrative Court, on 12 July 1990, to issue a new prohibition on removal, to be effective until further notice. By judgment of 27 July 1990, the court renewed the prohibition until 28 February 1991. It noted that no preparatory measures with a view to reuniting the children and the parents had been taken; such measures were necessary in view of the atmosphere of hostility that existed between the parties to the proceedings, which was detrimental to Helena and Thomas. There were therefore good reasons to maintain the prohibition on removal. The need for this measure was also shown by the fact that the question of a transfer of the custody of the children to the foster parents was scheduled for examination by the District Court in the autumn (see paragraphs 53-54 below).

The applicants lodged an appeal against this judgment with the Administrative Court of Appeal. They have apparently asked the court to stay the proceedings pending the final outcome of those concerning the transfer of custody.

D. The applicants' access to the children subsequent to the entry into force of the prohibition on removal

28. Prior to the termination of the public care of Helena and Thomas on 18 June 1987, the applicants' contacts with the children had been sparse. Access had, since February 1983, been restricted to one visit every third month in the foster homes. However, no such visits occurred during the period from June 1984 until April 1987, when Mr Olsson and the elder son Stefan visited them (for further details, see the above-mentioned Olsson I judgment, pp. 15-16, paras. 21, 24-26). It does not appear that any formal decision with regard to access was taken in connection with the decision of 23 June 1987 to prohibit the applicants from removing Helena and Thomas from the foster homes.

1. Particulars concerning the applicants' access to Helena and Thomas

29. Since the prohibition on removal was imposed on 23 June 1987, the following meetings have taken place between the applicants and Helena and Thomas:

(a) 22 July 1988: a meeting of a few hours in a park in Gothenburg, the children being accompanied by one of the foster parents;

(b) 11 and 12 October 1988: visits by Mr Olsson in the foster homes;

(c) 16 and 17 December 1988: visits by the children, accompanied by the foster mothers, in the applicants' home, the night being spent in a hotel;

(d) 8 and 9 April 1989: visits by the applicants in the foster homes;

(e) 16 and 17 June 1989: visits by the children, accompanied by the foster mothers, in the applicants' home, the night being spent in a hotel.

2. Access claims and related proceedings

30. Shortly after the decision of 23 June 1987 to prohibit removal, the applicants, through their lawyer, asked the social welfare authorities to arrange for Helena and Thomas to visit them in their home in Gothenburg. By letter of 27 October 1987 from the social welfare officer, they were advised that they should first visit the children so that they could get to know them better and prepare for a visit by the children in Gothenburg together with the foster parents. Subject to prior consultation with the foster parents, the applicants were free to decide on the further arrangements for visits in the foster homes. Finally, the letter indicated a possibility of refunding travel and subsistence expenses incurred by the applicants in connection with their visits.

Throughout the autumn of 1987, there was an exchange of letters between the applicants' lawyer and the social welfare authorities - mainly the Chief District Officer - on the question of access. Whilst the applicants insisted that the children visit them without the foster parents, the Chief District Officer, referring to the justifications for the prohibition on removal, maintained that since Mrs Olsson had not met the children since 1984, both applicants should first visit them in their respective foster home environment. Moreover, in the event of a visit by the children in the applicants' home, at least one of the foster parents should be present.

31. On 18 December 1987 the Chairman of the Social Council refused a request by the applicants to visit Helena and Thomas without the foster parents being present. She found no reason to amend the Chief District Officer's decision on the matter. On 21 December the Social Council was informed of the refusal; it decided to take note of it but did not take any specific measures.

32. The applicants appealed against the Chairman's decision to the County Administrative Court, asking it to confer on them a right of access as requested. In a decision of 8 March 1988, the court found that it was not possible to appeal, under section 73 of the Social Services Act (see paragraph 60 below), against measures prescribed by the Social Council as to the manner, time and place of access and refused the appeal.

On 29 April 1988 the Administrative Court of Appeal upheld that judgment, noting that the Chairman's decision had not been taken under section 28 of that Act and did not fall into any other category of measures which could be appealed against pursuant to section 73.

33. The applicants then proceeded with an appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court, alleging that the Chairman's decision of 18 December 1987 was unlawful and that the absence of a right of appeal against it constituted a violation of Article 13 (art. 13) of the Convention. The court granted leave to appeal and, in a decision (beslut) of 18 July 1988, refused the appeal. It stated:

> "Under section 16 of the [1980 Act] ..., a Social Council may restrict the right of access in respect of children taken into public care under this Act. As regards the right of access to children while a prohibition on removal is in force, no similar power has been vested in the Social Council in the relevant legislation. As there is no legal provision empowering the Social Council to restrict the right of access while the prohibition on removal is in force ..., the instructions given by the Chairman of the Social Council in order to limit the right of access have no legal effect. Nor can any right of appeal be inferred from general principles of administrative law or from the European Convention on Human Rights."

34. On 15 August 1988 the applicants lodged a municipal appeal (kommunalbesvär; see paragraph 63 below) with the Administrative Court of Appeal against the Chairman's decision of 18 December 1987. The court found that that decision could not form the object of a municipal appeal and that, in so far as the appeal might be considered as directed against the Social Council's failure to take any specific measures when informed of the decision (see paragraph 31 above), it was out of time. The appeal was thus dismissed on 10 October 1988.

35. In the meantime, on 21 March and 11 April 1988, the social welfare authorities had rejected requests by the applicants' lawyer that Helena and Thomas be allowed to attend their grandmother's funeral and a special burial ceremony and, in this connection, stay for one night at the applicants' home. The social welfare authorities had pointed, inter alia, to the fact that the children hardly knew their grandmother and to the need to arrange contacts in an environment in which the children could feel safe and confident.

36. In June and July 1988 the social welfare officer contacted the applicants and arranged for talks involving Mr Olsson and the foster parents, to plan the meeting which took place in Gothenburg on 22 July 1988 (see paragraph 29 above). Mrs Olsson did not participate in these preparations, as she insisted on having access on her own terms. However, as suggested by the social welfare officer, Helena's foster mother was invited to the applicants' home after a preparatory meeting. On one occasion the officer asked Mr Olsson for his and his wife's telephone number in order to facilitate contacts, but he declined to give it.

After the meeting on 22 July 1988, Mr Olsson told the social welfare authorities that he had been disappointed; he had felt that he was being watched and controlled and Helena had called her foster mother "mummy".

37. On 8 August 1988 the social welfare authorities dismissed a request made by the applicants on 2 August that Helena and Thomas be allowed to join them - on 5 August or at the latest on 8 August - for the rest of the summer holidays, on the ground that meetings should be arranged in such a way as not to jeopardise the children's health and development.

38. On 11 August 1988 the applicants' lawyer demanded that the children be permitted to visit them every weekend and school holiday until 30 June 1989. At a meeting with two social welfare officers on 17 August 1988, Mr Olsson showed understanding of the view that such visits were not appropriate and stated that he would recommend a "soft line" in the efforts to bring about suitable access. On his suggestion, the next meetings were planned to take place in the foster homes in October. On 18 August the Social Council rejected the request of 11 August.

39. On 19 August 1988 the applicants' lawyer reiterated the request for access at weekends. In reply, the social welfare officer informed her of the discussion with Mr Olsson on 17 August (see paragraph 38 above). A few days later, Mr Olsson told social welfare officers that he was dissatisfied, on account of their attempts to delay access as much as possible. They reminded him that he had himself proposed that the next meeting with the children should be in October. The meetings were held on 11 and 12 October 1988 (see paragraph 29 above). On this occasion the social welfare authorities booked and paid for air tickets and hotel rooms for two persons, but Mrs Olsson declined to go.

3. Access plan

40. On 7 December 1988 the Chief District Officer recommended an access plan to the Social Council. The recommendation referred, inter alia, to two expert opinions, one by Chief Doctor Jonsson and another by Chief Doctor Finney and the psychologist, Mr Löthman, dated 10 and 12 October 1988, dealing specifically with the question of access. The former noted, with respect to Helena, that it was important to place emphasis on her own wishes, to improve her possibilities of knowing about her natural parents and to arrange the access in a manner which would make it an everyday event; she should meet the applicants together with the foster parents. The latter opinion stressed, with regard to Thomas, that access should be resumed only if he so wished to which end certain preparatory measures aimed at motivating him should be made - and only if meetings were attended by the foster parents. It was essential that the natural parents and the foster parents co-operate in the child's best interests.

The plan envisaged access as follows:

(a) on 16 and 17 December 1988: visit by the children, accompanied by the foster mothers, in the applicants' home; if this was successful:

(b) visit by the applicants in the foster homes over two days in February 1989; if this went well:

(c) visit by the applicants to Thomas in his foster home and to Helena, if she so wishes, in April 1989; again, if this went well:

(d) visit similar to that mentioned at (a), to be organised over a few days in June 1989 with a possibility of letting the children choose to spend the night at the applicants' home rather than at a hotel, provided that the foster mother accompany them;

(e) in addition to the above, the applicants should be able to arrange visits by agreement with the foster parents.

41. The applicants met Helena and Thomas as envisaged at (a) and, on 20 December 1988, the Social Council adopted the plan. It was communicated to the applicants and their lawyer for comments, but they objected to it.

4. Further access claims

42. During 1989 and 1990 the applicants, through their lawyer, continued to make a large number of requests for access; in particular, they demanded that the children visit them during weekends at their own home and without the foster parents being present.

Several of these requests were refused by the social welfare authorities for such reasons as the children being opposed to visiting the parents and wishing to be visited by them instead (letters of 27 September 1989 and 7 February 1990) or too short notice having been given to organise the visits (letters of 28 March and 13 September 1989) or indications by Mr Olsson that he would give the children a certain period to reflect on the matter during which he would not claim access (letter of 11 October 1989).

Moreover, the social welfare authorities dismissed on 21 April and 26 May 1989 requests that Helena and Thomas attend the birthday celebrations of their grandfather and their brother Stefan. In the former case, regard was had to the fact that Helena did not wish to go and, in the latter case, to the fact that the date in question was inconvenient, being the last day of the school year.

Furthermore, on 21 March 1989 the Social Council refused access for the purposes of a medical examination, which the applicants had requested in order to obtain a medical certificate to be used in the proceedings before the Commission. The decision was based on an opinion by the Board that further examination of the children might be harmful to them and would be of no assistance in those proceedings.

43. In a report of 30 May 1989 to the social welfare authorities, Chief Doctor Finney recommended that access should continue to some extent between the applicants and Thomas and should be arranged in his foster home, not in the applicants' home. A similar view was expressed by the psychologist, Mr Löthman, in his report of the same date. According to a report of 13 June supplied by Chief Doctor Jonsson to the social authorities, Helena found that travelling to the applicants' home was a trying experience and preferred being visited by them. In his view, contacts served to fulfil her need to be kept informed about the applicants.

The Chief District Officer, in a report of 15 June 1989, made the following assessment of the question of access. Having regard to the fact that visits by the children in the applicants' home would not only conflict with expert opinions but were also not welcomed by the children, access arrangements should primarily consist of the parents visiting the children in the foster homes. However, should the children express an interest in visiting the applicants, the social welfare authorities would assist in arranging such contacts. In the light of these considerations, the Chief District Officer adopted a plan for visits by the parents in August and October 1989 and then by the children in December 1989. The applicants were invited to contact the social welfare authorities on the matter, but did not do so. The reason for this, as later explained by Mr Olsson, was that on a previous occasion he had not been received properly by the social welfare officer responsible for their case.

44. By letter of 16 November 1989, the applicants again asked for the children to be allowed to visit them every weekend; they also sought permission, firstly, for themselves and their son Stefan to visit the children in one of the foster homes without the foster parents being present and, secondly, for their lawyer to meet Helena and Thomas to inform them of the applicants' and Stefan's situation and to explain to them why they had been taken into public care and why the applicants did not wish to visit them in the foster homes in the foster parents' presence.

The Head of the Social Service (socialförvaltningen) in Gothenburg replied by letter of 20 November 1989 that the social welfare officer would contact them as soon as possible with a view to making a suitable arrangement for their next meeting with the children.

45. On 21 November 1989 the social welfare authorities received a letter from the applicants' lawyer reiterating the claims of 16 November. A further letter was received on 22 December, requesting access to the children in one of the foster homes in the absence of the foster parents. In reply to the latter, the social welfare authorities informed the lawyer on 27 December that they would contact the foster parents directly on the matter.

46. On 21 December 1989 the applicants had reported the officer in charge of their case to the Public Prosecution Authority (åklagarmyndigheten) of Gothenburg for misuse of power and asked for her immediate arrest. The reason for this action was her failure to comply with their request of 16 November 1989. On 30 January 1990 the Public Prosecution Authority discontinued the criminal investigation, finding no indication that a criminal offence had been committed.

47. In a letter dated 25 January 1990, the social welfare authorities invited the applicants to talks in order to find a solution to the problem of access but, by letter received on 1 February from the applicants' lawyer, they were advised that such talks would serve no purpose.

48. In response to letters from the applicants' lawyer, dated 13 February and 2 March 1990 and mainly reiterating their requests made in November and December 1989, the social welfare authorities, by letter of 8 March, pointed out that they were not opposed to meetings; they invited the applicants to contact the foster parents to make arrangements, failing which the applicants would be contacted by the latter.

49. On 14 May 1990 the applicants' lawyer demanded that the children be left to be met by the parents at Gothenburg airport on certain specified dates and, on 5 June, she requested that this be arranged every weekend. In the meantime, on 17 May, the social welfare authorities had replied that Thomas's foster mother would write to them and had also asked the applicants to contact the foster parents by telephone, as the former had a secret telephone number. On 6 June the lawyer asked the Social Council to grant - immediately after 1 July (the date of the entry into force of the 1990 Act; see paragraphs 64 and 67 below) - access every weekend at the applicants' own home and in the absence of the foster parents.

In this connection, the Chief District Officer submitted to the Social Council a report, dated 2 July 1990, making observations similar to those in her report of 15 June 1989 (see paragraph 43 above) and recommending that the request be dismissed. The report noted, inter alia, that since the meeting in June 1989, the children had become strongly opposed to visiting their parents but were open to being visited by them. The applicants' demands as to the forms of access had had the effect of increasing the gap between them and the children.

On 4 September 1990 the Social Council dismissed the applicants' request for access every weekend at their own home, finding that access should instead take place in the foster homes in conformity with the children's wishes.

5. Further proceedings concerning access

50. The applicants' lawyer, in her capacity as a member of the municipality of Gothenburg, filed two municipal appeals (see paragraph 63 below) with the Administrative Court of Appeal: one was against the Social Council's decision of 27 June 1989 (see paragraph 24 above) in so far as it concerned access and the other against its decision of 20 December 1988 adopting an access plan (see paragraphs 40-41 above).

With regard to the first appeal, the court found, by judgment of 8 January 1990, that the contested part of the Social Council's decision of 27 June 1989 was unlawful and annulled it.

As to the second appeal, the court held, in another judgment of the same date, that the adoption of the plan formed part of the measures considered necessary by the Social Council in order to permit removal of the children without there being any risk of harm to them. The plan was not a formal decision on the applicants' right of access, especially since it provided that they could visit the children in accordance with the latter's wishes.

On 8 March and 27 December 1990, respectively, the Supreme Administrative Court refused the applicants' lawyer leave to appeal against the second judgment and the Social Council leave to appeal against the first.

51. Moreover, on 28 July 1989 the applicants complained to the Parliamentary Ombudsman (justitieombudsmannen) who, in an opinion of 2 May 1990, stated, inter alia, that it appeared from the examination of the case that the Social Council had acted solely out of consideration for the children. In view of this fact and of the lacunae in the Social Services Act 1980 on the question of regulation of access (see paragraph 62 below) - which had led to legislative amendments in 1990 (see paragraphs 64 and 67 below) -, she declared the matter closed.

52. The applicants also lodged an appeal with the County Administrative Court against the Social Council's decision of 4 September 1990 (see paragraph 49 above). It was dismissed by judgment of 12 December 1990. The court found that the applicants' allegation that the foster parents had influenced the children against their natural parents was not borne out by the investigations in the case; on the contrary, they showed that the children wished to meet their parents, albeit on their terms. Moreover, the sort of access requested did not take the children's interests into account and would not benefit them. There was therefore no ground for allowing access during weekends, as requested by the applicants. The court did not examine their claim for access during school holidays as this had not been dealt with by the Social Council.

The applicants further appealed to the Administrative Court of Appeal. They appear to have asked the court to keep their appeal in abeyance pending the outcome of the transfer of custody proceedings (see paragraphs 53-54 below).

E. Transfer of custody

53. Although the present judgment is not concerned with the question of transfer of custody, the decisions by the Swedish authorities on the matter are described below in so far as they may shed light on the case.

The Social Council decided on 31 October 1989 to institute proceedings in the District Court of Alingsås for a transfer of the custody of Helena and Thomas to their respective foster parents. After holding a preliminary hearing on 27 February 1990, the court, by judgment of 24 January 1991, transferred the custody. It ordered that the applicants should each year receive three day-time visits from the children at their home and be able to visit them at the foster homes for three weekends.

54. The applicants appealed against the District Court's judgment to the Court of Appeal for Western Sweden. The latter held a hearing at which it took evidence from two welfare officers who had been responsible for the case, the children's respective foster parents, Chief Doctors Jonsson and Finney, as well as Helena and a contact person (kontaktman) of hers within the social services. The applicants maintained, inter alia, that the foster parents were unsuited as custodians. In particular, they contended that they had learned after the District Court judgment that Helena's foster father, Mr Larsson, had been charged in 1986-87 with assault, including sexual assault, and sexual exploitation of a minor, namely another foster girl called "Birgitta". Mr Larsson had been acquitted by Hudiksvall District Court due to lack of evidence. However, he had stated during the police investigations that he had acted in a manner which, according to the applicants, constituted sexual assault, although it had not been covered by the charges. The public prosecutor had appealed against the acquittal but had subsequently withdrawn the appeal.

By judgment of 24 January 1992, the Court of Appeal upheld the Alingsås District Court's judgment. It stated, inter alia, that, having regard to Helena's and Thomas's age and degree of maturity, great importance should be attached to their views about the questions of custody and access. It was clear that they both wanted to remain in their foster homes. Moreover, contacts between the applicants and the children had been very infrequent, especially in recent years. According to the applicants, they had been prevented from exercising their right of access partly because they had previously felt unwelcome and been badly treated by the foster parents, and partly because the social welfare authorities had been opposed to providing financial assistance for journeys to meet the children. However, these allegations were refuted by the social welfare officers and the foster parents. In the view of the Court of Appeal, the absence of contacts was due rather to lack of desire and initiative on the part of the applicants to visit the children. In addition, the applicants had kept their telephone number secret.

The claim that the foster parents were unsuited as custodians was mainly directed against Helena's foster father, Mr Larsson. The court found that when giving evidence before it, he had left an impression of reliability and honesty, despite the fact that he must have been under pressure due to his wife's illness and the manner in which he was questioned by the applicants' lawyer. Further, the court observed that the conditions in the Larssons' home had been examined carefully on a number of occasions during the relevant period; Helena had good contacts with people in her environment and had since recently had a contact person who had been heard by the court; moreover, she had visited the applicants on her own in March 1991: on no occasion had she said that she had been assaulted by Mr Larsson or shown any sign to this effect. At the hearing before the court, she had emphatically denied that he had behaved improperly towards her. The court found that there was no evidence to support the allegation that Helena had been, or ran a risk of being, a victim of improper conduct on the part of Mr Larsson. As regards Mrs Larsson's illness, the Court of Appeal noted that she spent most of her time at home and that both Mr Larsson's and Helena's statements indicated that the emotional ties between Helena and Mrs Larsson had been strengthened, rather than weakened, since she became ill. The illness could thus not constitute an obstacle to the transfer of custody. Finally, the investigations provided no evidence to suggest that Thomas's foster parents, Mr and Mrs Bäckius, were unsuited. On the contrary, what emerged in the proceedings was that both children were well cared for in the foster homes, in a secure and stimulating environment.

A further appeal by the applicants to the Supreme Court is currently pending.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW

A. The Child Welfare Act 1960 and the 1980 legislation replacing it

55. Decisions concerning the applicants' children were based on the Child Welfare Act 1960 (barnavårdslagen 1960:97 - "the 1960 Act"), the Social Services Act 1980 (socialtjänstlagen 1980:620) and the 1980 Act containing Special Provisions on the Care of Young Persons (lagen 1980: 621 med särskilda bestämmelser om vård av unga - "the 1980 Act").

The Social Services Act 1980 contains provisions regarding supportive and preventive measures effected with the approval of the individuals concerned. The 1980 Act (1980:621), which provided for compulsory care measures, complemented the Social Services Act 1980; when they entered into force on 1 January 1982, they replaced the 1960 Act. In general, decisions taken under the 1960 Act, which were still in force on 31 December 1981, were considered to have been taken under the 1980 Act. As from 1 July 1990 the relevant legislation has been amended (see paragraphs 64-67 below).

56. It is primarily the responsibility of the municipalities to promote a positive development for the young. For this purpose each municipality has a Social Council, composed of lay members assisted by a staff of professional social workers.

1. Prohibition on removal

57. The Social Council could, after the termination of public care (for details of the Swedish law on compulsory care, see the Olsson I judgment, pp. 20-27, paras. 35-50), issue a prohibition on removal under section 28 of the Social Services Act, which read as follows:

> "The Social Council may for a certain period of time or until further notice prohibit the guardian of a minor from > taking the minor from a home referred to in section 25 [i.e. a foster home], if there is a risk, which is not of a minor nature, of harming the child's physical or mental health if separated from that home.

> If there are reasonable grounds to assume that there is such a risk, although the necessary investigations have not been completed, a temporary prohibition may be issued for a maximum period of four weeks, pending the final decision in the matter.
> A prohibition issued under this section does not prevent a removal of the child from the home on the basis of a decision under Chapter 21 of the Parental Code."

The preparatory work (Prop. 1979/80:1, p. 541) relevant to this provision mentioned that a purely passing disturbance or other occasional disadvantage to the child was not sufficient ground for issuing a prohibition on removal. It stated that the factors to be considered when deciding whether or not to issue such a prohibition included the child's age, degree of development, character, emotional ties and present and prospective living conditions, as well as the time he had been cared for away from the parents and his contacts with them while separated. If the child had reached the age of 15, his own preference should not be opposed without good reasons; if he was younger, it was still an important factor to be taken into account.

The Standing Social Committee of the Parliament stated in its report (Socialutskottets betänkande 1979/80:44, p. 78), inter alia, that a prohibition might be issued if removal could involve a risk of harm to the child's physical or mental health, thus even where no serious objections existed in regard to the guardian. The Committee also stressed that the provision was aimed at safeguarding the best interests of the child and that those interests must prevail whenever they conflicted with the guardian's interest in deciding the domicile of the child. It also took as its point of departure the assumption that a separation generally involved a risk of harm to the child. Repeated transfers and transfers which took place after a long time, when the child had developed strong links with the foster home, should thus not be accepted without good reasons: the child's need for secure relations and living conditions should be decisive.

58. According to the case-law of the Supreme Administrative Court (RÅ 1984 2:78), while a prohibition on removal is in force, the Social Council is under a duty to ensure that appropriate measures aimed at reuniting parents and child are taken without delay.

59. Section 28 of the Social Services Act did not apply to children who were being cared for in foster homes under section 1 of the 1980 Act. As long as such care continued, the right of the guardian to determine the domicile of the child was suspended. Whilst that right in principle revived on the termination of such care, it could be further suspended by an application of section 28 by the social welfare authorities.

60. Under section 73 of the Social Services Act, a decision taken under section 28 could be appealed to the administrative courts. In practice, besides the natural parents both the child concerned and the foster parents have been allowed to lodge such appeals. In the proceedings before the administrative courts, a special guardian may be appointed to protect the interests of the child, should these come into conflict with those of the child's legal guardian.

2. Regulation of access

61. While a child was in public care under the 1980 Act, the Social Council was empowered to impose restrictions on the parents' right of access to him, in so far as necessary for the purposes of the care decision (section 16). Such restrictions could be appealed against to the administrative courts by both the parents and the child.

62. The legal position concerning restrictions on access during a prohibition on removal was different. As held by the Supreme Administrative Court on 18 July 1988, a decision by the Social Council to restrict the access rights of Mr and Mrs Olsson - who were the appellants in that case - while a prohibition on removal under section 28 of the Social Services Act was in force had no legal effect and no appeal to the administrative courts would lie against such a decision (see paragraph 33 above).

3. Municipal appeal

63. Pursuant to sections 1 and 2 of Chapter 7 of the 1977 Municipal Act (kommunallagen 1977:179), a member (medlem, e.g. a resident) of a municipality may lodge a municipal appeal (kommunalbesvär) with the Administrative Court of Appeal against decisions by municipalities on the following grounds: failure to observe the statutory procedures, infringement of the law, ultra vires conduct, violation of the complainant's own rights, or other unfairness. The appeal has to be filed within three weeks from the date on which approval of the minutes of the decision has been announced on the municipal notice-board. If the court upholds the appeal, it may quash the decision, but not give a new decision.

B. New legislation

64. The provisions of the Social Services Act which related to a prohibition on removal are now contained, in amended form, in the 1990 Act with Special Provisions on the Care of Young Persons (lagen 1990:52 med särskilda bestämmelser om vård av unga - "the 1990 Act"). This entered into force on 1 July 1990.

65. Section 24 of the 1990 Act, which corresponds to the previous section 28 of the Social Services Act (see paragraph 57 above), provides that the County Administrative Court may, on application by the Social Council, impose a prohibition on removal for a certain time or until further notice. The condition for such a prohibition is that there must be > "an apparent risk (påtaglig risk) that the young person's health and development will be harmed if he is separated from the home".

Although this wording differs from that of section 28 of the 1980 Act, it was not intended, according to the preparatory work (Prop. 1989/90:28, p. 83), to introduce a new standard.

66. According to section 26 of the 1990 Act, the Social Council shall, at least once every three months, consider whether a prohibition on removal is still necessary. If it is not, it shall lift the prohibition.

67. Pursuant to section 31, the Social Council may decide to regulate the parents' access to the child if it is necessary in view of the purposes of the prohibition on removal. Such decisions may, under section 41, be appealed against to the administrative courts.

C. The Parental Code

68. Chapter 21 of the Parental Code deals with the enforcement of judgments or decisions regarding custody and other related matters.

69. Section 1 specifies that actions for the enforcement of judgments or decisions by the ordinary courts concerning the custody or surrender of children or access to them are to be instituted before the County Administrative Court.

70. According to section 5, enforcement may not take place against the will of a child who has reached the age of 12 unless the County Administrative Court finds enforcement to be necessary in the child's best interests.

71. Under section 7, if the child is staying with someone other than the person entitled to custody, the child's custodian may, even when no judgment or decision as described in section 1 exists, seek from the County Administrative Court an order for the transfer of the child to him. Such an order may be refused if the best interests of the child require that the question of custody be examined by the ordinary courts.

When taking decisions under this section, the County Administrative Court shall also observe the requirements laid down in section 5 (see paragraph 70 above).

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

72. In their application of 23 October 1987 to the Commission (no. 13441/87), Mr and Mrs Olsson alleged a series of violations of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention on the ground, inter alia, that the Swedish social welfare authorities had hindered their reunion with Helena and Thomas and had prevented the applicants from having access to them. They also complained of a number of breaches of Article 6 (art. 6) and, in addition, invoked Articles 13 and 53 (art. 13, art. 53).

73. On 7 May 1990 the Commission declared the application admissible.

In its report dated 17 April 1991 (Article 31) (art. 31), the Commission expressed the opinion:

(a) unanimously, that there had been a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) on the ground that the restrictions on access were not "in accordance with the law";

(b) by seventeen votes to three, that there had been a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) with regard to the prohibition on removal;

(c) unanimously, that there had been a violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) on the ground that the applicants did not have access to court to challenge the restrictions on access to the children;

(d) by fourteen votes to six, that there had been no violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) as a result of the duration of the proceedings concerning the termination of the public care of Stefan, Helena and Thomas;

(e) by nineteen votes to one, that there had been no violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) with regard to the duration of the proceedings under Chapter 21 of the Parental Code;

(f) by nineteen votes to one, that there had been no violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) on the ground that the Supreme Administrative Court did not hold a hearing on the applicants' appeal concerning the prohibition on removal;

(g) unanimously, that there had been no violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) in relation to the first appointment of a guardian ad litem;

(h) unanimously, that there had been no violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) as a result of the duration of the proceedings relating to the second appointment of a guardian ad litem;

(i) unanimously, that it was not necessary to examine whether there had been a violation of Article 13 (art. 13) in respect of the restrictions on access;

(j) unanimously, that there had been no violation of Article 13 (art. 13) in respect of the first appointment of a guardian ad litem.

The full text of the Commission's opinion and the dissenting opinion contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to the present judgment*.

FINAL SUBMISSIONS MADE TO THE COURT BY THE GOVERNMENT

74. At the hearing on 22 April 1992, the Government confirmed the final submission in their memorial admitting violations of the Convention in that, for a certain period, the restrictions on access decided by the Social Council were not "in accordance with the law" and that the applicants had not had a court remedy in respect of those restrictions. On the other hand, they invited the Court to hold that there had been no violation of the Convention in the present case other than those admitted by them.

AS TO THE LAW

I. SCOPE OF THE CASE BEFORE THE COURT

75. The present application of 23 October 1987, as declared admissible by the Commission, raised a series of complaints as to (1) the prohibition on removal, its maintenance in force and the restrictions on the applicants' access to the children while the prohibition was in force; (2) the length of certain specific domestic proceedings and the lack of a hearing on appeal; and (3) alleged violations of the right of access to a court or to an effective remedy with respect to certain decisions (see the Commission's decision on admissibility, under the heading "Complaints", and paragraphs 95 and 176-185 of its report).

In their subsequent pleadings, the applicants appeared to raise a number of further complaints relating to (a) the decision to transfer custody of Helena and Thomas to their respective foster parents (see paragraphs 53-54 above); (b) the independence and impartiality of the courts which made or upheld this decision; and (c) the total length of the national proceedings (which had started in 1980 and were not yet terminated).

These new complaints were, however, not covered by the Commission's decision on admissibility. It is true that, on certain conditions, the rule that the scope of the Court's jurisdiction is determined by the Commission's admissibility decision may be subject to qualifications (see, inter alia, the Olsson I judgment, p. 28, para. 56), but the complaints in question do not meet those conditions. The Court therefore has no jurisdiction to entertain them.

Accordingly, it will not go into the applicants' circumstantial allegations before the Court to the effect that the foster parents of Helena and Thomas were for various reasons unsuited as carers. The Court presumes, as the Government evidently did, that these allegations were made solely in support of the complaints made by the applicants in respect of the transfer of custody proceedings. The Court notes, however, that the allegations were rejected after careful examination by the Court of Appeal for Western Sweden in those proceedings (see paragraph 54 above).

II. ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF ARTICLE 8 (art. 8) OF THE CONVENTION

A. Introduction

76. The applicants' complaints under Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention concerned the period from 18 June 1987, when the public care of Helena and Thomas was terminated (see paragraph 10 above), to 24 January 1991, when the custody of these children was transferred to their respective foster parents (see paragraphs 53-54 above). The applicants contended that the prohibition on removal, its maintenance in force and the restrictions on access had given rise to breaches of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention, which provides as follows:

"1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

The Government admitted that there had been a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) in that until 1 July 1990 the restrictions on access had no basis in domestic law, but otherwise contested the applicants' allegations. The Commission reached a corresponding conclusion with respect to the restrictions on access, but also expressed the opinion that the maintenance in force of the prohibition on removal, without any meaningful contact between the applicants and their children being established and without any other effective measure to resolve the existing problems, constituted a violation of Article 8 (art. 8).

B. Was there an interference with the applicants' right to respect for family life?

77. The prohibition on removal and its maintenance in force, as well as the restrictions on access, clearly constituted, and this was not disputed, interferences with the applicants' right to respect for family life (see, amongst other authorities, the above-mentioned Eriksson judgment, Series A no. 156, p. 24, para. 58).

Such interference entails a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) unless it is "in accordance with the law", has an aim or aims that is or are legitimate under Article 8 para. 2 (art. 8-2) and is "necessary in a democratic society" for the aforesaid aim or aims (ibid.).

C. Were the interferences justified?

1. "In accordance with the law"

78. In the applicants' submission, the measures taken by the Swedish authorities had, contrary to Swedish law, been intended to prevent them from being reunited with Helena and Thomas and from having appropriate access to them. On the other hand, the applicants did not seem to question the lawfulness of access restrictions imposed after the entry into force of the 1990 Act on 1 July 1990 (see paragraph 67 above).

(a) Prohibition on removal

79. The Court observes that the prohibition on removal and its maintenance in force were based until July 1990 on section 28 of the Social Services Act 1980 and then on section 24 of the 1990 Act, which replaced section 28. Furthermore, it does not appear from the material before the Court that these measures were motivated by any considerations other than those mentioned in the relevant provisions, namely the protection of the children's health. There is no evidence for the contention that they were taken in order to prevent the reunion of Helena and Thomas with their parents.

Moreover, the measures had been upheld on appeals to, or been renewed by, the administrative courts, albeit in some instances subject to certain time-limits (see paragraphs 14-17, 22-23 and 25-27 above). In this connection, it is to be recalled that it is primarily for the national authorities, notably the courts, to interpret and apply domestic law (see, inter alia, the Margareta and Roger Andersson v. Sweden judgment of 25 February 1992, Series A no. 226-A, pp. 27-28, para. 82).

80. Having regard to the foregoing, the Court, like the Commission and the Government, considers that the prohibition on removal and its maintenance in force were "in accordance with the law".

(b) Restrictions on access

81. On the other hand, according to an authoritative interpretation of Swedish law by the Supreme Administrative Court in the present case, the imposition of restrictions on access while a prohibition on removal under the Social Services Act 1980 was in force lacked any legal effect, as there was then no legal provision on which such restrictions could be based (see paragraph 33 above and the above-mentioned Eriksson judgment, Series A no. 156, p. 25, para. 65). This situation lasted from 23 June 1987 to 1 July 1990, when the 1990 Act entered into force. During this period, the impugned restrictions - as conceded by the Government - were not "in accordance with the law" for the purposes of Article 8 (art. 8).

82. There has accordingly been a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention in so far as concerns the restrictions on access between 23 June 1987 and 1 July 1990.

2. Legitimate aim

83. According to the applicants, the aim of the contested measures was to prevent their reunion with Helena and Thomas. Moreover, they claimed that they had not been allowed to meet them on their own because the social welfare authorities and the foster parents had been afraid that the children might disclose information about unsatisfactory living conditions in the foster homes.

84. However, as already stated above (see paragraph 79), there is no evidence that the purpose of the prohibition on removal and its maintenance in force was to hinder reunion; the Court shares the view of the Commission and the Government that this measure was aimed at protecting the children's "health" and "rights and freedoms".

85. The Court considers that on this occasion it should examine the aims of all the restrictions on access, irrespective of their periods of application. It does not find it established that any of them was aimed at preventing the family's reunion or the disclosure of information of the kind indicated by the applicants. On the contrary, it is convinced that they pursued the same legitimate aims as the measures referred to in paragraph 84 above.

3. "Necessary in a democratic society"

86. According to the applicants, the interferences were not "necessary in a democratic society". The Government contested this allegation but the Commission accepted it.

87. In exercising its supervisory jurisdiction the Court must determine whether the reasons given for the prohibition on removal, its maintenance in force until the transfer of custody and the restrictions on access which were in operation throughout this period were "relevant and sufficient" in the light of the case as a whole (see the Olsson I judgment, p. 32, para. 68). This determination must start with the Social Council's decision of 23 June 1987 - immediately after the Supreme Administrative Court's judgment of 18 June 1987 terminating the public care - to prohibit removal of Helena and Thomas from their respective foster homes.

That decision - which was unanimously upheld, at three levels, by administrative courts which had the benefit of reports from child psychiatrists and a psychologist as well as from specialised agencies was essentially based on the consideration that separating the children from their foster homes would, in the circumstances obtaining at the time, involve a serious risk of harm to the children's physical and mental health (see paragraphs 12-17 above).

The prohibition on removal order must be evaluated against the following background which appears from the file.

Helena and Thomas had been cared for in the foster homes for a long period that had begun at the end of 1980, in fact for most of their lives. Their contacts with their natural parents had been very sparse indeed: they had not met their mother since 1984, they had since seen their father only once and there had been no other contacts with their parents. They had become strongly attached to their respective foster families and environment, in which they had developed in a positive and harmonious manner. Both children had expressed a strong wish to remain in the foster homes, had shown anxiety about the possibility of being forced to return to their natural parents and had indicated that they would run away were they to be so returned. Helena was in an important phase of her personal development, which might be impaired if she were to be returned against her own wishes. Thomas had suffered from certain childhood disturbances and was still psychologically very vulnerable as well as emotionally dependent upon his foster parents. Separating him from the latter was likely to cause him considerable and long-lasting psychological harm.

Against this background the reasons for ordering the prohibition on removal were, in the Court's opinion, both relevant and sufficient.

88. The prohibition on removal lasted until the transfer of custody, that is, for a total of three and a half years (June 1987 - January 1991). The original order was upheld in three sets of proceedings and was twice renewed, in 1989 by the Social Council and in 1990, under the 1990 Act, by the County Administrative Court. The applicants appealed each time, but these appeals were unanimously dismissed (see paragraphs 14-17 and 21-27 above).

In all of these decisions the national courts found that there remained a serious risk that separating the children from their foster homes would harm them; they pointed out in particular that there had been insufficient preparatory contacts between them and the applicants.

Given that the factors indicated in paragraph 87 above did not essentially change during the period under review, the Court finds that the reasons for the maintenance in force of the prohibition on removal were in any case "relevant". Whether they were also "sufficient" cannot be ascertained without inquiring why, despite the fact that as early as the first set of proceedings relating to the prohibition on removal the Swedish courts had time and again stressed the crucial importance of adequate preparatory contacts, these contacts remained insufficient during the whole period. It is in this context that the restrictions on access have to be assessed.

89. The restrictions on access which applied throughout this period amounted to the following: while the applicants were free to visit the children in their foster homes as often as they wished, meetings outside those homes would be organised or allowed only under such conditions as would dispel the children's apprehensions.

These restrictions - which were supported by opinions of two psychiatrists and a psychologist (see paragraphs 40, 43 and 49 above) and, above all, were in accordance with the repeated wishes of the children - were based on reasons similar to those underlying the prohibition on removal. The authorities took the view that not only the children's interests but also their rights under Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention prevented the authorities from allowing requests for access under conditions which were unacceptable to the children.

In view of the situation which obtained, the Court finds that the restrictions on access were based on reasons which were "relevant" when it comes to ascertaining whether these restrictions were "necessary in a democratic society". It remains to be seen whether they also were "sufficient": for this purpose they must be assessed in the context indicated at the end of paragraph 88 above.

90. In doing so, the Court notes firstly that, both under Swedish law and under Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention, the lifting of the care order implied that the children should, in principle, be reunited with their natural parents. In cases like the present, Article 8 (art. 8) includes a right for the natural parents to have measures taken with a view to their being reunited with their children (see, as the most recent authority, the Rieme v. Sweden judgment of 22 April 1992, Series A no. 226-B, p. 71, para. 69) and an obligation for the national authorities to take such measures.

However, neither the right of the parents nor its counterpart, the obligation of the national authorities, is absolute, since the reunion of natural parents with children who have lived for some time in a foster family needs preparation. The nature and extent of such preparation may depend on the circumstances of each case, but it always requires the active and understanding co-operation of all concerned. Whilst national authorities must do their utmost to bring about such co-operation, their possibilities of applying coercion in this respect are limited since the interests as well as the rights and freedoms of all concerned must be taken into account, notably the children's interests and their rights under Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention. Where contacts with the natural parents would harm those interests or interfere with those rights, it is for the national authorities to strike a fair balance (see, mutatis mutandis, the Powell and Rayner v. the United Kingdom judgment of 21 February 1990, Series A no. 172, p. 18, para. 41).

In sum, what will be decisive is whether the national authorities have made such efforts to arrange the necessary preparations for reunion as can reasonably be demanded under the special circumstances of each case.

It is for the Court to review whether the national authorities have fulfilled this obligation. In doing so, it will leave room for a margin of appreciation, if only because it has to base itself on the case-file, whereas the domestic authorities had the benefit of direct contact with all those concerned.

91. In this connection the Court notes in the first place that the judgments rendered by the Swedish courts during the period under consideration contain some passages which might be understood as criticising the social welfare authorities for deficiencies in the making of appropriate preparations for reunion, but equally as urging them not to let themselves be influenced by the antagonistic course taken by the applicants and their counsel. However, the judgments which were given afterwards, in the transfer of custody proceedings, clearly take the view that the main responsibility for the necessary preparations not having been made lay with the applicants.

Indeed, the Swedish courts repeatedly stressed that in order to arrange adequate preparatory contacts, good co-operation between the social welfare authorities and the foster parents on the one hand and the applicants on the other hand was essential. Nevertheless, the applicants, although they knew that the access restrictions corresponded to the children's wishes, refused to accept them. They visited the children at the foster homes only twice (see paragraph 29 above) and also neglected other possible forms of contact, such as contact by telephone. Rather than follow the course of co-operation recommended by the courts, the applicants instead chose that of continuous hostility: again and again they demanded access at their home without the foster parents' presence, which, as they were well aware, was unacceptable not only to the social welfare authorities but also to the children. In addition, they responded to the failure to comply with their demands by lodging complaints with the police and numerous appeals (see paragraphs 32-34, 46 and 50-52 above).

The social welfare authorities, for their part, tried to persuade the applicants to visit the children in their foster homes, offering to make the necessary arrangements and reimburse their travel costs and subsistence expenses. Furthermore, they organised a meeting in Gothenburg and, after consultation with two experts, drew up an access plan which cannot be said to have been unduly restrictive and seems to have satisfied the exigencies of the situation. Although this plan was rejected by the applicants, the social welfare authorities tried, with partial success, to put it into effect (see paragraphs 29 and 41 above).

In the light of the foregoing, the Court, having regard to the margin of appreciation to be left to the national authorities, has come to the conclusion that it has not been established that the social welfare authorities failed to fulfil their obligation to take measures with a view to the applicants being reunited with Helena and Thomas.

Accordingly, the maintenance in force of the prohibition on removal and the restrictions on access were based on reasons that were not only "relevant" but also, in the circumstances, "sufficient" (see paragraph 88 above).

92. The question whether the interferences with the applicants' right to respect for family life were "necessary" must therefore be answered in the affirmative. Consequently, their complaint under Article 8 (art. 8) fails on this point.

III. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 53 (art. 53) OF THE CONVENTION

93. The applicants complained that, despite the Court's Olsson I judgment, the Swedish authorities had continued to prevent their reunion with Helena and Thomas; the applicants had still not been allowed to meet the children under circumstances which would have enabled them to re-establish parent-child relationships. In their view, Sweden had continued to act in breach of Article 8 (art. 8) and had thereby failed to comply with its obligations under Article 53 (art. 53) of the Convention, which reads as follows:

> "The High Contracting Parties undertake to abide by the decision of the Court in any case to which they are parties."

This allegation was disputed by the Government, whereas the Commission did not express an opinion on the matter.

By Resolution DH (88)18, adopted on 26 October 1988, concerning the execution of the Olsson I judgment, the Committee of Ministers, "having satisfied itself that the Government of Sweden has paid to the applicants the sums provided for in the judgment", declared that it had "exercised its functions under Article 54 (art. 54) of the Convention".

94. The Court further notes that the facts and circumstances underlying the applicants' complaint under Article 53 (art. 53) raised a new issue which was not determined by the Olsson I judgment (p. 29, para. 57) and are essentially the same as those which were considered above under Article 8 (art. 8), in respect of which no violation was found (see paragraphs 87-92 above).

In these circumstances, no separate issue arises under Article 53 (art. 53).

IV. ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF ARTICLE 6 PARA. 1 (art. 6-1) OF THE CONVENTION

95. Mr and Mrs Olsson also complained of several violations of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1), which provides:

> "In the determination of his civil rights and obligations

... everyone is entitled to a ... hearing within a reasonable time by [a] ... tribunal ..."

A. Judicial review of restrictions on access

96. The Government, like the Commission, accepted the applicants' contention that there had been a violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) on the ground that it was not possible for them, until the entry into force of the 1990 Act on 1 July 1990, to have the restrictions on their access to Helena and Thomas reviewed by a court (see paragraphs 33, 34, 51, 62, 73 and 74 above).

97. For the reasons set out in the above-mentioned Eriksson judgment (Series A no. 156, p. 29, paras. 80-81), the Court agrees. Accordingly, there has been a violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) on this point.

B. Length of certain proceedings

98. The applicants alleged that the duration of several of the domestic proceedings in their case had, contrary to Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1), exceeded a reasonable time.

The Government contested this allegation, which was rejected by the Commission.

99. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings is to be assessed in the light of the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the conduct of the applicant and that of the relevant authorities. On the latter point, what is at stake for the applicant in the litigation has to be taken into account in certain cases (see, for instance, the X v. France judgment of 31 March 1992, Series A no. 236, pp. 89-90, para. 32).

1. The proceedings relating to one of the requests made by the applicants for termination of the public care

100. The applicants maintained that the examination of one of their requests for termination of the public care of Helena, Thomas and Stefan (see paragraph 10 above) had not been concluded within a "reasonable time".

101. The Court considers - and this was not in dispute before it - that the starting-point for the relevant periods was 16 August 1984, when the applicants submitted their request to the Social Council. The periods in question ran until 16 February 1987, when the public care of Stefan was revoked by the Administrative Court of Appeal, and 18 June 1987, when that of Helena and Thomas was terminated by the Supreme Administrative Court, thus lasting approximately two years and six months and two years and ten months, respectively.

102. The proceedings concerning Stefan lasted approximately thirteen months before the Social Council, four and a half months before the County Administrative Court and twelve months before the Administrative Court of Appeal; those in respect of Helena and Thomas took approximately two and a half months before the Social Council, eleven months before the County Administrative Court, sixteen and a half months before the Administrative Court of Appeal and four months before the Supreme Administrative Court.

The proceedings were of a complex nature, involving difficult assessments and requiring extensive investigations. Hearings were held before the County Administrative Court in the case of Helena and Thomas and before the Administrative Court of Appeal in the case of all three children.

103. There are only two instances in which it is questionable whether the competent authorities proceeded with proper diligence.

Firstly, it took the Social Council thirteen months to decide on the request concerning Stefan. However, the Government explained that this had been due to certain investigations deemed to be necessary and the Court accepts this argument.

Secondly, the Administrative Court of Appeal had initially scheduled a hearing for 21 August 1986, but postponed it until 4 February 1987. Whilst indicating that they could not state with any certainty the reasons for this delay, the Government drew attention to the fact that, between 17 July and 20 November 1986, the case-file had not been with the Administrative Court of Appeal, but with the Supreme Administrative Court, which had had before it another appeal by the applicants. However, this does not sufficiently explain why the hearing was postponed for six months. In view of the nature of the interests at stake, it was of great importance, as the Commission also noted, that such matters be dealt with swiftly.

Nevertheless, having regard to the complexity of the case, the delay was not so long as to warrant the conclusion that the total duration of the proceedings was excessive.

2. The proceedings relating to the applicants' request under Chapter 21 of the Parental Code

104. Mr and Mrs Olsson further claimed that the proceedings concerning their request to have Helena and Thomas returned to them, in accordance with section 7 of Chapter 21 of the Parental Code (see paragraph 18 above), had exceeded a reasonable time.

Both the Government and the Commission disagreed.

In their main submission the Government disputed the applicability of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1), on the ground that the proceedings in issue had been concerned only with the enforcement of existing rights and not with the determination of the existence or the content of such rights.

The Court has come to a different conclusion. There is no doubt that the outcome of the proceedings in issue affected, in a decisive manner, the exercise by the applicants of an essential aspect of their rights in respect of the custody of the children (see, amongst many authorities, the Skärby v. Sweden judgment of 28 June 1990, Series A no. 180-B, p. 36, para. 27). Their application to the County Administrative Court for the transfer of the children thus gave rise to a "contestation" (dispute) over one of their "civil rights" for the purposes of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1). Consequently, this provision is applicable to the proceedings in question.

105. As to whether the proceedings complied with the requirement of reasonable time, the Court observes that they lasted for a period of thirteen and a half months and comprised three levels of jurisdiction. Like the Commission, it does not find this to be excessive for the purposes of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1).

3. The proceedings relating to the second appointment of a guardian ad litem

106. The applicants further contended that the proceedings concerning the second appointment of a guardian ad litem (see paragraph 20 above) had exceeded a "reasonable time".

These proceedings lasted a little more than a year and included three levels of jurisdiction. The Court agrees with the Commission that they were concluded within a reasonable time.

4. Conclusion

107. There has accordingly been no breach of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) on the three above-mentioned points.

V. MISCELLANEOUS ALLEGATIONS OF VIOLATIONS OF ARTICLES 6 PARA.1 AND 13 (art. 6-1, art. 13)

108. Before the Commission the applicants submitted that, in the first set of proceedings challenging the prohibition on removal, there had been a breach of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1), in that the Supreme Administrative Court had refused to hold a hearing (see paragraph 17 above). They also alleged that, contrary to this provision, they had not been able to challenge the District Court's first appointment, on 17 July 1987, of a guardian ad litem for Helena and Thomas, since they had not been informed of this decision (see paragraph 19 above). In addition, they complained that they did not have an effective remedy within the meaning of Article 13 (art. 13) in respect of the restrictions on access and the decision of 17 July 1987 to appoint a guardian ad litem.

These complaints, which in the Commission's opinion were unfounded or did not need examination, were not mentioned by the applicants before the Court, which does not consider it necessary to examine them of its own motion.

VI. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 50 (art. 50)

109. Mr and Mrs Olsson sought just satisfaction under Article 50 (art. 50), according to which:

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the ... Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. Damage

110. Under this provision the applicants sought 5,000,000 Swedish kronor for damage. In support of their claim they maintained, inter alia, that, despite the Olsson I judgment, the Swedish authorities had continued to deal with them in the same way. The compensation awarded by the Court in that judgment had had no impact; a significantly higher sum was therefore called for in the present case.

The Government considered the claim to be "out of proportion". They submitted that, should the Court uphold their contentions on the merits, only a symbolic amount should be granted.

111. The present judgment has found only violations of Article 8 (art. 8), on account of the restrictions on the applicants' access to Helena and Thomas imposed, for a certain period, without a proper basis in Swedish law, and of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1), owing to the absence of a court remedy against the restrictions (see paragraphs 81-82 and 97 above). The Court considers that the applicants must, as a result, have suffered some non-pecuniary damage which has not been compensated solely by the findings of violation. Deciding on an equitable basis, it awards 50,000 Swedish kronor to the applicants jointly under this head.

B. Legal fees and expenses

112. The applicants claimed reimbursement of fees and expenses, totalling 1,286,000 Swedish kronor, in respect of the following items:

(a) 1,269,000 kronor for 625 hours' work by their lawyer in respect of the domestic and the Strasbourg proceedings and for 80 hours for the preparation of her oral pleadings and her appearance before the Court as well as for her journey to Strasbourg (in each case at 1,800 kronor per hour);

(b) expenses relating to journeys by the lawyer to meet a former foster daughter of the Larsson family in Northern Sweden (7,000 kronor) and to attend a court hearing in Gävle (2,000 kronor);

(c) 3,000 kronor in respect of a further journey to see the applicants and an appearance before the District Court in Alingsås as well as photocopying and telephone calls;

(d) 5,000 kronor to cover work by a translator checking the manuscript of the lawyer's oral pleadings before the Court.

With regard to item (a), the Government submitted that costs referable to the domestic proceedings did not warrant compensation under Article 50 (art. 50); such costs could have been paid under the Swedish legal aid scheme had the applicants applied for legal aid. Furthermore, in their view, the way in which the lawyer for the applicants conducted the proceedings before the Commission should be taken into consideration. The Government questioned whether the time which she claimed to have spent on the case was necessary and considered the hourly rate charged too high.

Items (b) and (c), the Government pointed out, seemed to be related, at least partly, to the domestic proceedings. They were prepared to pay reasonable compensation for item (d).

113. As regards item (a), the Court notes that the applicants' lawyer agreed to act on the basis that she would not ask for fees under the Swedish legal aid scheme. Her clients have therefore incurred liability to pay fees to her. Legal fees referable to steps taken, in both the domestic and the Strasbourg proceedings, with a view to preventing or obtaining redress for the matters found by the Court to constitute violations of Articles 6 para. 1 and 8 (art. 6-1, art. 8) of the Convention, were necessarily incurred and should be reimbursed in so far as they were reasonable (see, for instance, the Olsson I judgment, Series A no. 130, p. 43, para. 104).

Bearing in mind that the applicants have succeeded only on the points mentioned in paragraph 111 above and making an assessment on an equitable basis, the Court considers that the applicants should be awarded under this head 50,000 kronor, from which must be deducted the 6,900 French francs already received from the Council of Europe in respect of legal costs.

114. Items (b) and (c) must be rejected as there is no evidence that they were necessarily incurred. On the other hand, the Court is satisfied that item (d) - translation costs - was necessarily incurred and was reasonable as to quantum.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Holds by six votes to three that there has been no violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention in respect of the prohibition on removal;

2. Holds unanimously that there has been a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) on account of the restrictions on access imposed between 23 June 1987 and 1 July 1990;

3. Holds by six votes to three that there has been no violation of Article 8 (art. 8) on account of the restrictions on access imposed after 1 July 1990;

4. Holds unanimously that there has been a violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) in that no court remedy was available to challenge the restrictions on access imposed between 23 June 1987 and 1 July 1990;

5. Holds unanimously that there has been no violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) as regards any of the other points raised by the applicants before the Commission and the Court;

6. Holds by seven votes to two that no separate issue arises under Article 53 (art. 53);

7. Holds unanimously that it is not necessary to examine the other complaints, under Articles 6 para. 1 and 13 (art. 6-1, art. 13), which the applicants made before the Commission but did not reiterate before the Court;

8. Holds unanimously that Sweden is to pay to the applicants jointly, within three months, 50,000 (fifty thousand)

Swedish kronor for non-pecuniary damage, and, for legal fees and expenses, 55,000 (fifty-five thousand) Swedish kronor less 6,900 (six thousand nine hundred) French francs to be converted into Swedish kronor at the rate applicable on the date of delivery of the present judgment;

9. Dismisses unanimously the remainder of the claim for just satisfaction.

(Translation)

I did not vote with the majority of the Chamber for the non-violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the European Convention on Human Rights as regards the prohibition on removal and restrictions on access (points 1 and 3 of the operative provisions). I consider, on the contrary, that there has been a serious violation of that Article (art. 8) in respect both of the prohibition on removal and of the restrictions on access after 1 July 1990, on the same lines as the findings in the Olsson I judgment (see particularly paragraph 81 which set out the reasons for concluding that Sweden had failed to comply with Article 8 in that case) (art. 8).

It appears clear that the social welfare officials did not take all the steps that they should have done in the light of that judgment with a view to promoting the exercise of the right of access and the right to have the children to stay which would have prepared the way for returning custody of the children to their parents.

Where the child has been separated from his parents over a long period (as was the case here and this was a situation for which the social welfare authorities bore some responsibility in respect of the period covered by the Olsson I judgment), flexible and sensitive measures must be taken.

In order to put reflection on the Olsson II judgment more clearly in context, it is helpful to recall the principal reasoning of the Olsson I judgment (in which a violation was found by twelve votes to three):

> "82. There is nothing to suggest that the Swedish authorities did not act in good faith in implementing the care decision. However, this does not suffice to render a measure 'necessary' in Convention terms ...: an objective standard has to be applied in this connection. Examination of the Government's arguments suggests that it was partly administrative difficulties that prompted the authorities' decisions; yet, in so fundamental an area as respect for family life, such considerations cannot be allowed to play more than a secondary role.
> 83. In conclusion, in the respects indicated above and despite the applicants' unco-operative attitude ..., the measures taken in implementation of the care decision were not supported by 'sufficient' reasons justifying them as proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. They were therefore, notwithstanding the domestic authorities' margin of appreciation, not 'necessary in a domestic society'."

The Committee of Ministers confined itself to declaring that the pecuniary awards made under Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention had been duly paid by the Government.

For all the periods considered, the authorities should have taken steps to ensure: the psychological preparation of the children and the progressive organisation repeated at least each month of meetings, at first short ones, if necessary even in the presence of a psychologist; these meetings could subsequently have been extended to a day, a weekend, a part of the holidays, under different conditions to those obtaining for the five series of meetings referred to in the judgment. The aim would be to avoid a situation in which the child, being conditioned by the foster family, adopted a deliberately obstructive attitude to these visits, which evidently posed a problem. It would also have been helpful to make a greater effort to prepare the parents for the progressive stages, making allowance for their frustration, for a degree of maladroit resistance on their part as well as for the difficulties arising from the need to travel because of the unfortunate choice of the foster families in terms of the geographical location of their home. The most important thing was to take account of the parents' persistent efforts to secure the return of their children, despite all the obstacles, which confirmed their parental attachment and their legitimate and consistent claim. In my view, neither the social welfare authorities nor the majority of the European Court sitting as a Chamber gave sufficient weight to the strength and extent of this attachment. From 23 June 1987 to 16 June 1989, there were only five actual meetings (see paragraph 29 of the judgment), and then no more during the relevant period.

It is true that since the Olsson I judgment these five attempts at meetings have taken place; the results were unsatisfactory but that could have been a temporary situation.

However, in view of the large number of misunderstandings which had built up over the years, these attempts had no chance of succeeding without an adequate psychological preparation of the parties concerned. It is the duty of the social welfare authorities, and this is one of the most elementary principles of the methods of educative assistance practised in Europe, where this type of conflict is frequent, to make specific arrangements.

It is impossible to overcome in a matter of a few hours years of mutual incomprehension. Thousands of learned works by judges, lawyers, doctors, psychiatrists or psychologists, have been written on this subject. The technique of using neutral ground for meetings and progressive contacts is common, under judicial supervision. In any event it is always counterproductive for the parents to have to meet their children on the home ground of the foster family or in the latter's presence, because that often leads to the failure of the attempt.

The social welfare authorities displayed what was almost contempt both for the national courts and the European Court. It is somewhat surprising that neither the courts nor the governmental authorities managed to force the "imperialism" of the social services to give ground.

At no time did the social welfare authorities take the least account of the love for their children that the parents sought to express, a love that was demonstrated by the years of struggle in proceedings to seek to obtain the return of the children and the respect of their most sacred rights.

Clearly, the Olsson parents' attitude was not always helpful, particularly after 1989, and they must therefore bear a part of the responsibility. Yet one must not forget their despair after the repeated failures with which they met even after the favourable decisions of the European Court and the national courts (see paragraph 53 et seq. of the present judgment).

Adopting the tactics employed by their lawyers, which were perhaps too extreme, they hardened their position, but legally they had a number of valid reasons for doing so. In any case, the authorities were under a duty to exert a positive influence, by showing understanding and making repeated interventions, instead of reinforcing the differences.

In this type of situation it is necessary to seek to organise more and more meetings, to educate the children and the parents, to defuse conflicts. It is unfair to give priority to the obstinacy of the children and the foster families.

In the same connection, the long delays between each proceedings or intervention made the situation worse, whereas in other States and in other jurisdictions, hearings would have been held at shorter intervals by means of an urgent procedure before a children's judge. One is left with the impression that the authorities were content to allow the intransigence of the parents to strengthen the position of the social welfare authorities, despite the fact that the latter had never disguised their preference for the foster families, as if they sought to accord greater weight to material comfort than to paternal and maternal ties.

Viewed from the outside this attitude towards the parents may seem somewhat "inhuman".

It is to be regretted that reference was not made to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child so as to permit the intervention of the children assisted by their lawyers, who could have played a useful role as mediators.

Whatever the case may be, the general and overall conduct of the authorities was such that the parents are permanently separated from their children, and this situation is now irreparable as a result of the refusal to allow access, a right which is not even refused to criminal parents in other countries. The Olsson parents have been definitively cut off from any family relationship. It is difficult to think of a more serious case of a violation of the fundamental rights protected by Article 8 (art. 8).

As I voted for the violation of the prohibition on removal and the restriction on access before and after 1990, I also consider that the Court should have examined the case under Article 53 (art. 53) and analysed the decision of the Committee of Ministers in the light of the European Court's judgment in the first Olsson case.

It is paradoxical that in the year of the implementation of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, which stresses the importance of parent-child relations, there should have been such a failure in the application of Article 8 (art. 8) of the European Convention.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

COURT (PLENARY)

CASE OF OLSSON v. SWEDEN (No. 1)

(Application no. 10465/83)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

24 March 1988

In the Olsson case[*],

The European Court of Human Rights, taking its decision in plenary session in pursuance of Rule 50 of the Rules of Court and composed of the following judges:

Mr. R. RYSSDAL, President,
Mr. J. CREMONA,
Mr. Thór VILHJÁLMSSON,
Mr. G. LAGERGREN,
Mr. F. GÖLCÜKLÜ,
Mr. F. MATSCHER,
Mr. J. PINHEIRO FARINHA,
Mr. L.-E. PETTITI,
Mr. B. WALSH,
Sir Vincent EVANS,
Mr. R. MACDONALD,
Mr. C. RUSSO,
Mr. R. BERNHARDT,
Mr. A. SPIELMANN,
Mr. J. DE MEYER,

and also of Mr. M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr. H. PETZOLD, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 23 September 1987 and 25 February 1988,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 13 March 1987 and by the Government of the Kingdom of Sweden ("the Government") on 13 April 1987, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 § 1 and Article 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention"). The case originated in an application (no. 10465/83) against the Kingdom of Sweden lodged with the

[*] Note by the Registrar: The case is numbered 2/1987/125/176. The second figure indicates the year in which the case was referred to the Court and the first figure its place on the list of cases referred in that year; the last two figures indicate, respectively, the case's order on the list of cases and of originating applications (to the Commission) referred to the Court since its creation.

Commission on 10 June 1983 under Article 25 (art. 25) by two Swedish citizens, Mr. Stig and Mrs. Gun Olsson.

The Commission's request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) and to the declaration whereby Sweden recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46); its purpose was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Articles 3, 6, 8, 13 and 14 (art. 3, art. 6, art. 8, art. 13, art. 14) of the Convention and Article 2 of Protocol No. 1 (P1-2). The Government's application sought the Court's ruling on the interpretation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention in relation to those facts.

2. In response to the inquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 § 3 (d) of the Rules of Court, the applicants stated that they wished to take part in the proceedings pending before the Court and designated the lawyer who would represent them (Rule 30).

3. The Chamber of seven judges to be constituted included, as ex officio members, Mr. G. Lagergren, the elected judge of Swedish nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr. R. Ryssdal, the President of the Court (Rule 21 § 3 (b)). On 23 April 1987, the President drew by lot, in the presence of the Registrar, the names of the five other members, namely Mr. Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs. D. Bindschedler-Robert, Mr. R. Macdonald, Mr. R. Bernhardt and Mr. J.A. Carrillo Salcedo (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 § 4) (art. 43).

4. On 25 June 1987, the Chamber decided under Rule 50 to relinquish jurisdiction forthwith in favour of the plenary Court.

5. Having consulted, through the Registrar, the Agent of the Government, the Commission's Delegate and the applicants' lawyer regarding the need for a written procedure, the President of the Court decided, on 2 July 1987, that it was not necessary for memorials to be filed (Rule 37 § 1) and directed that the oral proceedings should open on 21 September 1987 (Rule 38).

6. The hearing was held in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on the appointed day. The Court had held a preparatory meeting immediately beforehand.

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government

Mr. H. CORELL, Ambassador,
Under-Secretary for Legal and Consular Affairs, Ministry for Foreign Affairs, Agent,
Mr. K. RUNDQVIST, Under-Secretary for Legal Affairs,
Ministry of Health and Social Affairs,
Mr. P. BOQVIST, Legal Adviser,
Ministry for Foreign Affairs,
Mrs. A.-M. HOLMSTEDT, Legal Adviser,

Gothenburg Municipality, Advisers;

- for the Commission

Mrs. G.H. THUNE, Delegate;

- for the applicants

Mrs. S. WESTERBERG, lawyer, Counsel.

The Court heard addresses by Mr. Corell for the Government, by Mrs. Thune for the Commission and by Mrs. Westerberg for the applicants, as well as their replies to the questions put by the Court and its President.

7. On 27 July 1987, the applicants had lodged their claims for just satisfaction under Article 50 (Rule 49), which they supplemented with further particulars on 19 October. Written comments on those claims were received from the Government on 7 September and 23 November 1987 and from the Commission on 15 December 1987.

On 3 September and 16 November 1987, the Government, either on their own initiative or at the Court's request, filed various documents.

AS TO THE FACTS

I. PARTICULAR CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

A. Background

8. The applicants, Mr. Stig and Mrs. Gun Olsson, who are husband and wife, were born in 1941 and 1944 respectively. They are Swedish citizens and live in Gothenburg in Sweden. The case concerns three children of the marriage, namely Stefan, born in June 1971, Helena, born in December 1976, and Thomas, born in January 1979 (hereinafter together referred to as "the children"). The applicants and the children belong to the Church of Sweden; the applicants' membership is purely nominal, as they describe themselves as atheists.

9. In their youth, both Mr. and Mrs. Olsson had spent some time at Stretered, a home for the mentally retarded. However, an examination by a psychologist in 1982 revealed that they then had an average level of intelligence. Other children of theirs had been in social care and Stefan has been subject to various forms of special education since 1975, when he was registered with the Social Welfare Administration for the Handicapped by reason of his being mentally retarded.

Prior to the events giving rise to the present case, a number of different social authorities had been individually involved with the family; they co-ordinated their activities from 1979 onwards. Mr. Olsson - who is in receipt of a disability pension - and Mrs. Olsson were both given certain additional social assistance between 1971 and 1976. They stated that they lived apart on two occasions, the first time for three months and the second for eight months. From May 1977 to December 1979, they were provided with the support of a home-therapist, and a psychiatric team was in touch with the family as from 1979. It appears that the applicants had difficulty in co-operating with the social authorities.

B. Taking of the children into public care and related judicial proceedings

10. The family's situation was discussed by representatives of the various social authorities concerned at case conferences held on 26 October 1979, 29 November 1979 and 10 January 1980. The applicants were present on the last occasion, when different preventive measures for the children were agreed upon. According to the Government, nothing came of this agreement because the applicants abandoned it.

On 22 January 1980, Social District Council No. 6 in Gothenburg ("the Council") decided, pursuant to sections 25(a) and 26(4) of the Child Welfare Act 1960 (barnavårdslagen 1960:97 - "the 1960 Act"; see paragraphs 35 and 43 below), that the children should be placed under supervision in view of their parents' inability to satisfy their need for care and supervision.

11. Further case conferences, at which the applicants were present, were held on 13 March and 29 May 1980. On 22 August, at which time the parents were living apart, the Chairman of the Council decided, pursuant to section 30 of the 1960 Act (see paragraph 43 below), that the children should be provisionally taken into care so that their situation could be investigated. This decision, which had been prompted by the fact that Stefan and Helena had been found cycling around and unable to make their way home, was confirmed on 26 August by the Council after a meeting on the same day at which the applicants were present and made oral submissions.

12. On 16 September 1980, the Council decided, at a meeting at which the applicants were present and had an opportunity to submit their views, that the children should be taken into care, pursuant to sections 25(a) and 29 of the 1960 Act (see paragraphs 35 and 43 below). This decision was based, inter alia, on a report compiled by the social administration and dated 11 September 1980, which was produced at the meeting. The report reviewed the family history and background; recorded the applicants' opposition to the children's being taken into care; concluded that the latter's development was in danger since they were living in an environment which was unsatisfactory due to their parents' inability to satisfy their need for care, stimulation and supervision; noted that preventive measures had been taken, but with no result; and recommended the taking into care. Appended to the report were statements from Stefan's former teacher, from Child Welfare Clinic No. 60 (concerning Helena and Thomas) and from the home where the children had been placed for investigation, together with a medical report dated 12 September 1980 and issued by Children's Psychiatric Clinic 2B at a hospital ("Östra sjukhuset") in Gothenburg. The medical report was signed by chief doctor Elisabeth Bosaeus, a consultant at the above-mentioned home, and by Helena Fagerberg-Moss, a psychologist, both of whom were members of the team that was in touch with the family. It read as follows (translation from the Swedish):

> "The above-mentioned children have been assessed at the children's psychiatric clinic at Östra sjukhuset on 10 September 1980. Both parents have been summoned to separate doctor's discussions but have not appeared. The family has been known at the children's psychiatric clinic since October 1979, when the social worker requested observation and an assessment of the development of Thomas following his admittance to that clinic for pneumonia and an investigation for urinary infection. After referral from the doctor responsible, the assessment of Thomas' development was made on 5 October 1979 by a psychologist, Helena Fagerberg-Moss. This psychologist and welfare officer (kurator) Birgitta Stéen thereafter participated in conferences at social welfare office no. 6 on 26 October and 29 November 1979 with all those involved in the case, concerning the supportive measures the family had received previously and for the planning of further measures. Social welfare office conferences, together with the parents, also took place on 10 January 1980, at which an application for a day-centre placement for Thomas and Helena was decided upon, and on 13 March and 29 May 1980, at which a holiday in a summer home or camp was planned for Helena and Stefan. During a home visit on 25 March 1980, Helena was also the subject of an assessment of her development by the psychologist Helena Fagerberg-Moss. Thomas was also the subject of a new assessment of his development on 11 September 1980. During Thomas' stay at the hospital, welfare officer Birgitta Stéen had contact with the parents. I have taken note of the investigation report of 18 January 1980, with proposals concerning supervision, and the report of 26 August 1980, with proposals concerning a care order. I have also taken note of the children's medical files. On 10 September 1980, Kerstin Lindsten, welfare officer at the school for retarded children, provided certain information by telephone concerning Stefan.
> It appears from the medical file that at the age of four months Stefan was admitted to the Gothenburg children's hospital for assessment of his development and already at that stage he was found to be considerably retarded. At the age of six months he was retarded by two months. During a new test at the age of three years he was found to be at the developmental level of a 15 to 20 month old child. The psychologist Barbro Wikman considered him at that time to be passive, afraid and cautious. He was withdrawn and was most significantly retarded as regards his linguistic development. He was considered to be in great need of stimulation and the psychologist questioned whether there were sufficient opportunities for this in his home environment. He could not feed himself, could not run properly and he was not accustomed to playing with other children. According to the file, the parents were 'not interested in taking him to a special play-centre'. On 4 May 1976, it was noted that he never had cooked food, could not construct sentences, did not play outside, cried easily, could feed himself but did it rarely, and seemed pale and lethargic. Stefan now attends the third year in a school for the retarded. It appears that he is one of the weakest pupils. At the beginning of his time at this school, the home conditions appeared to be acceptable since the family had a home-therapist. Subsequently, however, there were alarming reports that Stefan ran around outside and was often taken care of by the police. He could not control his urine and bowels, was teased by his friends because he smelled badly, and he was even undressed by them, according to the school welfare officer Kerstin Lindsten. Food problems have also occurred, according to the school nurse. Stefan mostly ate only sandwiches. The boy is short-sighted and needs to wear glasses, but he does not do so. Since the parents have also had difficulties in supervising and caring for Stefan, different ways of placing him have been discussed. A placement in an educational home appeared to be a good solution, but the parents withdrew at the last moment. Placement in a foster home has also been proposed, but the father reacted with depressive symptoms and kept the boy at home and away from school.

During a medical assessment on 10 September 1980 Stefan gave the impression of being very retarded in his development but, in addition, he was cut off in his personal contacts, did not hear questions, did not treat play material in an adequate manner and seemed to have a limited concentration and attention span. His behaviour was clumsy. He could not write his own name and, when drawing with a pencil, he folded the paper at an angle of 90^{o}. He did not wear his glasses.

During a development assessment in her home on 25 March 1980, carried out by Helena Fagerberg-Moss, Helena Olsson attained a level comparable to that expected of her age. During a visit to the children's welfare clinic, however, Helena was considered passive, looked afraid and had an undeveloped use of language. She has been going to a clinic since September 1979 for stomach problems, but this has not led to any measure being taken. During an assessment on 10 September 1980 she was shy when there were several persons in the same room, did not say anything and behaved as a mother towards Thomas, giving him toys and embracing him now and then. The same behaviour has been noted at the children's home.

Thomas' development has been assessed on 5 October 1979 and 11 September 1980 by Helena Fagerberg-Moss. During the first assessment he was somewhat below the level of development which was expected and was also somewhat passive and withdrawn in his contacts. During the second assessment he was seriously quiet, cautious and his face was without expression. His development was four to six months behind. His language (at the age of 20 months) corresponded to a degree of development of a six to eight month old child. He became clearly stimulated by play and test material and seemed to have development potential. He gave a clear impression that he had not received sufficient stimulation at home. In the medical file it has been noted in August 1979 that the mother's way of feeding Thomas was clearly abnormal. She held the feeding bottle at a distance and, even after having been asked to pick him up, there was no natural close contact. At the children's home it has been observed that the father still treats Thomas as a baby.

In summary, Stefan, Helena and Thomas are three children whose parents have been registered as being retarded. The father has retired early. In addition, the parents' inter-relations are bad. They have separated for a long period and are now separated again. The family has moved four times in two and a half years. Stefan and Thomas show clear signs of backwardness, probably of different origins. Furthermore, there is a lack of care for the children on the part of the parents, and the children's behaviour is disturbed. Stefan has had enuresis and encopresis, feeding difficulties, social difficulties with other children and has shown vagrancy tendencies. His special need of clean clothes, glasses (he is myopic), and extra care and stimulation because of his backwardness, has not been met by his parents. The linguistic development of all the children is retarded. Such backwardness is the most frequent sign of under-stimulation. Helena, who is of average intelligence, is inclined to take too great a responsibility for her brother Thomas. Thomas has not had any opportunity of adequate training either physically or psychologically.

Since measures taken up to now in the form of a home-therapist, day-care nursery-home placement, supervision, etc. have not improved the situation, we recommend that Stefan, Helena and Thomas be taken into care and be given foster homes."

The applicants alleged that, before this medical report was prepared, Dr. Bosaeus had never met them and had never visited their home. They also complained of the fact that she did not herself examine the children until 10 September 1980, after they had been placed in care for investigation on 22 August 1980; at that time they were in a state of shock as a result of violent police action on their removal from their home and of their completely new environment. It appears, however, that the psychologist Helena Fagerberg-Moss assessed Thomas on 5 October 1979 and had visited the parents' home on 25 March 1980, when she assessed the development of Helena.

13. Since the applicants did not consent to the Council's decision of 16 September 1980, the matter was submitted, pursuant to section 24 of the 1960 Act (see paragraph 44 below), to the County Administrative Court (länsrätten) at Gothenburg. It held a hearing on 18 December 1980, at which Mrs. Olsson was represented by a lawyer under the Legal Aid Act (rättshjälpslagen) and the children by official counsel (offentligt biträde); Dr. Bosaeus was heard as an expert.

By judgment of 30 December 1980, the County Administrative Court confirmed the Council's decision. It stated (translation from the Swedish):

"It appears from the investigation of the case that the children, Stefan, Helena and Thomas, who all place specially high demands on those who care for them, have for several years been living in an unsatisfactory home environment as a result of the parents' inability to satisfy the children's need of care, stimulation and supervision.

Stefan and Thomas disclose a clear retardation in their development and all three children are backward in language development.

According to Dr. Bosaeus, who issued a medical report on 12 September 1980 and was heard as an expert in the oral proceedings, there is a great risk that Helena will develop negatively if she stays in the parents' home. It is therefore as important to place her in a foster home as it is for Stefan and Thomas. Dr. Bosaeus has accordingly recommended taking the three children into care.

Preventive measures with a home-therapist have been tried for several years and supervision has been arranged without any resulting improvement.

It must therefore be considered as proved that the health and development of the children are jeopardised as a result of the parents' present inability to give them satisfactory care and education.

The decision submitted is therefore compatible with the provisions in section 25(a) and section 29 of the 1960 Act."

14. Mrs. Olsson appealed to the Administrative Court of Appeal in Gothenburg (kammarrätten; see paragraph 50 below); her husband concurred in the appeal. The Council and official counsel for the children moved that the appeal be rejected. The Administrative Court of Appeal held a hearing and then, on 8 July 1981, confirmed the judgment of the County Administrative Court. However, one of the three judges and one of the two laymen sitting in the Court of Appeal, whilst agreeing with the taking of Helena into care, dissented as regards Stefan and Thomas.

15. Mrs. Olsson sought to appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court (regeringsrätten; see paragraph 50 below), but on 27 August 1981 it refused her leave to appeal.

C. Implementation of the care decisions

1. Placement of the children

16. On 22 August 1980, following the decision of the Chairman of the Council (see paragraph 11 above), the children were placed in a children's home in Gothenburg for an investigation of their situation. They remained there until their subsequent placement in separate homes, as described below.

(a) Stefan

17. Around 1 October 1980, the applicants removed Stefan from the children's home and hid him for approximately one month. He was then placed in an educational home in Gothenburg run by the Board for the Retarded, but his parents again took him away and hid him for about two months.

As from 28 February 1981, Stefan was placed, with the assistance of the police, with a foster family of the name of Ek - where he had previously spent some summers - at Tibro, approximately 100 kilometers from the applicants' home.

By decision of 28 June 1983, prompted by conflicts between the natural and the foster parents, the Council moved Stefan to a children's home, Viggen, at Vänersborg, which was run by the Board for the Retarded and situated about 80 kilometers to the north of Gothenburg.

(b) Helena and Thomas

18. Helena and Thomas were placed in separate foster homes - Helena with the Larsson family at Näsåker, in the vicinity of the town of Hudiksvall, on 21 October 1980 and Thomas with the Bäckius family at Maråker, south of Söderhamn, on 10 November 1980. These localities, which lie to the north-east of Gothenburg, are about 100 kilometers from each other. The distances by road from Hudiksvall and Söderhamn to Gothenburg are 637 and 590 kilometers, respectively (see M·KAK, Bilatlas, Sverige, 1981).

19. The Government stated that the original intention had been to place Helena and Thomas with separate families in the same village, but that this had proved impossible at the last minute. They added that the Larsson and Bäckius families were in continuous contact, gave each other much support and met, together with Helena and Thomas, approximately every six weeks.

20. Thomas' foster parents and their own children are members of the Church of Sweden and attended church with him - regularly, according to the applicants, or two or three times a year, according to the foster parents.

2. Restrictions on the applicants' access to the children

21. Since the children were taken into care, their parents' access to them has been the subject of various decisions, including the following.

(a) Stefan

22. Stefan spent some three to four weeks with his parents in the summer of 1982. However, on 10 August 1982 the Council decided, pursuant to section 16(1) of the 1980 Act (see paragraph 48 below), to limit their access to him to one visit every six weeks. They appealed to the County Administrative Court, but on 17 November 1982 it confirmed the restrictions (see paragraph 28 below).

23. After 22 April 1984, Mr. and Mrs. Olsson were allowed to see Stefan every week, mostly at their home. He spent some weeks with them in the summer of 1986.

(b) Helena and Thomas

24. On 21 October 1980, the Council decided to ban access by the applicants to Helena and Thomas at their foster homes, in accordance with section 41 of the 1960 Act (see paragraph 48 below), and to prohibit disclosure of their whereabouts. However, the applicants were allowed to meet the children elsewhere, every second month. The decision was designed to protect the children's chances of settling down and was prompted by the fact that Stefan had previously been removed from his home and hidden by his parents (see paragraph 17 above).

The foregoing restriction was lifted in September 1981, but in February 1983 the Council decided, having regard to the attitude of confrontation adopted by the applicants towards the foster parents, to confine the former's contacts with Helena and Thomas to one visit at the foster homes every third month. This new restriction was confirmed by the County

Administrative Court, on appeal, on 25 March 1983 and again by the Council in decisions of 2 August 1983, 6 December 1983 and 30 October 1984. On 3 October 1985, the County Administrative Court dismissed an appeal by the applicants against the last-mentioned decision; they withdrew their appeal on this point in subsequent proceedings before the Administrative Court of Appeal (see paragraph 31 below) and the restriction therefore continued in force for the remainder of the period during which these children were in public care.

25. According to Mr. and Mrs. Olsson, Helena and Thomas were permitted to visit the family home only once - in 1982 - whilst they were in care, for a few hours and under the strict supervision of the foster mothers and one or two social workers. The applicants added that they were allowed to visit these children only a couple of times a year, under the supervision of social workers, teachers or foster parents; it appears that as time went by they tended to avoid such visits, which they considered humiliating, notably on account of the visiting conditions.

The material before the Court reveals that Mr. and/or Mrs. Olsson saw Helena and Thomas in March 1981 at a neutral place in Gothenburg; in September 1981 at their foster homes; in December 1981 at Stefan's foster home; and just before Easter 1982 at Helena's foster home. The Commission's report contains a more general statement to the effect that the applicants met the two younger children "three times a year during the first years". The applicants do not appear to have paid any visits to them between June 1984 and the spring of 1987.

3. Attitude of the applicants

26. Before the Commission, the Government referred to problems that had arisen as regards co-operation between the applicants on the one hand and the children's foster parents and the social authorities on the other (see paragraphs 100, 101, 109, 110 and 111 of the Commission's report). The applicants' submissions to the Commission on this point are summarised as follows:

> "That the applicants would co-operate with the social workers is completely unthinkable. The action of these social workers is completely in conflict with the applicants' own understanding of how children and adults and family members and others ought to show respect and consideration. ... It must be added that if the applicants were to co-operate with the foster parents and the social workers they would risk passing on to their children the totally wrong impression that the separation of children and parents and the placement of the children in foster homes had occurred with the consent of the applicants. This would be completely disastrous to the self-respect of the applicants' children if they had the wrong impression that their natural parents did not wish them to be at home with them." (ibid., paragraph 80 in fine)

D. Requests for termination of care

27. Following a request by the applicants for termination of the care of the children, a meeting was held on 1 June 1982 at the Council's office, at which the applicants, their lawyer and official counsel for the children were present.

On the same day, the Council rejected the request. It based its decision on reports compiled by the social administration and dated 24, 25 and 26 May 1982, which concluded that the parents were then incapable of giving the children the necessary support and encouragement. Annexed to the reports were statements from the psychologist Helena Fagerberg-Moss, social workers and a school teacher, indicating that the children had made satisfactory progress since being taken into care.

28. The applicants thereupon appealed to the County Administrative Court. It held a hearing on 4 November 1982, at which the applicants were present and assisted by a lawyer; the Council was represented by a lawyer and two social workers and the children by official counsel. Dr. Bosaeus and a social expert from the County Administrative Board (länsstyrelsen; see paragraph 41 below) gave evidence - the former at the request of the applicants' lawyer - and various written opinions from a psychologist, a welfare officer, a school teacher of Stefan and his school doctor were read out. The President of the Court also summarised the documents on which the Council's decision had been based.

The applicants submitted that the medical report of 12 September 1980 (see paragraph 12 above) contained clearly false information, by affirming that they were mentally retarded, and did not indicate any concrete facts showing that the children would have been in danger if they had continued to live with their parents. The Council, for its part, asserted that its refusal to terminate care had been based not on the applicants' being mentally retarded but on their inability to satisfy the children's need for care, stimulation and supervision.

In its judgment of 17 November 1982, the County Administrative Court, in addition to confirming the restrictions on parental access to Stefan (see paragraph 22 above), held as follows (translation from the Swedish):

> "The facts of the case show that the children suffered to a greater or lesser extent from different types of disturbance when they were taken into care. Stefan was disturbed in his development at a level comparable to special lower class. Following the placement in a foster home, his social abilities have improved and his language development has accelerated. His incontinence has to a large extent disappeared. In the special lower school Stefan has developed favourably having regard to his abilities. As regards Helena and Thomas, they have developed favourably in the foster homes. The assessment of these two children's psychological development undertaken in the spring of 1982 shows that the previous delays and disturbances have now been caught up or have disappeared, and that their development is now completely at the same level as that to be expected for their age.

As far as the applicants are concerned, their circumstances seem to have stabilised in recent times. Thus, the couple moved from Angered in January 1981 and since then have been living in a more child-adapted environment in the community of Ale. The dispute which prevailed in the marriage at the time when the children were taken into care has been overcome, and it seems now as if the relations between the applicants are better. Following a request from their representative, the applicants have been examined by psychologist Gudrun Olsson from Gothenburg. This investigation shows that both applicants have an average level of intelligence.

Under section 5 of the 1980 Act [see paragraph 49 below], the decisive issue in determining whether care under the Act in question should be terminated is whether it is no longer necessary. Facts such as the apparent improvement and stabilising of the applicants' situation and the children's favourable development in their foster homes are an argument in favour of the termination of care. However, there are several circumstances militating in the opposite direction. Stefan, who during 1982 has had several permissions to visit the parents' home, has been disturbed in various ways upon his return to the foster home and has relapsed into his previous negative behaviour. Stefan's return trip to the foster home on 28 June 1982 does not seem to have been well planned and it developed in an unfortunate way for him. In addition, the applicants have so far had difficulties in co-operating in a satisfactory manner with Stefan's foster home and the Social Council. In making an assessment of all the facts of the case, the Court finds that the applicants still show a lack of comprehension and ability to give the children satisfactory care and education. It must therefore be feared that a termination of care under the Act can at present involve great risks for the health and development of the children. Care is therefore to continue and the appeal is rejected."

29. The applicants then appealed to the Administrative Court of Appeal. After a hearing on 20 December 1982, at which they were present and assisted by counsel, the appeal was dismissed on 28 December 1982. The applicants had unsuccessfully requested that Dr. Bosaeus be called as a witness at the hearing.

Mr. and Mrs. Olsson sought to appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court, but on 11 March 1983 it refused them leave to appeal.

30. A fresh request by the applicants to the Council for termination of the care of the children was refused on 6 December 1983.

31. On 30 October 1984 and 17 September 1985, the Council rejected further requests by the applicants for termination of the care of Helena and Thomas and of Stefan, respectively; on the first of these dates it also declined to lift the restriction on visits to Helena and Thomas (see paragraph 24 above). Appeals by the parents against these decisions were dismissed by the County Administrative Court on 3 October 1985 and 3 February 1986, respectively.

The applicants thereupon appealed to the Administrative Court of Appeal, which joined the two cases. After holding a hearing at which Mr. and Mrs. Olsson were present and gave evidence, the Administrative Court of Appeal, by judgment of 16 February 1987, directed that the public care of Stefan be terminated: it took into consideration his recent positive development, his parents' increased understanding of his needs and their agreement that he should complete his current term of schooling at Vänersborg (see paragraph 17 above). However, the appeal concerning Helena and Thomas - the scope of which was confined by Mr. and Mrs. Olsson themselves at the hearing to the care issue, to the exclusion of the access issue - was dismissed. The Administrative Court of Appeal's opinion that the public care of these two children should continue was based primarily on the fact that the applicants were unable to understand and satisfy the special needs arising in connection with re-uniting parents and children after so long a period of separation.

Following an appeal by the parents, the Supreme Administrative Court, by judgment of 18 June 1987, directed that the public care of Helena and Thomas should terminate, there being no sufficiently serious circumstances to warrant its continuation. The Supreme Administrative Court pointed out that the question to be determined in deciding whether care should be discontinued pursuant to section 5 of the 1980 Act (see paragraph 49 below) was whether there was still a need for care. The problems associated with the removal of a child from a foster home and its possible detrimental effects on him and with his reunification with his natural parents - on which the Administrative Court of Appeal had relied - were matters to be considered not under section 5 but in separate proceedings, namely an investigation under section 28 of the Social Services Act 1980 (socialtjänstlagen 1980:620). The latter section empowers a Social District Council to prohibit, for a certain period of time or until further notice, the removal from a foster home of a minor who is not or is no longer in public care, if there is thereby a risk, which is not of a minor nature, of harming his physical or mental health.

32. Stefan is now reunited with his parents.

However, on 23 June 1987 the Council, acting pursuant to section 28 of the Social Services Act 1980, prohibited them until further notice from removing Helena and Thomas from their respective foster homes. An application by Mr. and Mrs. Olsson for the interim suspension of this prohibition was refused by the County Administrative Court on 25 June 1987; this decision was confirmed by the Administrative Court of Appeal on 2 July 1987 and, on 17 August 1987, the Supreme Administrative Court refused leave to appeal. On 3 November 1987, the County Administrative Court rejected on the merits the applicants' appeal against the prohibition; it expressed the opinion that "a prohibition against removal should not be valid for too long a period" and that "a precondition for the rescission of the prohibition ... is that efforts should be made to improve contacts between the parents and children, both through Mr. and Mrs. Olsson and through the Social District Council". According to information supplied to the European Court by the Government on 16 November 1987, an appeal by the applicants to the Administrative Court of Appeal against this judgment was then pending; in the meantime, they remained free to visit Helena and Thomas at the foster homes.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW

A. Introduction

33. According to Swedish child-welfare legislation, each municipality is responsible for promoting the favourable development of children and young persons by taking, if necessary, supportive or preventive measures (see paragraph 43 below). It may also take a child into care and place him in a foster home, a children's home or another suitable institution.

The legislation divides measures of the latter kind into two categories: the first concerns "voluntary care", enabling a parent to place his child into the care of a local authority; the second provides for "compulsory care", by establishing machinery whereby a local authority can obtain a court decision or order committing a child to its care. It was recourse to this machinery that was in issue in the present case.

34. Decisions concerning the applicants' children were taken under the 1960 Act and under the Act containing Special Provisions on the Care of Young Persons 1980 (lag 1980: 621 med särskilda bestämmelser om vård av unga - "the 1980 Act"). The 1980 Act complements the Social Services Act 1980, which deals with voluntary care; on entering into force on 1 January 1982, they together replaced the 1960 Act. In general, decisions taken under the 1960 Act which were still in force on 31 December 1981 were considered to be decisions taken under the 1980 Act.

B. Conditions for compulsory care

1. Under the 1960 Act

35. Under section 25(a) of the 1960 Act, the competent local authority in child-care matters - the Child Welfare Board (barnavårdsnämnden) or, in Stockholm and Gothenburg, the Social District Council - was obliged to intervene (translation from the Swedish):

> "[if] a person, not yet eighteen years of age, is maltreated in his home or otherwise treated there in a manner endangering his bodily or mental health, or if his development is jeopardised by the unfitness of his parents or other guardians responsible for his upbringing, or by their inability to raise the child."

Section 25(b) of the 1960 Act (which was not applied in the present case) provided that the local authority also had to intervene if a minor needed corrective measures because of his criminal, immoral or otherwise asocial behaviour.

36. As regards section 25(a), the preparatory work to the 1960 Act stated, inter alia, the following (translation from the Swedish):

> "In the future too, an important reason for intervention must be that a minor is exposed to physical maltreatment. The specific reference to this in the text of the statute seems to some extent to obscure the importance of the fact that children and young persons must also be protected from other kinds of treatment which may be harmful to their bodily or mental health. For this reason, the Bill instead makes it a prerequisite for intervention that the minor is being maltreated in his home or that he is otherwise treated there in such a way as to endanger his bodily or mental health. This amendment in relation to the law now in force does not aim at bringing about any material change. Reasons for intervention, except for physical maltreatment, may be such as are given as examples in the preparatory work to the legislation now in force: for instance, that a child, who is perhaps being cared for with great tenderness, is all the same continuously exposed to mortal danger owing to his mother's mental illness, or that an infant is being cared for by a mother who is suffering from tuberculosis in a contagious state. Further examples may be that the minor is obliged to do work that is unreasonably hard considering his age or his strength, that he does not get enough to eat and is for that reason clearly undernourished, or that his home environment is marked by a considerable lack of hygiene. According to the practice that has been applied hitherto, it should also be possible to intervene in those instances where the parents - perhaps because of their religious convictions - omit to give the child the medical care and treatment that he needs. Among the cases where children are exposed to mental injury or danger may be mentioned the one where parents - with evident symptoms of mental abnormalities or of pathological attitudes - bring up their children in a way, as the committee puts it, that includes a kind of spiritual error and which often in the end causes their personality to develop in an undesirable way. When such upbringing has the result that the child's mental health is endangered, it comes under the section now dealt with.
> For an intervention under section [25(a)] of the 1960 Act to be permitted, there must be a danger of the child's becoming a misfit because of his parents' vicious way of life or their negligence or inability to educate the child. The provision in question thus concerns abnormalities in the parents or in their capacity to educate; it lays down that those abnormalities should be such as to endanger the child's social development. Parents and other custodians should be treated on equal terms in this respect. Otherwise only amendments of a formal nature seem to be required. Thus, it is suggested that the words 'vicious' and 'negligence' be replaced by the expression 'unsuitability as custodians', which seems more appropriate in this context. Obviously, the scope of this expression is somewhat wider than the one currently in use. Apart from 'vicious' and 'negligent' custodians, it thus also covers those suffering from serious mental abnormalities. There seems to be no reason to object to this enlargement of the field of application of this rule. Society should be entitled to intervene as soon as there is a danger of a young person's unfavourable social development owing to shortcomings in the custodian. Since the notion of 'misfit', as the committee has found, should be excluded from this legislation, the intervention of the Child Welfare Board has instead been made subject to the prerequisite that the development of the young person is in jeopardy. This means that intervention shall take place whenever needed to prevent such abnormalities of behaviour as are indicated under section [25(a)]. It should be pointed out that, just as is the case under the law now in force, an intervention does not require that there have so far been any signs of maladaptation in the young person in question." (Reproduced in NJA II - Nytt Juridiskt Arkiv, "Journal for Legislation" - 1960, pp. 456 et seq.)

2. Under the 1980 Act

37. Conditions for compulsory care under the 1980 Act are set out in section 1, which reads (translation from the Swedish):

"Care is to be provided pursuant to this Act for persons under eighteen years of age if it may be presumed that the necessary care cannot be given to the young person with the consent of the person or persons having custody of him and, in the case of a young person aged fifteen or more, with the consent of the young person.

Care is to be provided for a young person if:

1. lack of care for him or any other condition in the home entails a danger to his health or development; or

2. the young person is seriously endangering his health or development by abuse of habit-forming agents, criminal behaviour or any other comparable behaviour.

38. The following are extracts from the preparatory work to the 1980 Act, as reproduced in NJA II 1980, pp. 545 et seq. (translation from the Swedish).

The Parliamentary Standing Committee on Social Questions stated:

"An important point of departure for the reform of the social services is that salient features in the handling of individual cases should be respect for liberty and the right of the individual to decide about his own life. The aim of the social services should be to co-operate with the client as far as possible, in order to make him take part in decisions as to the planning of treatment and make him co-operate actively in carrying it out. The social services should offer help and support, but not take over the individual's responsibility for his own life. Personal initiative and responsibility must be made part of care and treatment. In this manner the social services may work more actively in a preventive way, and the opportunity to achieve more long-lasting results will be improved.

This fundamental principle of the new legislation has been laid down in section 9 of the Social Services Bill, which stipulates that the measures taken by the Social Council in regard to any individual person should be conceived and carried out in co-operation with the person concerned. Consequently, all social services' opportunities to use coercive measures on adults have been abolished. It is true that, regarding young people and children, the possibility of providing care outside their home contrary to the wishes of the young person or his parents is retained. In this field too, the reform means, however, that the right of the individual to be a party to those decisions that concern his own fate is more strongly stressed. The individual should be able to turn to the social services confidently and ask for help, without risking undesired effects in the form of various coercive measures.

At the same time there is unanimity in considering that in certain cases society must be able to use coercive measures against an individual, whenever this is needed to avoid an immediate risk to somebody's life or health."

The Minister of Health and Social Affairs stated:

"Section 1, second paragraph, point 1, indicates that one ground for measures on the part of society is that lack of care for a young person in his home or some other situation in his home constitutes a danger to his health or development. This rule refers to situations where the young person does not receive sufficient care in his home or is exposed to treatment in his home that means there is a danger to his mental or physical health or to his social development. By the word 'home' is to be understood the home of the parents, as well as any other home where the young person is residing permanently. Under this description come, inter alia, cases where the young person is subject to maltreatment in his home. Even a slight degree of maltreatment must be supposed to cause danger to the health or development of the young person. If, in such a case, the parents oppose such measures as the Social Council may consider necessary to assure the protection of the young person, application of the law may come into focus. In case there has been maltreatment of a more serious kind, the young person should as a matter of course be provided with care outside his home, at least for some time.

As with the 1960 Act, this provision may also be applied in those instances where the parents intend to place the young person in an environment that will endanger his health or his development, or where they do not prevent him from being in such an environment.

This section thus embraces all those situations where the child is being exposed to physical maltreatment or negligent care. This legislation may also be applicable if parents endanger the mental health of a child by their personal characteristics. If the child's mental health or development is being endangered because of parental behaviour - for instance, by way of continuously recurring scenes at home owing to abuse of alcohol or narcotics - or because of the mental abnormality or state of the parents, it should be possible to provide care for the child under this Act.

The Act is primarily aimed at enabling the social services to provide for the young person's need of care. It is the current need of care, and what can be done at the moment and in the future to see to it that this need is met, that will govern the measures taken by the Social Council. As I have pointed out in my general statement concerning this Bill, this legislation can, however, not be used to provide for society's need for protection. It is a different matter that, in those instances where a young person needs to be taken into care according to this Act, this measure will also have the effect of protecting society.

The Social Council is to take appropriate measures as soon as it considers that a situation such as has been indicated in the second paragraph under points 1 and 2 arises. It may, for instance, have come to the knowledge of the Council that a child is being exposed to unsuitable treatment or even to actual danger at home. During an inquiry the situation may appear to be such that the child ought to be provided with care outside his home. The Council should then in the first place try to meet the need for care by reaching an understanding with the parents. In case the parents and the Council cannot reach an agreement as to the question of how the child should be cared for, the Council must turn to the County Administrative Court to obtain a decision on care under the Act, with an inherent authorisation permitting the Council to make decisions regarding the way in which the care should be implemented."

C. Organisation and administration of child care

39. The Child Welfare Board was empowered to exercise functions and make decisions in child-welfare matters within a municipality (sections 1 and 2 of the 1960 Act). In doing so, it had to give particular attention to minors who were exposed to the risk of unfavourable development due to their physical and mental health, home and family conditions and other circumstances (section 3). The Board was composed of lay members who were assisted by social workers.

40. Since the 1980 social-services legislation entered into force, the functions of the Child Welfare Boards have been taken over by Social Councils, which are composed in the same way as the former Boards but are responsible for social welfare in general.

The tasks of the Social Council may, as is the case in Gothenburg, be performed by two or more Social District Councils, each being responsible for a designated area. In child-care matters, a District Council has the same powers and duties as a Social Council.

41. As were the Child Welfare Boards, the Social Councils are under the supervision and control of the County Administrative Board and the National Board of Health and Welfare (socialstyrelsen).

D. Care decisions

42. Child Welfare Boards sought and received information about ill-treatment of children or their unsatisfactory living conditions through various officials having frequent contacts with children, such as social workers, doctors, nurses and teachers. Matters of this kind could also be reported to the Boards by private citizens. Upon receipt of such information, a Board had to undertake, without delay, a comprehensive investigation, including interviews, medical examinations and visits to the child's home.

43. If the Board found that the child's situation corresponded to that described in section 25 of the 1960 Act (see paragraph 35 above), it had, before resorting to care, to endeavour to remedy the matter by preventive measures (förebyggande åtgärder). These could consist of one or more of the following steps: advice, material support, admonition or warning, orders pertaining to the child's living conditions, or supervision (section 26). If such measures proved insufficient or were considered pointless, the Board had to place the child in care (section 29).

However, a child had to be taken provisionally into care for investigation (without the need for prior preventive measures) if there was a probable cause for intervention under section 25 and if there would otherwise be a risk of deterioration in his situation. Such a decision was valid for a maximum period of four weeks (section 30).

In urgent situations where the decision of the Board under section 29 or 30 could not be awaited, section 11 of the 1960 Act empowered the Chairman of the Board to take interim action alone. If he did so, he had to convene a meeting of the Board within ten days in order that a decision be taken in the matter.

44. Further procedural requirements for placing a child in care under section 29 or 30 of the 1960 Act were set out in section 24; in particular, the decision had to be notified without delay to the parents concerned. If they disagreed, the matter had to be referred for review to the County Administrative Court within ten days.

45. Under the 1980 Act, if a Social Council considers that certain action is necessary, it has to apply to the County Administrative Court for a decision; unlike Child Welfare Boards under the 1960 Act, it cannot take the decision itself.

In urgent cases, however, the Council or its Chairman may place a child in care as a provisional measure; such a step must be referred within a week to the County Administrative Court, for decision within the following week.

E. Implementation of care decisions

46. When a care decision has been taken, the Social Council (formerly the Child Welfare Board) has to implement it, by attending to the practical details of such matters as where to place the child and what education and other treatment to give him (sections 35-36 and 38-41 of the 1960 Act and sections 11-16 of the 1980 Act).

1. Requirements as to placement

47. The 1960 Act provided that a child who had been taken into care was entitled to good care and upbringing as well as the education that was necessary in the light of his personal capacity and other circumstances. The child had preferably to be placed in a foster home or, if that was not possible, in a suitable institution, such as a children's home or school (sections 35 and 36). The Child Welfare Board had to supervise the care and the development of the child and, if necessary, take decisions concerning his or her personal affairs (sections 39 and 41).

During the course of the preparatory work to the 1980 Act, the Parliamentary Standing Committee on Social Questions stressed that it was essential for the development of the child that the parents had regular contacts with him; this was also of decisive importance so as to ensure that his return to his original home could be effected smoothly. In fact, section 11 of the 1980 Act provides that he may be allowed, after a period, to return to live there, if it appears that such a course is the best in order to further the aims of the care decision.

2. Regulation of the parents' right of access

48. The 1960 Act provided that the Child Welfare Board could regulate a parent's right of access to his child in care to the extent that it found this reasonable in the light of the aims of the care decision, the upbringing of the child or other circumstances (section 41).

Under the 1980 Act, restrictions on access can be imposed by the Social Council, in so far as this is necessary for the purposes of the care decision (section 16). Unlike the 1960 Act, the 1980 Act expressly empowers the authority concerned to refuse to disclose the child's whereabouts.

F. Reconsideration and termination of compulsory care

49. Under section 42(1) of the 1960 Act, compulsory care had to be discontinued as soon as the aims of the care decision had been achieved. The corresponding rule in the 1980 Act provides that the Social Council shall terminate care when it is no longer necessary (section 5, first paragraph). The preparatory work to this provision, as reproduced in the Government's Bill (1979/80:1, p. 587), stated (translation from the Swedish):

> "It follows that an important task of the Council is to see to it that ... care does not continue for longer than is necessary in the circumstances. Care is to be discontinued as soon as there is no longer any need for the special prerogatives granted to the Council by the Act. It is true that it is part of the custodian's responsibility resting with the Council to pay close attention to the care provided by other people on the Council's behalf. However, against the background of, inter alia, the way the 1960 Act is today applied, it has been considered important that the supervisory duties of the Council are clearly laid down in the text of the [new] Act."

Section 41 of the Social Services Ordinance 1981 (socialtjänst-förordningen 1981:750) lays down that a care decision based on unsatisfactory conditions in the child's home must be reconsidered by the Social Council regularly and at least once a year.

Both before and after the entry into force of the 1980 Act, a parent could, under the general principles of Swedish administrative law, at any time request that the compulsory care of his child be terminated.

G. Appeals

50. Decisions of the County Administrative Court that a child be taken into care might (under the 1960 Act) or may (under the 1980 Act) be the subject of an appeal to the Administrative Court of Appeal and, with leave, to the Supreme Administrative Court.

A parent could or can also appeal to the County Administrative Court (and then to the Administrative Court of Appeal and, with leave, to the Supreme Administrative Court) against:

(a) refusals by a Child Welfare Board or a Social Council to terminate care ordered under the 1960 or the 1980 Act (see paragraph 49 in fine above);

(b) decisions taken by a Child Welfare Board under the 1960 Act relating, inter alia, to the visiting rights of the parents;

(c) decisions taken by a Social Council under the 1980 Act as to where the care should commence; to change a placement decision; regulating the parents' right of access; and not to disclose the child's whereabouts to them (section 20 of the 1980 Act).

According to the Government, the 1960 Act did not entitle a parent to appeal to the County Administrative Court against a placement decision as such, but the 1980 Act does. The Government maintained, however, that the applicants could at any time have raised before the County Administrative Board (see paragraph 41 above) - with the possibility of a subsequent appeal to the Administrative Court of Appeal and thence to the Supreme Administrative Court - a plea that, as a result of their placement and contrary to the requirements of the 1960 Act, the children were not receiving proper care and education.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

51. In their application of 10 June 1983 to the Commission (no. 10465/83), Mr. and Mrs. Olsson alleged that the care decision and the subsequent placement of the children constituted a breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention. They also invoked Articles 3, 6, 13 and 14 (art. 3, art. 6, art. 13, art. 14), as well as Article 2 of Protocol No. 1 (P1-2), and complained that, contrary to Article 25 (art. 25) of the Convention, the exercise of their right to petition the Commission had been hindered.

52. On 15 May 1985, the Commission declared the application admissible, but decided to take no action with respect to the complaint under Article 25 (art. 25).

In its report adopted on 2 December 1986 (Article 31) (art. 31), the Commission expressed the opinion that:

(a) the care decisions concerning the applicants' children in combination with their placement in separate foster homes and far away from the applicants constituted a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention (eight votes to five);

(b) there had been no violation of Articles 3, 6, 13 or 14 (art. 3, art. 6, art. 13, art. 14) of the Convention or of Article 2 of Protocol No. 1 (P1-2) (unanimous).

The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the partly dissenting opinion contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to the present judgment.

FINAL SUBMISSIONS MADE TO THE COURT BY THE GOVERNMENT

53. At the hearing on 21 September 1987, the Government requested the Court to hold "that there has been no violation of the Convention in the present case".

AS TO THE LAW

I. SCOPE OF THE ISSUES BEFORE THE COURT

54. In the course of their submissions, the applicants made a number of general complaints concerning the alleged incompatibility with the Convention of, firstly, Swedish child-care law and, secondly, the practice of the Swedish courts.

The Court recalls that in proceedings originating in an application lodged under Article 25 (art. 25) of the Convention it has to confine itself, as far as possible, to an examination of the concrete case before it (see, as the most recent authority, the F v. Switzerland judgment of 18 December 1987, Series A no. 128, p. 16, § 31). Its task is accordingly not to review the aforesaid law and practice in abstracto, but to determine whether the manner in which they were applied to or affected Mr. and Mrs. Olsson gave rise to a violation of the Convention.

55. At the Court's hearing, the Government contended that in its report the Commission had gone beyond the limits of its admissibility decision of 15 May 1985 by considering a number of decisions not examined therein or in respect of which domestic remedies had not been exhausted at that date. In their submission, the Court should not deal with the decisions in question, which were: firstly, those taken by the Council on 21 October 1980, 10 August 1982, 2 August 1983, 6 December 1983 and 30 October 1984 and by the County Administrative Court on 17 November 1982, in so far as they related to visits by the applicants to the children (see paragraphs 22 and 24 above); and secondly, those taken by the Council on 6 December 1983 and 30 October 1984, refusing the applicants' requests for termination of care (see paragraphs 30-31 above).

The Commission replied that it had followed its constant practice of considering the facts of the case as they stood at the time of the establishment of its report and that, during the course of its proceedings, the Government had not pleaded a failure to exhaust domestic remedies in respect of any of the said decisions.

56. The Court observes that all those decisions pre-dated the Commission's hearing on the admissibility and merits of the case (15 May 1985) and that in the circumstances there was nothing to prevent the Government from raising a plea of non-exhaustion at that time (see, as the most recent authority, the Bozano judgment of 18 December 1986, Series A no. 111, p. 19, § 44). Furthermore, the questions of the applicants' visiting rights and of the requests for discontinuance of care were referred to during that hearing.

In addition, Rule 47 of the Rules of Court provides that "a Party wishing to raise a preliminary objection must file a statement setting out the objection and the grounds therefor not later than the time when that Party informs the President of its intention not to submit a memorial ...". In the present case - where no memorials on the merits were lodged (see paragraph 5 above) - the Government filed no such statement and raised their plea solely at the Court's hearing. It must therefore be rejected as out of time.

Furthermore, whilst the Court's jurisdiction in contentious matters is determined by the Commission's decision declaring the originating application admissible, it is competent, in the interests of the economy of the procedure, to take into account facts occurring during the course of the proceedings in so far as they constitute a continuation of the facts underlying the complaints declared admissible (see, as the most recent authority, the Weeks judgment of 2 March 1987, Series A no. 114, p. 21, § 37). In the Court's view, the decisions in question can be regarded as falling into this category and the Commission acted properly in taking them into account.

57. On the other hand, the 1987 decisions concerning the prohibition on the removal of Helena and Thomas from their respective foster homes (see paragraph 32 above) are the subject of a further application which Mr. and Mrs. Olsson lodged with the Commission on 23 October 1987. Any new question raised therein cannot be settled by the Court in the present judgment (see the Swedish Engine Drivers' Union judgment of 6 February 1976, Series A no. 20, p. 13, § 34, and the above-mentioned Weeks judgment, loc. cit.).

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 (art. 8) OF THE CONVENTION

A. Introduction

58. The applicants asserted that the decision to take the children into care, the manner in which it had been implemented and the refusals to terminate care had given rise to violations of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention, which reads as follows:

> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

This allegation was contested by the Government, but accepted by a majority of the Commission.

59. The mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constitutes a fundamental element of family life; furthermore, the natural family relationship is not terminated by reason of the fact that the child is taken into public care (see the W v. the United Kingdom judgment of 8 July 1987, Series A no. 121, p. 27, § 59). It follows - and this was not contested by the Government - that the measures at issue amounted to interferences with the applicants' right to respect for their family life.

Such an interference entails a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) unless it was "in accordance with the law", had an aim or aims that is or are legitimate under Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2) and was "necessary in a democratic society" for the aforesaid aim or aims (ibid., p. 27, § 60 (a)).

B. "In accordance with the law"

60. The applicants did not deny that the authorities had acted in accordance with Swedish law. However, they alleged that the measures taken were not "in accordance with the law" within the meaning of Article 8 (art. 8), notably because the relevant legislation set no limits on the discretion which it conferred and was drafted in terms so vague that its results were unforeseeable.

The Government contested this claim, which was not accepted by the Commission.

61. Requirements which the Court has identified as flowing from the phrase "in accordance with the law" include the following.

(a) A norm cannot be regarded as a "law" unless it is formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen - if need be, with appropriate advice - to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail; however, experience shows that absolute precision is unattainable and the need to avoid excessive rigidity and to keep pace with changing circumstances means that many laws are inevitably couched in terms which, to a greater or lesser extent, are vague (see, for example, the Sunday Times judgment of 26 April 1979, Series A no. 30, p. 31, § 49).

(b) The phrase "in accordance with the law" does not merely refer back to domestic law but also relates to the quality of the law, requiring it to be compatible with the rule of law; it thus implies that there must be a measure of protection in domestic law against arbitrary interferences by public authorities with the rights safeguarded by, inter alia, paragraph 1 of Article 8 (art. 8-1) (see the Malone judgment of 2 August 1984, Series A no. 82, p. 32, § 67).

(c) A law which confers a discretion is not in itself inconsistent with the requirement of foreseeability, provided that the scope of the discretion and the manner of its exercise are indicated with sufficient clarity, having regard to the legitimate aim of the measure in question, to give the individual adequate protection against arbitrary interference (see the Gillow judgment of 24 November 1986, Series A no. 109, p. 21, § 51).

62. The Swedish legislation applied in the present case is admittedly rather general in terms and confers a wide measure of discretion, especially as regards the implementation of care decisions. In particular, it provides for intervention by the authorities where a child’s health or development is jeopardised or in danger, without requiring proof of actual harm to him (see paragraphs 35 and 37 above).

On the other hand, the circumstances in which it may be necessary to take a child into public care and in which a care decision may fall to be implemented are so variable that it would scarcely be possible to formulate a law to cover every eventuality. To confine the authorities’ entitlement to act to cases where actual harm to the child has already occurred might well unduly reduce the effectiveness of the protection which he requires. Moreover, in interpreting and applying the legislation, the relevant preparatory work (see paragraphs 36 and 38 above) provides guidance as to the exercise of the discretion it confers. Again, safeguards against arbitrary interference are provided by the fact that the exercise of nearly all the statutory powers is either entrusted to or is subject to review by the administrative courts at several levels; this is true of the taking of a child into care, a refusal to terminate care and most steps taken in the implementation of care decisions (see paragraphs 44, 45 and 50 above). Taking these safeguards into consideration, the scope of the discretion conferred on the authorities by the laws in question appears to the Court to be reasonable and acceptable for the purposes of Article 8 (art. 8).

63. The Court thus concludes that the interferences in question were "in accordance with the law".

C. Legitimate aim

64. The applicants submitted that, of the aims listed in paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2), only the "protection of health or morals" could have justified the decision to take the children into care, but that their health or morals were not in fact endangered when it was adopted.

The Commission, on the other hand, considered that the decisions concerning the care and the placement of the children were taken in their interests and had the legitimate aims of protecting health or morals and protecting the "rights and freedoms of others".

65. In the Court's view, the relevant Swedish legislation is clearly designed to protect children and there is nothing to suggest that it was applied in the present case for any other purpose. The interferences in question - intended as they were to safeguard the development of Stefan, Helena and Thomas - therefore had, for the purposes of paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2), the legitimate aims attributed to them by the Commission.

D. "Necessary in a democratic society"

66. The applicants maintained that the measures at issue could not be regarded as "necessary in a democratic society". This submission was contested by the Government, but accepted by a majority of the Commission.

1. Introduction

67. According to the Court's established case-law, the notion of necessity implies that the interference corresponds to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued; in determining whether an interference is "necessary in a democratic society", the Court will take into account that a margin of appreciation is left to the Contracting States (see, amongst many authorities, the above-mentioned W v. the United Kingdom judgment, Series A no. 121, p. 27, § 60 (b) and (d)).

68. There was considerable discussion during the hearing before the Court as to the approach to be adopted by the Convention institutions in resolving the necessity issue.

The Commission's Delegate summarised the approach taken by the majority of the Commission as being: "to stay ... within the judgments of the domestic courts and, after making a detailed study of the relevant judgments, conclude whether or not [their] contents ... reveal sufficient reasons for taking a child into public care." She summarised the minority's approach as being: "to stay within the judgments of the domestic courts and to examine whether the reasons [therein] seem to indicate that [they] have based themselves on irrelevant circumstances or that they have applied unacceptable criteria or standards for the justification of a public-care order. In essence the question is whether the national court has misjudged the necessity." The Government favoured the minority's approach, adding that a wide margin of appreciation should be afforded to the national authorities so long as there was no reason to believe that the decisions were not taken in good faith, with due care and in a reasonable manner.

The approach which the Court has consistently adopted - and from which it sees no reason to depart on the present occasion - differs somewhat from those described above. In the first place, its review is not limited to ascertaining whether a respondent State exercised its discretion reasonably, carefully and in good faith (see, inter alia, the above-mentioned Sunday Times judgment, Series A no. 30, p. 36, § 59). In the second place, in exercising its supervisory jurisdiction, the Court cannot confine itself to considering the impugned decisions in isolation, but must look at them in the light of the case as a whole; it must determine whether the reasons adduced to justify the interferences at issue are "relevant and sufficient" (see, amongst other authorities, mutatis mutandis, the Lingens judgment of 8 July 1986, Series A no. 103, pp. 25-26, § 40).

69. In concluding that there had been a violation of Article 8 (art. 8), the majority of the Commission based itself on the care decisions concerning the applicants' children in combination with the placement of the children in separate foster homes and far away from the applicants.

In this respect, the Court shares the view of the Government that these are matters which should be examined separately: the factors and considerations which are relevant to an assessment of their necessity may not be the same.

2. The taking of the children into care and the refusals to terminate care

70. The applicants contended that it was not necessary to take the children into and maintain them in care; they alleged, inter alia, that no concrete facts had been established showing that the children were in danger, that there were no substantiated reasons justifying the taking into care and that there were no valid motives for refusing the requests for termination of care.

The Government contested this allegation. The majority of the Commission, on the other hand, was not convinced that the factual basis was so grave as to justify the taking into care, although it did observe that it was "understandable that the care order was not lifted".

71. Before turning to the substance of this issue, it is convenient to deal with an initial point. In its above-mentioned W v. the United Kingdom judgment, the Court held that certain procedural requirements were implicit in Article 8 (art. 8): as regards decisions in child-care matters, the parents must "have been involved in the decision-making process, seen as a whole, to a degree sufficient to provide them with the requisite protection of their interests" (Series A no. 121, p. 29, § 64).

The Court agrees with the Commission that this requirement was satisfied as regards the care decisions themselves. Mr. and Mrs. Olsson attended a number of case conferences and were present at the meetings which preceded the Council's decision of 16 September 1980 to take the children into care and its decision of 1 June 1982 not to terminate care (see paragraphs 10, 11, 12 and 27 above). They also attended hearings before the County Administrative Court and the Administrative Court of Appeal. Furthermore, they were legally represented during all the relevant judicial proceedings.

(a) The taking into care

72. In its judgment of 30 December 1980 (see paragraph 13 above), the County Administrative Court set out the following reasons for confirming the Council's decision of 16 September 1980 to take the children into care:

(a) the children had for several years been living in an unsatisfactory home environment as a result of the parents' inability to satisfy the children's need of care, stimulation and supervision;

(b) Stefan and Thomas disclosed a clear retardation in their development and all three children were backward in language development;

(c) there was a great risk that Helena would develop negatively if she stayed in the parents' home;

(d) preventive measures had been tried for several years, but without any resulting improvement;

(e) the health and development of the children were jeopardised as a result of the parents' present inability to give them satisfactory care and education.

These reasons are clearly "relevant" to a decision to take a child into public care. However, it is an interference of a very serious order to split up a family. Such a step must be supported by sufficiently sound and weighty considerations in the interests of the child; as the Commission rightly observed, it is not enough that the child would be better off if placed in care. In order to determine whether the foregoing reasons can be considered "sufficient" for the purposes of Article 8 (art. 8), the Court must have regard to the case as a whole (see paragraph 68 above) and notably to the circumstances in which the decision was taken.

73. Prior to the Council's care decision of 16 September 1980, a number of different social authorities had been individually involved with the Olsson family; they had co-ordinated their activities in 1979, from which time a psychiatric team had followed the case (see paragraph 9 above). Various measures had been taken with a view to assisting the family and a number of case conferences had been held (see paragraphs 9, 10 and 11 above). It cannot therefore be said that the authorities intervened without adequate knowledge of the background.

The Council's decision was based on a substantial report, compiled by the social administration after the children had been placed in care for investigation, which concluded that their development was in danger since they were living in an environment which was unsatisfactory due to their parents' inability to satisfy their need for care, stimulation and supervision (see paragraph 12 above). That report was in turn supported by a number of statements from persons well acquainted with the case, including a medical report signed not only by Dr. Bosaeus but also by a psychologist, Helena Fagerberg-Moss; both were members of a team which was in touch with the family and the latter had, before the decision to place the children in care for investigation was taken, seen Helena and Thomas in order to assess their development and also visited the applicants' home (ibid.).

It is true that the medical report referred to the applicants' having been registered as retarded, whereas a subsequent examination revealed that they were of average intelligence (see paragraphs 9 and 12 above). However, as the Administrative Court of Appeal stated in its judgment of 16 February 1987 (see paragraph 31 above):

> "As far as can be ascertained from the decision to take the Olsson children into care, the primary reason for this action was not any alleged mental retardation on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Olsson. The main reason cited in support of forced intervention was instead the parents' 'inability to give the children satisfactory care and upbringing' - in view of Stefan's obviously retarded development, for instance, and the retarded linguistic development of all the children."

In addition, as the minority of the Commission pointed out, the County Administrative Court's judgment of 30 December 1980 was not founded solely on the documentation that had been before the Council. It had previously held a hearing, at which Mrs. Olsson and the children were represented and Dr. Bosaeus was heard as an expert (see paragraph 13 above), and it thus had the benefit of its own personal impression of the case. This was, moreover, a judgment which was referred on appeal to both the Administrative Court of Appeal and the Supreme Administrative Court, without being reversed (see paragraphs 14 and 15 above).

74. In the light of the foregoing, the Court has come to the conclusion that the impugned decision was supported by "sufficient" reasons and that, having regard to their margin of appreciation, the Swedish authorities were reasonably entitled to think that it was necessary to take the children into care, especially since preventive measures had proved unsuccessful.

(b) The refusals to terminate care

75. In its judgment of 17 November 1982 (see paragraph 28 above), the County Administrative Court set out the following reasons for confirming the Council's decision of 1 June 1982 to refuse the applicants' request for termination of the care of the children:

(a) on returning to his foster home after visits to his parents, Stefan had been disturbed in various ways and had relapsed into his previous negative behaviour; his return trip on 28 June 1982 had developed in an unfortunate way for him;

(b) the applicants had had difficulties in co-operating with Stefan's foster home and the Council;

(c) the applicants still showed a lack of comprehension and ability to give the children satisfactory care and education, so that it had to be feared that termination of care could at that time involve great risks for their health and development.

Here again, these reasons are clearly "relevant" to a decision to maintain a child in care. However, whether they were "sufficient" in the present case calls for further scrutiny.

76. It has to be recalled that the Council's refusal to terminate care was based on reports compiled by the social administration which concluded that the parents were at the time incapable of giving the children the necessary support and encouragement (see paragraph 27 above). These reports were in turn supported by statements from persons well acquainted with the case, including the psychologist, Helena Fagerberg-Moss (ibid.). Above all, on this occasion as well, the County Administrative Court's judgment - like that of the Administrative Court of Appeal which confirmed it - was founded not only on written material but also on a hearing in the presence of the applicants (see paragraphs 28 and 29 above). And again, the judgment of the Administrative Court of Appeal was not reversed (see paragraph 29 above).

It could be thought that the children's favourable development whilst in care and especially the apparent improvement and stabilising by 1982 of the applicants' situation - both of which were recorded in the County Administrative Court's judgment - militated against continuation of care. However, the Court considers that it is justifiable not to terminate public care unless the improvement in the circumstances that occasioned it appears with reasonable certainty to be stable; it would clearly be contrary to the interests of the child concerned to be restored to his parents, only to be taken into care again shortly afterwards.

77. In the light of the foregoing, the Court has come to the conclusion that in 1982 the Swedish authorities had "sufficient" reasons for thinking that it was necessary for the care decision to remain in force. Neither has it been established that a different situation obtained when they subsequently maintained the care decision until its final reversal on different dates in the first half of 1987 (see paragraphs 30 and 31 above).

3. The implementation of the care decision

78. According to the applicants, the implementation of the care decision also gave rise to a violation of Article 8 (art. 8). They relied, inter alia, on the placement of the children separately and at a long distance from each other and their parents, on the restrictions on and the conditions of visits and on the conditions in the homes where the children were placed.

79. In contesting this claim, the Government argued that the measures relating to the placement of the children had been taken in good faith, were not unreasonable and were justified by the special circumstances. They adverted in particular to the following matters: the fear that the parents might remove the children, as they had previously done with Stefan (see paragraph 17 above); the desire to avoid keeping the children in institutions for too long, coupled with the limited supply of suitable foster homes; the special needs of Stefan, which led to his being placed with the Ek family whom he already knew, his subsequent move having been motivated solely by conflicts between the natural and the foster parents (see paragraph 17 above); the view that, having regard to Helena's inclination "to take too great a responsibility for her brother Thomas" (see paragraph 12 above) and to the special needs of these two children, it would not have been realistic or "psychologically appropriate" to place them in the same foster home; and the last-minute impossibility of fulfilling the original intention to place these two children in the same village (see paragraph 19 above).

The Government further submitted that the applicants' previous removal of Stefan from his home and their attitude of confrontation towards the foster parents, respectively, justified the initial and the later restrictions on their access to Helena and Thomas (see paragraph 24 above). They added that Mr. and Mrs. Olsson had in any event not made full use of their entitlement to visit all three children.

80. The Court finds, like the Commission, that it is not established that the quality of the care given to the children in the homes where they were placed was not satisfactory. The applicants' complaint on this score must therefore be rejected.

81. As for the remaining aspects of the implementation of the care decision, the Court would first observe that there appears to have been no question of the children's being adopted. The care decision should therefore have been regarded as a temporary measure, to be discontinued as soon as circumstances permitted, and any measures of implementation should have been consistent with the ultimate aim of reuniting the Olsson family.

In point of fact, the steps taken by the Swedish authorities ran counter to such an aim. The ties between members of a family and the prospects of their successful reunification will perforce be weakened if impediments are placed in the way of their having easy and regular access to each other. Yet the very placement of Helena and Thomas at so great a distance from their parents and from Stefan (see paragraph 18 above) must have adversely affected the possibility of contacts between them. This situation was compounded by the restrictions imposed by the authorities on parental access; whilst those restrictions may to a certain extent have been warranted by the applicants' attitude towards the foster families (see paragraph 26 above), it is not to be excluded that the failure to establish a harmonious relationship was partly due to the distances involved. It is true that regular contacts were maintained between Helena and Thomas, but the reasons given by the Government for not placing them together (see paragraph 79 above) are not convincing. It is also true that Stefan had special needs, but this is not sufficient to justify the distance that separated him from the other two children.

The Administrative Court of Appeal, in its judgment of 16 February 1987 (see paragraph 31 above), itself commented as follows on the applicants' access to Helena and Thomas:

> "Of course, the extremely bad relations between Mr. and Mrs. Olsson on the one hand and Helena and Thomas and their respective foster parents on the other hand are not due only to the Olssons. However, the Administrative Court of Appeal considers it strange that the parents' negative attitude to the foster parents resulted in their not meeting the youngest children for over two years, nor even showing any particular interest in talking to the children on the telephone, for instance. Even if there has been some difficulty for the social council to assist in establishing better relations - due to the action of the parents' representative, for instance, and the children's own attitude - it would have been desirable for the social council to have been more active and not, for instance, to have limited the right of access to once every three months."

82. There is nothing to suggest that the Swedish authorities did not act in good faith in implementing the care decision. However, this does not suffice to render a measure "necessary" in Convention terms (see paragraph 68 above): an objective standard has to be applied in this connection. Examination of the Government's arguments suggests that it was partly administrative difficulties that prompted the authorities' decisions; yet, in so fundamental an area as respect for family life, such considerations cannot be allowed to play more than a secondary role.

83. In conclusion, in the respects indicated above and despite the applicants' unco-operative attitude (see paragraph 26 above), the measures taken in implementation of the care decision were not supported by "sufficient" reasons justifying them as proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. They were therefore, notwithstanding the domestic authorities' margin of appreciation, not "necessary in a democratic society".

E. Overall conclusion

84. To sum up, the implementation of the care decision, but not that decision itself or its maintenance in force, gave rise to a breach of Article 8 (art. 8).

III. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 3 (art. 3) OF THE CONVENTION

85. The applicants alleged that they had been victims of a violation of Article 3 (art. 3) of the Convention, which provides:

> "No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment."

In their view, there had been "inhuman treatment" as a result of:

(a) the taking away of the children without sufficient reason;

(b) the frequent moving of Stefan from one home to another, his ill-treatment at the hands of the Ek family and his placement in an institution run by the Board for the Retarded (see paragraph 17 above);

(c) the manner in which, on one occasion, Stefan and Thomas had been removed, with police assistance, from the applicants' home.

The Government contested these claims.

86. The Commission considered that it had already dealt in its report, in the context of Article 8 (art. 8), with the essential issues raised by point (a) and that no separate issue arose under Article 3 (art. 3). The Court is of the same opinion.

The Court has also already endorsed, in paragraph 80 above, the Commission's finding that the allegation of ill-treatment of Stefan was not substantiated. As regards the other matters relied on by Mr. and Mrs. Olsson in points (b) and (c), these did not, in the Court's view, constitute "inhuman treatment".

87. There has therefore been no breach of Article 3 (art. 3).

IV. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 6 (art. 6) OF THE CONVENTION

88. The applicants submitted that they had not received a "fair hearing" in the domestic judicial proceedings and had accordingly been victims of a breach of Article 6 (art. 6) of the Convention, which, so far as is relevant, provides:

> "In the determination of his civil rights and obligations ..., everyone is entitled to a fair ... hearing ... by [a] ... tribunal ..."

Apart from the complaints as to the practice of the Swedish courts (see paragraph 54 above), reliance was placed on their having heard Dr. Bosaeus as an expert although she had been the Council's expert, the manner in which they took her evidence and, more generally, their alleged failure to make proper enquiries about the applicants' mental health and ability to care for the children.

These claims were contested by the Government and rejected by the Commission.

89. Dr. Bosaeus was heard by the County Administrative Court on two occasions: firstly, on 18 December 1980, as an expert (see paragraph 13 above); secondly, on 4 November 1982, as a witness called at the request of the applicants' lawyer (see paragraph 28 above).

This doctor was one of the co-signatories of the medical report on which the Council's care decision of 16 September 1980 had been partly based (see paragraph 12 above). In a case of this kind, it was reasonable that, with her extensive knowledge of the background, she should have been heard as an expert in 1980. This could have rendered the proceedings unfair only if it were established - which is not the case - that the applicants had been prevented from cross-examining her or calling a counter-expert to rebut her testimony.

The complaint concerning the manner in which Dr. Bosaeus' evidence was taken relates to the 1982 hearing. However, the Court is not satisfied that the matters cited by the applicants - her presence in the court-room before she gave evidence and the County Administrative Court's alleged failure both to remind her of her obligation to tell the truth and to insist that she answered certain questions - are sufficient to show that the proceedings were not fair.

90. As for the applicants' more general allegation, they were at all times represented by a lawyer and were able to submit such material and arguments as they saw fit. The only exception was the Administrative Court of Appeal's refusal to accept their request that Dr. Bosaeus be heard as a witness at its hearing in 1982 (see paragraph 29 above); however, she had already been heard in the County Administrative Court.

Viewing the domestic judicial proceedings as a whole, the Court finds no material to support a conclusion that they were not fair or that the Swedish courts failed to make due and proper enquiries.

91. There was therefore no breach of Article 6 (art. 6).

V. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 14 OF THE CONVENTION, TAKEN TOGETHER WITH ARTICLE 8 (art. 14+8)

92. The applicants asserted that the interferences with their rights had been based not on objective grounds but on their "social origin" and that they had therefore been victims of discrimination contrary to Article 14 of the Convention, taken together with Article 8 (art. 14+8). The former provision reads as follows:

"The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in [the] Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status."

The Commission found nothing in the case-file to substantiate this allegation, which was contested by the Government.

93. The Court shares the view of the Commission and therefore rejects this claim.

VI. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 2 OF PROTOCOL NO. 1 (P1-2)

94. The applicants submitted that there had been a violation of the second sentence of Article 2 of Protocol No. 1 (P1-2) to the Convention, which reads:

"In the exercise of any functions which it assumes in relation to education and to teaching, the State shall respect the right of parents to ensure such education and teaching in conformity with their own religious and philosophical convictions."

They argued that the violation had arisen because:

(a) Thomas had been placed in a family who belonged to a religious denomination and attended church with him (see paragraph 20 above), whereas they did not wish their children to receive a religious upbringing;

(b) the placement of the children so far away from the parents and without consultation as to the choice of foster home deprived the latter of the possibility of influencing the former's education.

The Government contested these claims. The Commission rejected the first and expressed no view on the second.

95. The Court agrees with the Commission that the fact that the children were taken into public care did not cause the applicants to lose all their rights under Article 2 of Protocol No. 1 (P1-2).

It notes, however, as did the Commission, that Mr. and Mrs. Olsson, though describing themselves as atheists, have not left the Church of Sweden (see paragraph 8 above) and that there is no serious indication of their being particularly concerned, except at a rather late stage, with giving the children a non-religious upbringing.

Neither have Mr. and Mrs. Olsson shown that in practice the general education of the children whilst in public care diverged from what they would have wished.

96. In these circumstances, no violation of Article 2 of Protocol No. 1 (P1-2) has been established.

VII. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONVENTION, TAKEN TOGETHER WITH ARTICLE 2 OF PROTOCOL NO. 1 (art. 13+P1-2)

97. The applicants contended that, since no remedy was available to them in respect of the breach of Article 2 of Protocol No. 1 (P1-2) allegedly resulting from Thomas' being given a religious upbringing, they were victims of a breach of Article 13 (art. 13) of the Convention, which provides:

> "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in [the] Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

98. The Court agrees with the Commission and the Government that this claim has to be rejected. Leaving aside the possibility of seeking redress before the County Administrative Board, a parent could, after the entry into force of the 1980 Act, appeal to the County Administrative Court against a placement decision taken by a Social Council (see paragraph 50 in fine above). Both before and after that time, the question of a child's religious upbringing could have been raised and examined in a request for termination of care (see paragraph 49 in fine above). There is nothing to suggest that these remedies, which were apparently not utilised by the applicants as regards Thomas' upbringing, would not have been "effective", within the meaning of Article 13 (art. 13).

VIII. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 50 (art. 50) OF THE CONVENTION

99. Under Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention,

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the ... Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

The applicants claimed under this provision 30,000,000 Swedish crowns (SEK) for non-pecuniary damage, together with reimbursement of legal fees and expenses in the sum of 884,500 SEK. The first-mentioned amount was, unless the Court could order payment to the applicants only, to be paid to them and the children in five equal shares.

A. Damage

100. At the Court's hearing, the Government, whilst reserving their position, indicated that they considered the claim for damage to be excessive. The Commission's Delegate also found the amount claimed to be out of proportion; she suggested that a figure of 300,000 SEK would be reasonable and equitable.

101. The Court considers that, notwithstanding the Government's reservation, this question is ready for decision (Rule 53 § 1 of the Rules of Court). It would first observe that it cannot accept the request, contained in the claims filed by the applicants on 27 July 1987, for an award of just satisfaction to the children: it is only Mr. and Mrs. Olsson who are applicants in the present proceedings.

102. The violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention found by the Court in the instant case arose solely from the manner in which the care decision was implemented (see paragraph 84 above). It follows that the applicants are not entitled to just satisfaction for that decision and the taking away of the children as such, but only for the prejudice which they may have suffered on account of the separation of the children from each other, the placement of Helena and Thomas at a long distance from the applicants' home and the restrictions on visits.

There can be no doubt, in the Court's view, that these matters caused Mr. and Mrs. Olsson considerable inconvenience and, above all, substantial anxiety and distress. Regular and frequent contacts with the children were greatly impeded and the possibilities for the whole family to meet together were minimal. And this situation, with its deleterious effects on the applicants' family life, endured for some seven years.

These various factors do not readily lend themselves to precise quantification. Making an assessment on an equitable basis, as is required by Article 50 (art. 50), the Court awards Mr. and Mrs. Olsson together the sum of 200,000 SEK under this head.

B. Legal fees and expenses

103. The applicants' claim for legal fees and expenses, totalling 884,500 SEK, was made up of the following items:

(a) 630,700 SEK for 901 hours' work by their lawyer (at 700 SEK per hour) in the domestic proceedings and 14,600 SEK for related expenses;

(b) 234,500 SEK for 335 hours' work (at the same rate) in the proceedings before the Commission and the Court and 4,700 SEK for related expenses.

The Government contested this claim in several respects, arguing in particular that: the applicants' statement of the fees and expenses they had incurred in the domestic proceedings was insufficiently precise to permit of anything other than an equitable assessment; the amounts sought in respect of those proceedings related partly to work on questions that were not material to the case before the Strasbourg institutions and partly to work that was unnecessary; the hourly rate charged, though acceptable for the Strasbourg proceedings, was excessive for the domestic proceedings; and the time spent by the applicants' lawyer on the Strasbourg proceedings exceeded what was reasonable. The Government were willing to pay total sums of 290,000 SEK for fees and 12,800 SEK for expenses, subject to a pro rata reduction in respect of such allegations pursued by Mr. and Mrs. Olsson before the Court as it might not sustain.

The Commission's Delegate found the amounts claimed to be very high; she shared many of the observations made by the Government and considered that the sums they proposed constituted a reasonable basis for the Court's assessment.

104. An award may be made under Article 50 (art. 50) in respect of costs and expenses that (a) were actually and necessarily incurred by the injured party in order to seek, through the domestic legal system, prevention or rectification of a violation, to have the same established by the Commission and later by the Court and to obtain redress therefor; and (b) are reasonable as to quantum (see, amongst many authorities, the Feldbrugge judgment of 27 July 1987, Series A no. 124-A, p. 9, § 14).

105. (a) The Court has found that neither the care decision itself nor its maintenance in force gave rise to a breach of Article 8 (art. 8) (see paragraph 84 above). Accordingly, to the extent - which was considerable - that the steps taken by the applicants in the domestic proceedings related to these matters, as distinct from the implementation of the care decision, no award can be made under Article 50 (art. 50) in respect of the fees and expenses involved. Furthermore, some of the costs claimed - for example, those relating to contacts by the applicants' lawyer with journalists for publicity in Sweden and abroad and to her investigation of a murder allegedly committed in the children's home where Stefan was placed - cannot be regarded as "necessarily incurred". Again, others concerned issues falling outside the scope of the case before the Court, such as the prohibition on the removal of Helena and Thomas from their foster homes (see paragraph 57 above).

(b) As regards the fees and expenses referable to the Strasbourg proceedings, the Government did not contest that the applicants had incurred liability to pay sums additional to those covered by the legal aid which they had received from the Council of Europe (see, inter alia, the Inze judgment of 28 October 1987, Series A no. 126, p. 22, § 56). The Court, however, shares the Government's view that the amount claimed is excessive. It also agrees that the sum to be awarded should reflect the fact that some substantial complaints by the applicants remained unsuccessful (see, as the most recent authority, the Johnston and Others judgment of 18 December 1986, Series A no. 112, p. 33, § 86).

106. Taking into account the above factors and also the relevant legal aid payments made by the Council of Europe and making an assessment on an equitable basis, the Court considers that Mr. and Mrs. Olsson are together entitled to be reimbursed, for legal fees and expenses, the sum of 150,000 SEK.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Rejects unanimously the Government's plea concerning the scope of the case;

2. Holds by ten votes to five that the decision to take the children into care and its maintenance in force did not give rise to a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention;

3. Holds by twelve votes to three that there has been a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) on account of the manner in which the said decision was implemented;

4. Holds unanimously that there has been no violation of Article 6 (art. 6) of the Convention;

5. Holds unanimously that there has been no violation of Article 3 (art. 3) of the Convention, of Article 14 of the Convention, taken together with Article 8 (art. 14+8), of Article 2 of Protocol No. 1 (P1-2), or of Article 13 of the Convention, taken together with the said Article 2 (art. 13+P1-2);

6. Holds unanimously that Sweden is to pay to the applicants together, for non-pecuniary damage, 200,000 (two hundred thousand) Swedish crowns and, for legal fees and expenses, 150,000 (one hundred and fifty thousand) Swedish crowns;

7. Rejects unanimously the remainder of the claim for just satisfaction.

Done in English and in French, and delivered at a public hearing in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 24 March 1988.

JOINT PARTLY DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGES RYSSDAL, THÓR VILHJÁLMSSON, AND GÖLCÜKLÜ

As to the alleged violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention, we can subscribe only in part to the finding of the Court.

I. Introduction

The separation of children from their parents through a care decision taken by a State authority is certainly a serious interference with family life. In this respect it is important to protect parents and children against arbitrary intervention. The State concerned must be able to demonstrate that the views and interests of the parents have been duly taken into account and that the whole decision-making process is such as to ensure that the measures adopted are necessary to safeguard the children's interests.

An important feature of the relevant Swedish legislation is the possibility of judicial proceedings before the administrative courts and the competence of those courts to examine fully whether children should be taken into care and how a care decision should be implemented.

It is established that different social authorities had been involved with the Olsson family to a considerable extent prior to the events giving rise to the present case. There had been continuing and intensive contacts, including contacts with Mr. and Mrs. Olsson. Home-therapy had been tried without success. According to the examination of the facts and evidence conducted by the Social District Council and the competent domestic courts, the parents were not able to deal satisfactorily with the children, and in August-September 1980 the latter's needs created some kind of an emergency situation with the result that the Council considered it necessary to take them into care.

II. The care decision

We agree with the Court that the decision to take the children into care and its maintenance in force until 1987 did not give rise to a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention, for the reasons given in paragraphs 71-74 and 75-77, respectively, of the judgment. In this context we would emphasise two facts: firstly, the Council's decision of 16 September 1980 was confirmed by adequately reasoned judgments of the County Administrative Court (30 December 1980) and of the Administrative Court of Appeal (8 July 1981); secondly, the Council's subsequent refusal to terminate care was confirmed by adequately reasoned judgments of the County Administrative Court (17 November 1982) and of the Administrative Court of Appeal (28 December 1982).

III. The implementation of the care decision

Paragraph 78 of the Court's judgment states that the applicants complained of (i) the placement of the children separately and at a long distance from each other and their parents; (ii) the restrictions on and the conditions of visits; and (iii) the conditions in the homes where the children were placed.

First of all we would like to stress - as the Court has also done - that there is nothing to suggest that the Swedish authorities did not act in good faith in implementing the care decision.

As to the last of the complaints listed above, we agree with the Court that it is not established that the quality of the care given to the children in the homes where they were placed was not satisfactory. This complaint must accordingly be rejected.

As to the complaint about the placement, which mainly concerns the placement of Helena and Thomas far away from Gothenburg, we would first say that when a care decision - as in the present case - is to be regarded as a temporary measure, it is generally desirable to place the children in foster homes that are not far away from their parents' home. However, in view of Mr. and Mrs. Olsson's conduct in the autumn of 1980 - their removal and hiding of Stefan -, it was quite reasonable for the Council to consider that Helena and Thomas could not be placed in foster homes in the Gothenburg region. It seems unfortunate that they were placed at so great a distance from Gothenburg, but it may have been difficult to find foster parents able and willing to satisfy the special needs of these two children. In our opinion, the Council's view that it was not appropriate to place both of them in the same foster home has to be accepted. Moreover, we are satisfied that the Council did really try to place them in the same village, but that this became impossible because one of the chosen families in the end declined to receive the child. In any event, the national authorities must enjoy a considerable discretion in this respect, since the decision on such a matter has to be based on an overall appraisal of a number of facts, including the availability of suitable foster homes and the needs of the children taken into care.

As to the restrictions on visits, it should be mentioned that the County Administrative Court confirmed them on two occasions and that, after its decision of 3 October 1985, Mr. and Mrs. Olsson withdrew their appeal on this point in subsequent proceedings before the Administrative Court of Appeal (see paragraph 24 of the European Court's judgment). Moreover, they did not make full use of their entitlement to visit in accordance with the decisions taken and, on the subject of contacts with the children, their whole attitude seems to have been rather negative as regards co-operation with the foster parents and the social authorities (see paragraphs 25 and 26 of the judgment).

In the particular circumstances of the case and taking into account the domestic authorities' margin of appreciation, we have come to the conclusion that the measures taken in implementation of the care decision could reasonably be considered necessary and proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued, and that they accordingly did not give rise to a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention.

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGES PINHEIRO FARINHA, PETTITI, WALSH, RUSSO AND DE MEYER

We take the view that the decisions at issue themselves, as well as their implementation, unjustifiably interfered with the right of the applicants to respect for their family life.

We feel that it cannot be accepted that children can be taken away from their parents without a prior judicial decision, save in cases of emergency.

Moreover, we believe that it has not been shown that in the present case such a measure was really "necessary in a democratic society".

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

COURT (PLENARY)

CASE OF REES v. THE UNITED KINGDOM

(Application no. 9532/81)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

17 October 1986

In the Rees case[*],

The European Court of Human Rights, taking its decision in plenary session in pursuance of Rule 50 of the Rules of Court and composed of the following judges:

Mr. R. RYSSDAL, President,
Mr. Thór VILHJÁLMSSON,
Mrs. D. BINDSCHEDLER-ROBERT,
Mr. G. LAGERGREN,
Mr. F. GÖLCÜKLÜ,
Mr. F. MATSCHER,
Mr. J. PINHEIRO FARINHA,
Mr. L.-E. PETTITI,
Mr. B. WALSH,
Sir Vincent EVANS,
Mr. C. RUSSO,
Mr. R. BERNHARDT,
Mr. J. GERSING,
Mr. A. SPIELMANN,
Mr. A.M. DONNER,

and also of Mr. M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr. H. PETZOLD, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 20 March and on 23 and 25 September 1986,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The present case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 14 March 1985, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 para. 1 and Article 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention"). The case originated in an application (no. 9532/81) against the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, lodged with the Commission in 1979 by a British citizen, Mr. Mark Rees, under Article 25 (art. 25) of the Convention.

[*] Note by the Registrar: The case is numbered 2/1985/88/135. The second figure indicates the year in which the case was referred to the Court and the first figure its place on the list of cases referred in that year; the last two figures indicate, respectively, the case's order on the list of cases and of originating applications (to the Commission) referred to the Court since its creation.

2. The Commission's request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) and to the declaration whereby the United Kingdom recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46). The object of the request was to obtain a decision by the Court as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Articles 8 and 12 (art. 8, art. 12) of the Convention.

3. In response to the inquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 para. 3 (d) of the Rules of Court, the applicant stated that he wished to take part in the proceedings pending before the Court and designated the lawyers who would represent him (Rule 30).

4. The Chamber of seven judges to be constituted included, as ex officio members, Sir Vincent Evans, the elected judge of British nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr. G. Wiarda, the then President of the Court (Rule 21 para. 3 (b) of the Rules of Court). On 27 March 1985, the President drew by lot, in the presence of the Registrar, the names of the five other members, namely Mrs. D. Bindschedler-Robert, Mr. G. Lagergren, Mr. R. Ryssdal, Mr. C. Russo and Mr. R. Bernhardt (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 para. 4) (art. 43).

5. Mr. Wiarda assumed the office of President of the Chamber (Rule 21 para. 5). He ascertained, through the Registrar, the views of the Agent of the United Kingdom Government ("the Government"), the Delegate of the Commission and the lawyers for the applicant regarding the need for a written procedure (Rule 37 para. 1). Thereafter, in accordance with the Orders and directions of the President of the Chamber, the following documents were lodged at the registry:

- on 19 August 1985, the memorial of the Government;
- on 26 August 1985, the memorial of the applicant;
- on 10 March 1986, various documents requested from the Commission.

By letter received on 13 November 1985, the Secretary to the Commission informed the Registrar that the Delegate did not wish to reply in writing to these memorials.

6. After consulting, through the Registrar, the Agent of the Government, the Commission's Delegate and the applicant's representatives, the President of the Chamber directed on 6 January 1986 that the oral proceedings should open on 18 March 1986 (Rule 38).

7. On 24 January 1986, the Chamber decided to relinquish jurisdiction forthwith in favour of the plenary Court (Rule 50), under the presidency of Mr. Wiarda's successor, Mr. Ryssdal.

8. On 21 February and on 13 March 1986, respectively, the Government and the applicant submitted, of their own motion, a number of further documents.

9. The hearings were held in public at the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 18 March 1986. Immediately before they opened, the Court had held a preparatory meeting.

There appeared before the Court:
- for the Government
Mr. M. EATON, Legal Counsellor,
Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Agent,
Mr. N. BRATZA, Barrister-at-Law, Counsel,
Mr. J. NURSAW, Home Office,
Mr. P. LUCAS, Department of Health and Social Security,
Mr. W. JENKINS, Central Register Office, Advisers;
- for the Commission
Mr. B. KIERNAN, Delegate;
- for the applicant
Mr. N. BLAKE, Counsel,
Mr. D. Burgess, Solicitor.

10. The Court heard addresses by Mr. Bratza for the Government, by Mr. Kiernan for the Commission and by Mr. Blake for the applicant, as well as their replies to its questions. At the hearing the Government and the applicant filed a number of other documents.

AS TO THE FACTS

I. THE PARTICULAR CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

11. The applicant, a British citizen born in 1942, lives at Tunbridge Wells in England.

12. At birth the applicant possessed all the physical and biological characteristics of a child of the female sex, and was consequently recorded in the register of births as a female, under the name Brenda Margaret Rees. However, already from a tender age the child started to exhibit masculine behaviour and was ambiguous in appearance. In 1970, after learning that the transsexual state was a medically recognised condition, she sought treatment. She was prescribed methyl testosterone (a hormonal treatment) and started to develop secondary male characteristics.

13. In September 1971, the applicant - who will henceforth be referred to in the masculine - changed his name to Brendan Mark Rees and subsequently, in September 1977, to Mark Nicholas Alban Rees. He has been living as a male ever since. After the change of name, the applicant requested and received a new passport containing his new names. The prefix "Mr." was, however, at that time denied to him.

14. Surgical treatment for physical sexual conversion began in May 1974 with a bilateral masectomy and led to the removal of feminine external characteristics. The costs of the medical treatment, including the surgical procedures, were borne by the National Health Service.

15. The applicant made several unsuccessful efforts from 1973 onwards to persuade Members of Parliament to introduce a Private Member's Bill to resolve the problems of transsexuals. Representations were also made by him, and by a number of Members of Parliament on his behalf, to the Registrar General to secure the alteration of his birth certificate to show his sex as male, but to no avail.

16. On 10 November 1980 his solicitor wrote to the Registrar General making a formal request under Section 29(3) of the Births and Deaths Registration Act 1953, on the ground that there had been "a mistake in completing the Register". In support of his request, the applicant submitted a medical report by Dr. C.N. Armstrong. The report stated that, in Dr. Armstrong's opinion, of the four criteria of sex - namely chromosomal sex, gonadal sex, apparent sex (external genitalia and body form) and psychological sex, the last was the most important as it determined the individual's social activities and role in adult life, and it was also, in his view, pre-determined at birth, though not evident until later in life. Dr. Armstrong considered that as the applicant's psychological sex was male, he should be assigned male.

On 25 November the Registrar General refused the application to alter the Register. He stated that the report on the applicant's psychological sex was not decisive and that, "in the absence of any medical report on the other agreed criteria (chromosomal sex, gonadal sex and apparent sex)", he was "unable to consider whether an error (had been) made at birth registration in that the child was not of the sex recorded". No further evidence in support of the applicant's request was subsequently submitted.

17. The applicant considers himself a man and is socially accepted as such. Except for the birth certificate, all official documents today refer to him by his new name and the prefix "Mr.", where such prefix is used. The prefix was added to his name in his passport in 1984.

II. DOMESTIC LAW AND PRACTICE

A. Medical treatment

18. In the United Kingdom sexual reassignment operations are permitted without legal formalities. The operations and treatment may, as in the case of Mr. Rees, be carried out under the National Health Service.

B. Change of name

19. Under English law a person is entitled to adopt such first names or surname as he or she wishes and to use these new names without any restrictions or formalities, except in connection with the practice of some professions where the use of the new names may be subject to certain formalities (see, inter alia, Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed., vol. 35, para. 1176). For the purposes of record and to obviate the doubt and confusion which a change of name is likely to involve, the person concerned very frequently makes, as did Mr. Rees, a declaration in the form of a "deed poll" which may be enrolled with the Central Office of the Supreme Court.

The new names are valid for purposes of legal identification (see Halsbury's Laws of England, loc. cit., para. 1174) and may be used in documents such as passports, driving licences, car registration books, national insurance cards, medical cards, tax codings and social security papers. The new names are also entered on the electoral roll.

C. Identity documents

20. Civil status certificates or equivalent current identity documents are not in use or required in the United Kingdom. Where some form of identification is needed, this is normally met by the production of a driving licence or a passport. These and other identity documents may, according to the prevailing practice, be issued in the adopted names of the person in question with a minimum of formality. In the case of transsexuals, the documents are also issued so as to be in all respects consistent with the new identity. Thus, the practice is to allow the transsexual to have a current photograph in his or her passport and the prefix "Mr.", "Mrs.", "Ms." or "Miss", as appropriate, before his or her adopted names.

D. The Register of Births

21. The system of civil registration of births, deaths and marriages was established by statute in England and Wales in 1837. Registration of births is at present governed by the Births and Deaths Registration Act 1953 ("the 1953 Act"). The entry into force of this Act entailed no material change to the law in force in 1942, the date of the applicant's birth. The 1953 Act requires that the birth of every child be registered by the Registrar of Births and Deaths for the area in which the child is born. The particulars to be entered are prescribed in regulations made under the 1953 Act.

A birth certificate takes the form either of an authenticated copy of the entry in the register of births or of an extract from the register. A certificate of the latter kind, known as a "short certificate of birth", is in a form prescribed and contains such particulars as are prescribed by regulations made under the 1953 Act. The particulars so prescribed are the name and surname, sex, date of birth and place of birth of the individual.

An entry in a birth register and the certificate derived therefrom are records of facts at the time of the birth. Thus, in England and Wales the birth certificate constitutes a document revealing not current identity, but historical facts. The system is intended to provide accurate and authenticated evidence of the events themselves and also to enable the establishment of the connections of families for purposes related to succession, legitimate descent and distribution of property. The registration records also form the basis for a comprehensive range of vital statistics and constitute an integral and essential part of the statistical study of population and its growth, medical and fertility research and the like.

22. The 1953 Act provides for the correction of clerical errors, such as the incorrect statement or omission of the year of the birth, and for the correction of factual errors; however, in the latter case, an amendment can be made only if the error occurred when the birth was registered. The birth register may also, within twelve months from the date of registration, be altered to give or change the name of a child and re-registration of a birth is permitted where the child has been legitimated. In addition, under the Adoption Act 1958, where a child is adopted, the register of births is to be marked with the word "adopted"; the adoption is also registered in the Adopted Children Register and a short certificate of birth may be obtained which contains no reference to parentage or adoption.

23. The criteria for determining the sex of the person to be registered are not laid down in the 1953 Act nor in any of the regulations made under it. However, the practice of the Registrar General is to use exclusively the biological criteria: chromosomal, gonadal and genital sex. The fact that it becomes evident later in life that the person’s "psychological sex" is at variance with these biological criteria is not considered to imply that the initial entry was a factual error and, accordingly, any request to have the initial entry changed on this ground will be refused. Only in cases of a clerical error, or where the apparent and genital sex of the child was wrongly identified or in case of biological intersex, i.e. cases in which the biological criteria are not congruent, will a change of the initial entry be contemplated and it is necessary to adduce medical evidence that the initial entry was incorrect. However, no error is accepted to exist in the birth entry of a person who undergoes medical and surgical treatment to enable that person to assume the role of the opposite sex.

24. The birth registers and the indexes of all the entries are public. However, the registers themselves are not readily accessible to the general public as identification of the index reference would require prior knowledge not only of the name under which the person concerned was registered, but also of the approximate date and place of birth and the Registration District.

25. The law does not require that the birth certificate be produced for any particular purpose, although it may in practice be requested by certain institutions and employers.

In particular, a birth certificate has in general to accompany a first application for a passport, although not for its renewal or replacement. A birth certificate is also generally (though not invariably) required by insurance companies when issuing pension or annuity policies, but not for the issue of motor or household policies nor, as a rule, for the issue of a life insurance policy. It may also be required when enrolling at a university and when applying for employment, inter alia, with the Government.

E. Marriage

26. In English law, marriage is defined as a voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others (per Lord Penzance in Hyde v. Hyde (1868) Law Reports 1 Probate and Divorce 130, 133). Section 11 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 gives statutory effect to the common-law provision that a marriage is void ab initio if the parties are not respectively male and female.

27. According to the decision of the High Court in Corbett v. Corbett (1971) Probate Reports 83, sex, for the purpose of contracting a valid marriage, is to be determined by the chromosomal, gonadal and genital tests where these are congruent. The relevance of a birth certificate to the question whether a marriage is void only arises as a matter of evidence which goes to the proof of the identity and sex of the person whose birth it certifies. The entry in the birth register is prima facie evidence of the person's sex. It may, however, be rebutted if evidence of sufficient weight to the contrary is adduced.

28. If, for the purpose of procuring a marriage or a certificate or licence for marriage, any person knowingly and wilfully makes a false oath or makes or signs a false declaration, notice or certificate required under any Act relating to marriage, he is guilty of an offence under Section 3 (1) of the Perjury Act 1911. However, a person contracting a marriage abroad is not liable to prosecution under this Act.

F. The legal definition of sex for other purposes

29. The biological definition of sex laid down in Corbett v. Corbett has been followed by English courts and tribunals on a number of occasions and for purposes other than marriage.

The applicant has drawn the Court's attention to the following cases. In one case concerning prostitution, a male to female transsexual, who had undergone both hormone and surgical treatment, was nevertheless treated as a male by the Court of Appeal for the purposes of Section 30 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 and Section 5 of the Sexual Offences Act 1967 (Regina v. Tan and Others 1983, [1983] 2 All England Law Reports 12). In two cases concerning social security legislation, male to female transsexuals were considered by the National Insurance Commissioner as males for the purposes of retirement age; in the first case the person in question had only received hormone therapy, in the second he had involuntarily begun to develop female secondary characteristics at the age of 46, which developments were followed by surgery and adoption of a female social role some 13 years later (cases R (P) 1 and R (P) 2 in the 1980 Volume of National Insurance Commissioner Decisions). Lastly, in a case before an Industrial Tribunal a female to male transsexual, who had not undergone any sex change treatment, was treated as a female by the Tribunal for the purposes of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975; the person in question had sought and received employment in a position reserved for men under the Factories Act, but was dismissed after discovery of her biological sex (White v. British Sugar Corporation Ltd. [1977] Industrial Relations Law Reports p. 121).

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

30. In his application (no. 9532/81) lodged with the Commission on 18 April 1979, Mr. Rees complained that United Kingdom law did not confer on him a legal status corresponding to his actual condition. He invoked Articles 3, 8 and 12 (art. 3, art. 8, art. 12) of the Convention.

31. On 15 March 1984, the Commission declared admissible the complaints under Articles 8 and 12 (art. 8, art. 12). In its report of 12 December 1984, it expressed the unanimous opinion that there had been a breach of Article 8 (art. 8), but not of Article 12 (art. 12). The full text of the Commission's opinion is reproduced as an annex to the present judgment.

FINAL SUBMISSIONS MADE TO THE COURT

32. At the hearing on 18 March 1986, the Government formally invited the Court to reach the conclusion and make the findings (1) that there has been no breach of the right to respect for the private life of the applicant under Article 8 para. 1 (art. 8-1) of the Convention and (2) that there has been no breach of the applicant's right to marry and found a family under Article 12 (art. 12) of the Convention.

The applicant, for his part, asked the Court to find that there had been a breach of both Articles (art. 8, art. 12).

AS TO THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 (art. 8)

33. The applicant claimed to be the victim of national legislation and practices contrary to his right to respect for his private life, enshrined in Article 8 (art. 8), which provides:

> "1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

34. The applicant complained primarily of the constraints upon his full integration into social life which were a result of the failure of the Government to provide measures that would legally constitute him as a male for the purposes of the exhaustive classification of all citizens into male or female.

In particular, he complained of the practice of issuing him with a birth certificate on which his sex continued to be recorded as "female". Such a certificate, he alleged, was effectively an irrebuttable description of his sex, wherever sex was a relevant issue and, revealing as it did the discrepancy between his apparent and his legal sex, it caused him embarrassment and humiliation whenever social practices required its production.

The Government contested the applicant's claim; the Commission, on the other hand, agreed with it in its essentials.

A. Interpretation of Article 8 (art. 8) in the context of the present case

35. The Court has already held on a number of occasions that, although the essential object of Article 8 (art. 8) is to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities, there may in addition be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect for private life, albeit subject to the State's margin of appreciation (see, as the most recent authority, the Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali judgment of 28 May 1985, Series A no. 94, pp. 33-34, para. 67).

In the present case it is the existence and scope of such "positive" obligations which have to be determined. The mere refusal to alter the register of births or to issue birth certificates whose contents and nature differ from those of the birth register cannot be considered as interferences.

36. The Commission and the applicant submitted that the applicant has been socially accepted as a man (see paragraph 17 above) and that, consistently with this, the change in his sexual identity should be given full legal recognition by the United Kingdom. It was only with regard to the choice of the necessary measures that there could be any room for a margin of appreciation, or for any balancing with countervailing public interests.

The Government, on the other hand, maintained that the whole matter depended on the balance that had to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of society as a whole.

37. As the Court pointed out in its above-mentioned Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali judgment the notion of "respect" is not clear-cut, especially as far as those positive obligations are concerned: having regard to the diversity of the practices followed and the situations obtaining in the Contracting States, the notion’s requirements will vary considerably from case to case.

These observations are particularly relevant here. Several States have, through legislation or by means of legal interpretation or by administrative practice, given transsexuals the option of changing their personal status to fit their newly-gained identity. They have, however, made this option subject to conditions of varying strictness and retained a number of express reservations (for example, as to previously incurred obligations). In other States, such an option does not - or does not yet - exist. It would therefore be true to say that there is at present little common ground between the Contracting States in this area and that, generally speaking, the law appears to be in a transitional stage. Accordingly, this is an area in which the Contracting Parties enjoy a wide margin of appreciation.

In determining whether or not a positive obligation exists, regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the general interest of the community and the interests of the individual, the search for which balance is inherent in the whole of the Convention (see, mutatis mutandis, amongst others, the James and Others judgment of 21 February 1986, Series A no. 98, p. 34, para. 50, and the Sporrong and Lönnroth judgment of 23 September 1982, Series A no. 52, p. 26, para. 69). In striking this balance the aims mentioned in the second paragraph of Article 8 (art. 8-2) may be of a certain relevance, although this provision refers in terms only to "interferences" with the right protected by the first paragraph - in other words is concerned with the negative obligations flowing therefrom (see, mutatis mutandis, the Marckx judgment of 13 June 1979, Series A no. 31, p. 15, para. 31).

B. Compliance with Article 8 (art. 8)

38. Transsexualism is not a new condition, but its particular features have been identified and examined only fairly recently. The developments that have taken place in consequence of these studies have been largely promoted by experts in the medical and scientific fields who have drawn attention to the considerable problems experienced by the individuals concerned and found it possible to alleviate them by means of medical and surgical treatment. The term "transsexual" is usually applied to those who, whilst belonging physically to one sex, feel convinced that they belong to the other; they often seek to achieve a more integrated, unambiguous identity by undergoing medical treatment and surgical operations to adapt their physical characteristics to their psychological nature. Transsexuals who have been operated upon thus form a fairly well-defined and identifiable group.

39. In the United Kingdom no uniform, general decision has been adopted either by the legislature or by the courts as to the civil status of post-operative transsexuals. Moreover, there is no integrated system of civil status registration, but only separate registers for births, marriages, deaths and adoption. These record the relevant events in the manner they occurred without, except in special circumstances (see paragraph 22 above), mentioning changes (of name, address, etc.) which in other States are registered.

40. However, transsexuals, like anyone else in the United Kingdom, are free to change their first names and surnames at will (see paragraph 19 above). Similarly, they can be issued with official documents bearing their chosen first names and surnames and indicating, if their sex is mentioned at all, their preferred sex by the relevant prefix (Mr., Mrs., Ms. or Miss) (see paragraph 20 above). This freedom gives them a considerable advantage in comparison with States where all official documents have to conform with the records held by the registry office.

Conversely, the drawback - emphasised by the applicant - is that, as the country’s legal system makes no provision for legally valid civil-status certificates, such persons have on occasion to establish their identity by means of a birth certificate which is either an authenticated copy of or an extract from the birth register. The nature of this register, which furthermore is public, is that the certificates mention the biological sex which the individuals had at the time of their birth (see paragraphs 21 and 24 above). The production of such a birth certificate is not a strict legal requirement, but may on occasion be required in practice for some purposes (see paragraph 25 above).

It is also clear that the United Kingdom does not recognise the applicant as a man for all social purposes. Thus, it would appear that, at the present stage of the development of United Kingdom law, he would be regarded as a woman, inter alia, as far as marriage, pension rights and certain employments are concerned (see paragraphs 27 and 29 above). The existence of the unamended birth certificate might also prevent him from entering into certain types of private agreements as a man (see paragraph 25 above).

41. For the applicant and the Commission this situation was incompatible with Article 8 (art. 8), there being in their opinion no justification for it on any ground of public interest. They submitted that the refusal of the Government to amend or annotate the register of births to record the individual's change of sexual identity and to enable him to be given a birth certificate showing his new identity cannot be justified on any such ground. Such a system of annotation would, according to the applicant, be similar to that existing in the case of adoptions. The applicant and the Commission pointed to the example of certain other Contracting States which have recently made provision for the possibility of having the original indication of sex altered from a given date. The Commission additionally relied on the fact that the United Kingdom, through its free national health service, had borne the costs of the surgical operations and other medical treatment which the applicant had been enabled to undergo. They considered that this medical recognition of the necessity to assist him to realise his identity must be regarded as a further argument for the legal recognition of the change in his sexual identity; failure to do so had the effect that the applicant was treated as an ambiguous being.

42. The Court is not persuaded by this reasoning.

(a) To require the United Kingdom to follow the example of other Contracting States is from one perspective tantamount to asking that it should adopt a system in principle the same as theirs for determining and recording civil status.

Albeit with delay and some misgivings on the part of the authorities, the United Kingdom has endeavoured to meet the applicant's demands to the fullest extent that its system allowed. The alleged lack of respect therefore seems to come down to a refusal to establish a type of documentation showing, and constituting proof of, current civil status. The introduction of such a system has not hitherto been considered necessary in the United Kingdom. It would have important administrative consequences and would impose new duties on the rest of the population. The governing authorities in the United Kingdom are fully entitled, in the exercise of their margin of appreciation, to take account of the requirements of the situation pertaining there in determining what measures to adopt. While the requirement of striking a fair balance, as developed in paragraph 37 above, may possibly, in the interests of persons in the applicant's situation, call for incidental adjustments to the existing system, it cannot give rise to any direct obligation on the United Kingdom to alter the very basis thereof.

(b) Interpreted somewhat more narrowly, the applicant's complaint might be seen as a request to have such an incidental adjustment in the form of an annotation to the present birth register.

Whilst conceding that additions can be made to the entries in the birth register in order to record, for example, subsequent adoption or legitimation (see paragraphs 22-23 above), the Government disputed that the proposed annotation was comparable to additions of this kind. They submitted that, in the absence of any error or omission at the time of birth, the making of an alteration to the register as to the sex of the individual would constitute a falsification of the facts contained therein and would be misleading to other persons with a legitimate interest in being informed of the true situation. They contended that the demands of the public interest weighed strongly against any such alteration.

The Court notes that the additions at present permitted as regards adoption and legitimation also concern events occurring after birth and that, in this respect, they are not different from the annotation sought by the applicant. However, they record facts of legal significance and are designed to ensure that the register fulfils its purpose of providing an authoritative record for the establishment of family ties in connection with succession, legitimate descent and the distribution of property. The annotation now being requested would, on the other hand, establish only that the person concerned henceforth belonged to the other sex. Furthermore, the change so recorded could not mean the acquisition of all the biological characteristics of the other sex. In any event, the annotation could not, without more, constitute an effective safeguard for ensuring the integrity of the applicant's private life, as it would reveal his change of sexual identity.

43. The applicant has accordingly also asked that the change, and the corresponding annotation, be kept secret from third parties.

However, such secrecy could not be achieved without first modifying fundamentally the present system for keeping the register of births, so as to prohibit public access to entries made before the annotation. Secrecy could also have considerable unintended results and could prejudice the purpose and function of the birth register by complicating factual issues arising in, inter alia, the fields of family and succession law. Furthermore, no account would be taken of the position of third parties, including public authorities (e.g. the armed services) or private bodies (e.g. life insurance companies) in that they would be deprived of information which they had a legitimate interest to receive.

44. In order to overcome these difficulties there would have to be detailed legislation as to the effects of the change in various contexts and as to the circumstances in which secrecy should yield to the public interest. Having regard to the wide margin of appreciation to be afforded the State in this area and to the relevance of protecting the interests of others in striking the requisite balance, the positive obligations arising from Article 8 (art. 8) cannot be held to extend that far.

45. This conclusion is not affected by the fact, on which both the Commission and the applicant put a certain emphasis, that the United Kingdom cooperated in the applicant's medical treatment.

If such arguments were adopted too widely, the result might be that Government departments would become over-cautious in the exercise of their functions and the helpfulness necessary in their relations with the public could be impaired. In the instant case, the fact that the medical services did not delay the giving of medical and surgical treatment until all legal aspects of persons in the applicant's situation had been fully investigated and resolved, obviously benefited him and contributed to his freedom of choice.

46. Accordingly, there is no breach of Article 8 (art. 8) in the circumstances of the present case.

47. That being so, it must for the time being be left to the respondent State to determine to what extent it can meet the remaining demands of transsexuals. However, the Court is conscious of the seriousness of the problems affecting these persons and the distress they suffer. The Convention has always to be interpreted and applied in the light of current circumstances (see, mutatis mutandis, amongst others, the Dudgeon judgment of 22 October 1981, Series A no. 45, pp. 23-24, paragraph 60). The need for appropriate legal measures should therefore be kept under review having regard particularly to scientific and societal developments.

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 12 (art. 12)

48. The applicant complained of the undisputed fact that, according to the law currently in force in the United Kingdom, he cannot marry a woman. He alleged a violation of Article 12 (art. 12), which provides:

> "Men and women of marriageable age have the right to marry and to found a family, according to the national laws governing the exercise of this right."

The Government contested this; the Commission was divided between two conflicting views.

49. In the Court's opinion, the right to marry guaranteed by Article 12 (art. 12) refers to the traditional marriage between persons of opposite biological sex. This appears also from the wording of the Article which makes it clear that Article 12 (art. 12) is mainly concerned to protect marriage as the basis of the family.

50. Furthermore, Article 12 (art. 12) lays down that the exercise of this right shall be subject to the national laws of the Contracting States. The limitations thereby introduced must not restrict or reduce the right in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right is impaired. However, the legal impediment in the United Kingdom on the marriage of persons who are not of the opposite biological sex cannot be said to have an effect of this kind.

51. There is accordingly no violation in the instant case of Article 12 (art. 12) of the Convention.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Holds by twelve votes to three that there is no violation of Article 8 (art. 8);

2. Holds unanimously that there is no violation of Article 12 (art. 12).

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGES BINDSCHEDLER-ROBERT, RUSSO AND GERSING

(Translation)

1. With regard to Article 8 (art. 8), the applicant complained that the Government had not taken the necessary measures to ensure recognition of his sexual identity in all the circumstances in which this could be of importance. In particular, he criticised the Government for continuing to issue him with a birth certificate showing that he was of the female sex, without any further explanation. The Commission considered that the United Kingdom had failed to respect the applicant's private life as required under Article 8 para. 1 (art. 8-1) of the Convention, because it had not made any provision for measures which would make it possible to take account, in the applicant's civil status, of any legitimate changes. In what follows, it seems to us that we can accordingly concentrate on the question whether respect for Mr. Rees's private life entails certain measures being taken by the State with respect to the way in which civil-status documents concerning him are drawn up.

2. The operations Mr. Rees underwent and the concomitant anguish and suffering show how real and intense was his desire to adopt a new sexual identity as far as possible. We agree with the majority, moreover, that the United Kingdom endeavoured to go a considerable way towards meeting the applicants's demands, for example by giving him - like everyone else - the opportunity of changing his name, by giving him a passport which showed his new sexual identity and by allowing him to a large extent to adopt socially the male role corresponding to his innermost inclinations and to his new sexual appearance.

3. With regard to one thing - his birth certificate - however, the British authorities did not feel bound or able to take Mr. Rees's new identity into account. In practice, though, it appears necessary to produce a birth certificate in connection with a number of formalities, such as applying for a passport for the first time or enrolling at university. This has resulted - and may again result - in the applicant's having to face distressing situations which amount to an interference with his private life and thus to a breach of Article 8 (art. 8). We are of the view that this could be avoided by means of an annotation in the birth register to the effect that there had been a change in Mr. Rees's sexual identity; at the same time, it could be made possible for the applicant to obtain a short certificate which would indicate only his new sexual identity and thus make it easier to safeguard the inviolability of his private life. We recognise, moreover, that in this sphere the State has a wide margin of appreciation as regards the method to be used in order to remedy the situation in question and we do not in any way rule out the possibility that other measures might achieve the same aim. It will be remembered, for instance, that on 5 October 1982 the Commission endorsed a friendly settlement between a group of applicants and Italy (application no. 9420/81) whereby as a result of an Act recently passed in Italy, the applicants can henceforth secure rectification of their civil status.

4. We do not, on the other hand, consider that Article 8 (art. 8) requires that Mr. Rees be guaranteed secrecy in the sense that only his new sexual identity should appear in all official documents: the birth register is public and there is certainly a public interest in its remaining so.

5. A variety of objections, which seem to us unconvincing, have been made to this conclusion that it is necessary to reflect Mr. Rees's change of sexual identity in official documents concerning him.

(a) There is obviously no question of correcting the registers by concealing the historical truth or of claiming that Mr. Rees has changed sex in the biological sense of the term. The idea is merely (as already happens in the United Kingdom in other cases - for example, with adoption) to mention a development in the person's status due to changes in his apparent sex - what we have called his sexual identity - and to give him the opportunity to obtain a short certificate which does not disclose his previous status. This would better reflect the real situation and to that extent would even be in the public interest.

(b) The arrangement we envisage would certainly not solve all Mr. Rees's problems and would not entirely fulfil his hopes, but it would lessen his difficulties. At all events it would remove the current discrepancy, firstly, between the various identity documents he has to use and, secondly, between his current appearance and the entry relating to his sex in his birth certificate.

(c) Nor does it seem to us that an annotation in the birth register would entail any kind of change in the British system of recording civil status; the practice in other States has shown that this was not an inevitable consequence.

(d) In rejecting the arrangement we recommend, the majority of the Court also relies on the fact that the aforementioned annotation would not relate to facts of legal significance, unlike the case with adoption and legitimation. It may be said against this argument that the annotation in question would also certainly have legal significance even if it was not expressly provided for in law, in that it would imply that in all situations where the apparent sex was decisive (work, retirement, etc.), Mr. Rees should be treated as an individual of the male sex.

6. As regards the alleged breach of Article 12 (art. 12), we share the view of the majority.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

REKVÉNYI v. HUNGARY

(Application no. 25390/94)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

20 May 1999

In the case of Rekvényi v. Hungary,

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 27 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention"), as amended by Protocol No. 11[1], and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Court[2], as a Grand Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr L. WILDHABER, President,
Mrs E. PALM,
Sir Nicolas BRATZA,
Mr A. PASTOR RIDRUEJO,
Mr G. BONELLO,
Mr J. MAKARCZYK,
Mr P. KŪRIS,
Mr R. TÜRMEN,
Mrs F. TULKENS,
Mrs V. STRÁŽNICKÁ,
Mr M. FISCHBACH,
Mr V. BUTKEVYCH,
Mr J. CASADEVALL,
Mrs H.S. GREVE,
Mr A.B. BAKA,
Mr R. MARUSTE,
Mrs S. BOTOUCHAROVA,

and also of Mr P.J. MAHONEY, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 28 January, 1 February and 21 April 1999,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court, as established under former Article 19 of the Convention[3], by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 15 September 1998, by a Hungarian national, Mr László Rekvényi ("the applicant"), on 21 September 1998 and by the Hungarian Government ("the Government") on 5 October 1998, within the three-month period laid down by former Articles 32 § 1 and 47 of the

Notes by the Registry
1-2. Protocol No. 11 and the Rules of Court came into force on 1 November 1998.
3. Since the entry into force of Protocol No. 11, which amended Article 19, the Court has functioned on a permanent basis.

Convention. It originated in an application (no. 25390/94) against the Republic of Hungary lodged with the Commission under former Article 25 by Mr Rekvényi on 20 April 1994.

The Commission's request referred to former Articles 44 and 48 of the Convention and to the declaration whereby Hungary recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (former Article 46); the applicant's application referred to former Article 48 as amended by Protocol 9[1], which Hungary had ratified; the Government's application referred to former Article 48. The object of the request and of the applications was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention taken either alone or together with Article 14.

2. The applicant designated the lawyer who would represent him (Rule 31 of former Rules of Court B[2]).

3. As President of the Chamber which had originally been constituted (former Article 43 of the Convention and former Rule 21) in order to deal in particular with procedural matters that might arise before the entry into force of Protocol No. 11, Mr R. Bernhardt, the President of the Court at the time, acting through the Registrar, consulted the Agent of the Government, the applicant's lawyer and the Delegate of the Commission on the organisation of the written procedure. Pursuant to the order made in consequence, the Registrar received the applicant's memorial on 30 November 1998. The Government replied on 9 December 1998.

4. After the entry into force of Protocol No. 11 on 1 November 1998 and in accordance with Article 5 § 5 thereof, the case was referred to the Grand Chamber of the Court. The Grand Chamber included ex officio Mr A.B. Baka, the judge elected in respect of Hungary (Article 27 § 2 of the Convention and Rule 24 § 4 of the Rules of Court), Mr L. Wildhaber, the President of the Court, Mrs E. Palm, Vice-President of the Court, Sir Nicolas Bratza, President of Section, and Mr M. Fischbach, Vice-President of Section (Article 27 § 3 of the Convention and Rule 24 §§ 3 and 5 (a)). The other members appointed to complete the Grand Chamber were Mr A. Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G. Bonello, Mr J. Makarczyk, Mr P. Kūris, Mr R. Türmen, Mrs F. Tulkens, Mrs V. Strážnická, Mr V. Butkevych, Mr J. Casadevall, Mrs H.S. Greve, Mr R. Maruste and Mrs S. Botoucharova (Rules 24 § 3 and 100 § 4).

Notes by the Registry

1. Protocol No. 9 came into force on 1 October 1994 and was repealed by Protocol No. 11.
2. Rules of Court B, which came into force on 2 October 1994, applied until 31 October 1998 to all cases concerning States bound by Protocol No. 9.

5. At the Court's invitation (Rule 99), the Commission delegated one of its members, Mrs M. Hion, to take part in the proceedings before the Grand Chamber.

6. In accordance with the President's decision, a hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 28 January 1999.

There appeared before the Court:

(a) for the Government
Mr L. HÖLTZL, Deputy Secretary of State, Agent,
Mr T. BÁN, Co-Agent,
Mr Z. TALLÓDI,
Ms M. WELLER, Advisers;

(b) for the applicant
Mr V. MASENKO-MAVI, of the Budapest Bar, Counsel;

(c) for the Commission
Ms M. HION, Delegate,
Ms M.-T. SCHOEPFER, Secretary to the Commission.

THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

7. At the material time, the applicant was a police officer and the Secretary General of the Police Independent Trade Union.

8. On 24 December 1993 Law no. 107 of 1993 on certain amendments to the Constitution (az Alkotmány módosításáról szóló 1993. évi CVII. törvény) was published in the Hungarian Official Gazette. This Law amended, inter alia, Article 40/B § 4 of the Constitution to the effect that, as from 1 January 1994, members of the armed forces, the police and security services were prohibited from joining any political party and from engaging in any political activity (see paragraph 13 below for the text of the Article).

9. In a circular letter dated 28 January 1994, the Head of the National Police requested, in view of the forthcoming parliamentary elections, that police officers refrain from political activities. He referred to Article 40/B § 4 of the Constitution as amended by Law no. 107 of 1993. He indicated that those who wished to pursue political activities would have to leave the police.

10. In a second circular letter dated 16 February 1994, the Head of the National Police declared that no exemption could be given from the prohibition contained in Article 40/B § 4 of the Constitution.

11. On 9 March 1994 the Police Independent Trade Union filed a constitutional complaint with the Constitutional Court claiming that Article 40/B § 4 of the Constitution, as amended by Law no. 107 of 1993, infringed constitutional rights of career members of the police, was contrary to the generally recognised rules of international law and had been adopted by Parliament unconstitutionally.

12. On 11 April 1994 the Constitutional Court dismissed the constitutional complaint, holding that it had no competence to annul a provision of the Constitution itself.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW

13. The relevant Articles of the Constitution of the Republic of Hungary (Law no. 20 of 1949, as amended on several occasions) provide:

Article 40/B § 4 (as in force since 1 January 1994)

"Career members of the armed forces, the police and the civil national security services shall not join any political party and shall not engage in any political activity."

"A fegyveres erők, a rendőrség és a polgári nemzetbiztonsági szolgálatok hivatásos állományú tagjai nem lehetnek tagjai pártnak és politikai tevékenységet nem folytathatnak."

Article 61 § 1 (as in force since 23 October 1989)

"In the Republic of Hungary everyone shall have the right to freedom of expression and to receive and impart information of public interest."

"A Magyar Köztársaságban mindenkinek joga van a szabad véleménynyilvánításra, továbbá arra, hogy a közérdekű adatokat megismerje, illetőleg terjessze."

Article 78 § 1

"… [T]he Government shall ensure that the provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of Hungary are implemented."

"A Magyar Köztársaság alkotmánya … végrehajtásáról a Kormány gondoskodik."

Article 78 § 2

"The Government shall submit to Parliament such bills as are necessary to implement the Constitution."

"A Kormány köteles az alkotmány végrehajtásához szükséges törvényjavaslatokat az Országgyűlés elé terjeszteni."

14. Law no. 17 of 1989 on referenda, as in force at the material time, provided:

Section 1(4)

"No signatures may be collected … from persons serving in the armed forces or armed bodies on station or while such persons are discharging their duties …"

"Nem gyűjthető aláírás … fegyveres erőknél és fegyveres testületeknél szolgálati viszonyban levő személyektől, a szolgálati helyen vagy szolgálati feladat teljesítése közben …"

Section 2(1)

"Citizens eligible to vote or stand in elections … shall have the right to participate in referenda …"

"A népszavazásban … való részvételre választójoggal rendelkező állampolgárok … jogosultak."

15. Law no. 34 of 1989 (as amended on several occasions) on parliamentary elections, as in force at the material time, provided:

Section 2(1)

"In the Republic of Hungary every Hungarian citizen … who has attained his [or her] majority (hereinafter: "constituent") shall have the right to vote in parliamentary elections."

"A Magyar Köztársaságban az országgyűlési képviselők választásán választójoga van … minden nagykorú magyar állampolgárnak (a továbbiakban: választópolgár)."

Section 2(3)

"Everyone who is entitled to vote and has a permanent residence in Hungary shall be entitled to stand for election."

"Mindenki választható, aki választójoggal rendelkezik és állandó lakóhelye Magyarországon van."

Section 5(1)

"Constituents … of each individual constituency shall be entitled to nominate candidates [in relation to that constituency] …"

"Az egyéni választókerületben a választópolgárok … jelölhetnek.…"

Section 10(1)

"Constituents shall be entitled to collect nomination coupons, expound election programmes, promote candidates and organise election campaign meetings …"

"Bármely választópolgár gyűjthet jelöltet ajánló szelvényeket, ismertethet választási programot, népszerűsíthet jelöltet, szervezhet választási gyűlést …"

Section 10(3)

"Nomination coupons may not be collected … from persons serving in the armed forces or armed bodies … on station or while such persons are discharging their duties …"

"Nem gyűjthető jelöltet ajánló szelvény … a fegyveres erőknél, a rendőrségnél … szolgálati viszonyban lévő személytől, a szolgálati helyen vagy szolgálati feladat teljesítése közben …"

16. Law no. 55 of 1990 on the legal status of members of Parliament, as in force at the material time, provided:

Section 1(1)

"Employers of employees who are candidates in parliamentary elections … shall grant them unpaid leave on request from the moment of their registration as candidates until the end of the elections or, where they are elected, until they take up their seat."

"Az országgyűlési képviselő … jelöltet jelöltségének nyilvántartásba vételétől a választásának befejezéséig, illetve megválasztása esetén a mandátuma igazolásáig a munkáltató – kérésére – köteles fizetés nélküli szabadságban részesíteni."

Section 1(4) (as in force until 30 September 1994)

"Paragraph 1 … [of Section 1] shall apply as appropriate to candidates … serving … in the … police …"

"A … rendőrségnél … szolgálati viszonyban … álló képviselőjelöltre az [1.§] (1) … bekezdés rendelkezéseit kell megfelelően alkalmazni."

Section 8(1) (as in force until 3 April 1997)

"A member of Parliament … shall put an end to any situation incompatible with his office within a period of thirty days from the moment he takes up his seat …"

"A képviselő a mandátuma érvényességének megállapításától … számított harminc napon belül köteles a vele szemben fennálló összeférhetetlenségi okot megszüntetni …"

17. Law no. 64 of 1990 on the election of members of local authorities and mayors, as in force at the material time, provided:

Section 23(1)

"Constituents shall be entitled to expound election programmes, canvass on behalf of candidates or organise election campaign meetings … from the thirty-fifth day prior to the date of the elections."

"Bármely választópolgár – a szavazást megelőző 35. naptól – ismertethet választási programot, népszerűsíthet jelöltet, szervezhet választási gyűlést …"

Section 25(1)

"A constituent who exercises his right to vote in an individual constituency shall be entitled to nominate candidates [in relation to that constituency] …"

"Jelöltet ajánlhat az a választópolgár, aki a választókerületben választójogát gyakorolhatja …"

18. Law no. 34 of 1994 on the police ("the 1994 Police Act"), which entered into force on 1 October 1994, provides:

Section 2(3)

"The police shall discharge their duties in a manner free from any party influence."

"A Rendőrség a feladatának ellátása során pártbefolyástól mentesen jár el."

Section 7(9)

"If a police officer wishes to stand as a candidate in elections to Parliament, to a local authority or to the office of mayor, he shall in advance notify the head of the police department [concerned] of his intention to do so. In such cases his service shall be suspended from the sixtieth day preceding the elections until the day on which the results of the elections are published."

"Ha a rendőr országgyűlési vagy helyi önkormányzati képviselői, illetőleg polgármesteri választáson jelöltként indul, köteles e szándékát a rendőri szerv vezetőjének előzetesen bejelenteni. A választás napját megelőző 60. naptól kezdődően a választás eredményének közzétételéig a szolgálati jogviszonya szünetel."

Section 7(10)

"Police officers shall have the right to join professional or other organisations which are aimed at protecting or representing their interests and are related to their professional duties, and to hold office therein; they shall not suffer any disadvantage in their careers on account of their membership and activity. Police officers shall inform the head of the police department [concerned] of their existing or intended membership of organisations unrelated to their professional duties. The head of the police department [concerned] may prohibit the police officer in question from becoming or remaining a member of such organisation if it is incompatible with the profession or duties of a police officer, or if it interferes with or endangers the interests of the force. Such a prohibition shall take the form of a decision. An appeal against such a decision lies to the head of the superior police authority. The decision of the superior authority on the appeal may be challenged in the courts."

"A rendőr a hivatásával összefüggő szakmai, érdekvédelmi, érdekképviseleti szervezetnek tagja lehet, abban tisztséget vállalhat, e tagsági viszonya és tevékenysége miatt szolgálati jogviszonya körében hátrányt nem szenvedhet. A rendőr köteles a hivatásával össze nem függő társadalmi szervezettel fennálló, illetőleg az újonnan létesülő tagsági viszonyt előzetesen a rendőri szerv vezetőjéhez bejelenteni. A rendőri szerv vezetője a tagsági viszony fenntartását vagy létesítését megtilthatja, ha az a rendőri hivatással vagy szolgálati beosztással nem egyeztethető össze, illetőleg a szolgálat érdekeit sérti vagy veszélyezteti. E döntést határozatba kell foglalni. A határozat ellen a felettes szerv vezetőjénél panasszal lehet élni. A felettes szervnek a panasz kivizsgálása eredményeként hozott határozata a bíróság előtt megtámadható."

19. Decree no. 1/1990 of 10 January 1990 of the Minister of the Interior ("the 1990 Regulations"), which laid down service regulations for the police, was in force until 30 March 1995 and provided:

Regulation 430

"… No party political activity may be carried out on police premises; no questions related to party politics shall be discussed during staff meetings."

"… A rendőrségen pártpolitikai tevékenység nem folytatható, munkahelyi értekezleteken pártpolitikai kérdések nem tárgyalhatók."

Regulation 432

"With the exception of political parties, police officers shall … be entitled to form and maintain social organisations [társadalmi szervezet] (trade unions, mass movements, organisations protecting their interests, associations, etc.) provided that their aims are not contrary to the legal provisions and rules regulating police service."

"Rendőrök önmagukból – párt kivételével – … a szolgálati viszonyra vonatkozó jogszabályokkal, rendelkezésekkel nem ellentétes célú társadalmi szervezetet létrehozhatnak és működtethetnek (szakszervezet, tömegmozgalom, érdekképviseleti szervezet, egyesület stb.)."

Regulation 433

"Police officers shall be entitled to join any social organisation [társadalmi szervezet], including a political party, which has been lawfully founded and registered by a court. Police officers shall not enjoy any advantage or suffer any detriment in their career on account of their membership of an organisation or their party affiliation."

"A rendőr bármely törvényesen megalakult, illetve bíróság által nyilvántartásba vett társadalmi szervezetnek – beleértve a politikai pártot is – tagja lehet. Szervezeti hovatartozása, pártállása miatt szolgálati viszonya keretében semmiféle előnyben vagy hátrányban nem részesíthető."

Regulation 434

"Party badges and symbols shall not be displayed on police premises. While on duty, police officers shall refrain from wearing badges showing their political preference."

"A rendőrség hivatali helyiségeiben, körleteiben pártok jelvényei, jelképei nem helyezhetők el. A rendőr szolgálatban politikai hovatartozására utaló jelvényt nem viselhet."

Regulation 435

"Police officers shall not engage in activities as experts or advisers in relation to questions of police service upon request from political parties unless authorised to do so by the Minister of the Interior."

"A rendőr pártok részére a rendőri szolgálattal összefüggő kérdésekben szakértői, szaktanácsadó feladatokat csak a belügyminiszter engedélyével végezhet."

Regulation 437

"On police premises the exercise of the right to freedom of assembly is subject to the approval of the common superior of all the organisers [of any assembly]."

"A rendőrség objektumaiban a gyülekezési jog csak a szervezők közös elöljáróinak engedélyével gyakorolható."

Regulation 438

"Police officers shall have the right to participate in lawfully organised … gatherings (such as peaceful assemblies, processions and demonstrations) in their leisure time. On such occasions they shall refrain from wearing uniform unless the aim of the gathering is the representation or protection of interests related to [police] service. They shall refrain from carrying their service gun or other firearms lawfully in their possession. Where the gathering is ordered to be dissolved, they shall immediately leave."

"A rendőr szabad idejében részt vehet a … jogszerűen tartott rendezvényen (békés összejövetelen, felvonuláson, tüntetésen). Ilyen esetben egyenruhát csak akkor viselhet, ha a rendezvény célja a szolgálati viszonnyal összefüggő érdekek képviselete, védelme. Szolgálati vagy más jogszerűen tartott lőfegyverét nem tarthatja magánál. Ha a rendezvény feloszlatására kerül sor, köteles a helyszínt azonnal önként elhagyni."

Regulation 470

"Police officers shall … be entitled to make statements upon request from the press or radio or television stations on questions related to road safety, public safety or certain offences provided that, [in so doing,] they maintain the confidentiality of service secrets, observe the principle of the presumption of innocence, respect personality rights [személyiséghez fűződő jogok] and do not prejudice the examination and investigation of cases …"

"A rendőr, a sajtó, a rádió és a televízió megkeresése alapján a közlekedés-, a közbiztonság kérdéseiről, egyes bűncselekményekről, a szolgálati titok megőrzésével, az ügyek vizsgálatának és felderítésének veszélyeztetése nélkül, valamint az ártatlanság vélelmének figyelembe vételével és a személyiséghez fűződő jogok tiszteletben tartásával … nyilatkozhat …"

Regulation 472

"… [Police officers] shall be entitled to give lectures on – or to participate in radio or television programmes concerning – politics, science, literature or sport without prior authorisation but on condition that no reference is made to their police service."

"… [A rendőr] politikai, tudományos, szépirodalmi és sport témájú előadásokat, szereplést (a rádióban és a televízióban is) engedély nélkül vállalhat rendőri állására való utalás nélkül."

Regulation 473

"Police officers shall have the right to make statements and publish articles in Ministry of the Interior publications without permission, while observing the rules on service and official secrets."

"A Belügyminisztérium lapjaiban a szolgálati- és az államtitokra vonatkozó szabályok betartásával a rendőr engedély nélkül nyilatkozhat és publikálhat."

Regulation 474

"Police officers shall not be entitled to publish textbooks and documentary literature related to police activities save with prior authorisation …"

"A rendőri vonatkozású kérdéseket tárgyaló szak- és tényirodalmi művet a rendőr csak előzetes engedéllyel jelentetheti meg …"

Regulation 477

"Police officers shall be entitled to publish works of fiction … and works on science, politics or sport … that are unrelated to police activities without permission but on condition that no reference is made to their police service."

"A rendőr – a rendőri állásra való utalás nélkül – szabadon közölheti, illetve kiadhatja a nem rendőri vonatkozású szépirodalmi …, tudományos, politikai kérdéseket tárgyaló, sporttal foglalkozó műveit …"

20. Decree no. 3/1995 of 1 March 1995 of the Minister of the Interior ("the 1995 Regulations"), which was adopted under the 1994 Police Act in order to implement its provisions and which laid down service regulations for the police, entered into force on 31 March 1995. It provides:

Section 106(5)

"Police officers, in their capacity as representatives of the police or experts, shall not give statements to the press or participate in radio or television programmes or in films, unless permitted to do so by the Head of the National Police or one of his deputies. No permission is needed for giving scientific or cultural lectures or for other public appearances of a similar nature (including participation in radio or television programmes) if no reference is made to police service."

"A rendőr a rendőrség képviselőjeként, szakértőjeként a sajtóban, a rádió és televízió műsoraiban, filmekben csak az országos rendőrfőkapitány, illetve helyettesei előzetes hozzájárulásával szerepelhet. A rendőri állásra utalás nélkül tartott tudományos, kulturális előadások megtartásához, ilyen irányú egyéb közszerepléshez beleértve a rádióban és televízióban történő szereplést is) engedély nem kell."

Section 106(6)

"Police officers shall have the right to make statements and publish articles in police publications without permission, while observing the rules on service and official secrets."

"A rendőrség lapjaiban a szolgálati és az államtitokra vonatkozó szabályok betartásával a rendőr engedély nélkül nyilatkozhat és publikálhat."

Section 106(9)

"Members of the police force, in their capacity as police officers, shall not make public appearances unless authorised to do so by the head of the police department. On such occasions police officers shall refrain from making political statements and shall evince a neutral attitude towards any social organisation [társadalmi szervezetek]."

"Nyilvános szerepléshez (ha az rendőrként történik) engedélyt kell kérni a rendőrfőkapitánytól. A rendőr ilyen közéleti szereplése során tartózkodjék a politikai nyilatkozatoktól, magatartása a társadalmi szervezeteket illetően semleges legyen."

Section 106(10)

"Police officers shall have the right to participate in lawfully organised … gatherings in their leisure time. On such occasions they shall refrain from wearing uniform and carrying their service gun or other firearms lawfully in their possession. Where the gathering is ordered to be dissolved, they shall immediately leave ."

"A rendőr szabad idejében részt vehet a … jogszerűen tartott rendezvényen. Ilyen esetben egyenruhát nem viselhet. Szolgálati vagy más jogszerűen tartott lőfegyverét nem tarthatja magánál. Ha a rendezvény feloszlatására kerül sor, köteles a helyszínt azonnal önként elhagyni."

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

21. Mr László Rekvényi applied to the Commission on 20 April 1994. He alleged that the prohibitions contained in Article 40/B § 4 of the Hungarian Constitution infringed his rights under Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention taken either alone or together with Article 14.

22. The Commission declared the application (no. 25390/94) admissible on 11 April 1997. In its report of 9 July 1998 (former Article 31 of the Convention), it expressed the opinion that there had been a violation of Article 10 (twenty-one votes to nine); that there had been no violation of Article 11 (twenty-one votes to nine); that it was not necessary to examine the applicant's complaint under Article 14 read in conjunction with Article 10 (twenty-five votes to five) and that there had been no violation of Article 14 read in conjunction with Article 11 (twenty-two votes to eight). The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the four partly dissenting opinions contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to this judgment[1].

1. Note by the Registry. For practical reasons this annex will appear only with the final printed version of the judgment (in the official reports of selected judgments and decisions of the Court), but a copy of the Commission's report is obtainable from the Registry.

FINAL SUBMISSIONS TO THE COURT

23. The applicant requested the Court in his memorial to find the respondent State in breach of its obligations under Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention taken either alone or together with Article 14 and to award him just satisfaction under Article 41.

The Government, for their part, invited the Court to reject the applicant's complaints under Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention both taken alone and together with Article 14.

THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 10 OF THE CONVENTION

24. The applicant maintained that the prohibition on engaging in "political activities" contained in Article 40/B § 4 of the Hungarian Constitution amounted to an unjustified interference with his right to freedom of expression, in violation of Article 10 of the Convention, which provides:

> "1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.
> 2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary."

25. The Commission arrived at the same conclusion, finding that the impugned prohibition was vague and sweeping, and could not, therefore, be regarded as being "prescribed by law" as required by paragraph 2 of Article 10.

The Government did not dispute that the applicant could rely on the guarantees contained in Article 10; nor did they deny that the prohibition interfered with the exercise of his rights under that Article. They contended, however, that the interference was justified under the second paragraph of Article 10.

A. As to the applicability of Article 10 and the existence of an interference

26. The Court takes it for granted that the pursuit of activities of a political nature comes within the ambit of Article 10 in so far as freedom of political debate constitutes a particular aspect of freedom of expression. Indeed, freedom of political debate is at the very core of the concept of a democratic society (see the Lingens v. Austria judgment of 8 July 1986, Series A no. 103, p. 26, § 42). Furthermore, the guarantees contained in Article 10 of the Convention extend to military personnel and civil servants (see the Engel and Others v. the Netherlands judgment of 8 June 1976, Series A no. 22, pp. 41-42, § 100; and the Vogt v. Germany judgment of 26 September 1995, Series A no. 323, pp. 22-23, § 43). The Court sees no reason to come to a different conclusion in respect of police officers and this has not been disputed by those appearing before the Court.

Nor has it been contested that the prohibition, by curtailing the applicant's involvement in political activities, interfered with the exercise of his right to freedom of expression. The Court for its part also finds that there has been an interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression.

B. As to whether the interference was justified

27. Such an interference gives rise to a breach of Article 10 unless it can be shown that it was "prescribed by law", pursued one or more legitimate aim or aims as defined in paragraph 2 and was "necessary in a democratic society" to attain them.

1. "Prescribed by law"

(a) Submissions of those appearing before the Court

(i) The applicant

28. The applicant submitted that the prohibition at issue was of an unacceptably general character and was open to arbitrary interpretations. A general constitutional ban on political activities contradicted any legislation of a lower level permitting certain activities of a political nature. Since the notion of "political activities" was not defined in any Hungarian law, it was not foreseeable whether or not a certain activity fell under the prohibition. This legal situation had prevailed without interruption since 1 January 1994 and had not been rectified by any subsequent legislation, including the 1994 Police Act.

(ii) The Government

29. In the proceedings before the Commission, the Government argued that the 1994 Police Act and the 1995 Regulations had provided a legal framework detailed enough to define the restrictions on political activities by police officers in a manner compatible with Article 10 § 2.

30. In their pleadings before the Court, the Government relied on Article 78 of the Hungarian Constitution (see paragraph 13 above) as regards the alleged contradiction between the constitutional restriction and the permissive legislation of a lower level and explained that the two were not in conflict but complemented each other. They maintained that in the Hungarian legal system it was the practice that certain provisions of the Constitution could properly be interpreted only if read together with legislation of a lower level completing and explaining their precise content. Contemporary legislative techniques often left it to laws lower in the hierarchy to define general notions used in higher laws – a law-making method not uncommon at least in continental legal systems and never in principle disapproved by the Convention organs. In any event, the Constitutional Court had the competence to rule on any potential contradiction between the Constitution and other legislation.

31. Furthermore, the legislation in force both prior and subsequent to the adoption of the 1994 Police Act and the 1995 Regulations met the requirements of foreseeability, the latter two instruments having merely recodified provisions already in force. Therefore, the constitutional restriction in question was "prescribed by law" at all times subsequent to its entry into force. Prior to 1 October 1994, the conditions governing various activities of a political nature, whereby police officers have always been permitted to exercise certain rights relating to freedom of expression, were laid down, inter alia, in Law no. 34 of 1989 on parliamentary elections, Law no. 55 of 1990 on the legal status of members of Parliament, Law no. 64 of 1990 on the election of members of local authorities and mayors, and Law no. 17 of 1989 on referenda (the right to collect "nomination coupons", expound election programmes, promote candidates, organise election campaign meetings, nominate candidates, vote in and stand for elections to Parliament, local authorities and the office of mayor and to participate in referenda) and also in the 1990 Regulations (the right to join trade unions, associations and other organisations representing and protecting police officers' interests, to participate in peaceful assemblies, make statements to the press, participate in radio or television programmes or publish works on politics, etc.) (see paragraphs 14 to 17 and 19 above).

(iii) The Commission

32. In its report the Commission, after examining the relevant domestic law as presented by the Government in the proceedings before it, observed that the 1994 Police Act and the 1995 Regulations had entered into force only in October 1994 and March 1995 respectively. The Commission, therefore, came to the conclusion that in the relevant period the impugned restriction had been based solely on Article 40/B § 4 of the Constitution. Moreover, it considered that the notion of "political activities" was vague and sweeping and that the Government had not adduced any case-law interpreting this term. The constitutional restriction itself was not, therefore, precise enough to enable the applicant to regulate his conduct in the matter. The Commission concluded that, the requirement of foreseeability thus not having been met, the interference was not "prescribed by law".

33. In her submissions to the Court, the Commission's Delegate explained that the various laws referred to by the Government in their memorial and, in particular, the 1990 Regulations, had been adopted prior to the impugned amendment to the Constitution. The only legal provisions which could be regarded as having further defined the constitutional restriction on political activities by police officers were to be found in the 1994 Police Act and the 1995 Regulations. Consequently, it was not until the 1994 Police Act and the 1995 Regulations came into force that the legal situation had met the requirement of foreseeability.

(b) The Court's assessment

34. According to the Court's well-established case-law, one of the requirements flowing from the expression "prescribed by law" is foreseeability. Thus, a norm cannot be regarded as a "law" unless it is formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct: he must be able – if need be with appropriate advice – to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail. Those consequences need not be foreseeable with absolute certainty: experience shows this to be unattainable. Again, whilst certainty is highly desirable, it may bring in its train excessive rigidity and the law must be able to keep pace with changing circumstances. Accordingly, many laws are inevitably couched in terms which, to a greater or lesser extent, are vague and whose interpretation and application are questions of practice (see the Sunday Times v. the United Kingdom (no. 1) judgment of 26 April 1979, Series A no. 30, p. 31, § 49, and the Kokkinakis v. Greece judgment of 25 May 1993, Series A no. 260-A, p. 19, § 40). The role of adjudication vested in the courts is precisely to dissipate such interpretational doubts as remain (see, mutatis mutandis, the Cantoni v. France judgment of 15 November 1996, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1996-V, p. 1628, § 32). The level of precision required of domestic legislation – which cannot in any case provide for every eventuality – depends to a considerable degree on the content of the instrument in question, the field it is designed to cover and the number and status of those to whom it is addressed (see the previously cited Vogt judgment, p. 24, § 48). Because of the general nature of constitutional provisions, the level of precision required of them may be lower than for other legislation.

35. The Court notes the Government's submission that Article 40/B § 4 of the Constitution, which contains the generic term "political activities", is subject to interpretation and is to be read in conjunction with complementary provisions contained in the various laws cited and the 1990 Regulations (see paragraphs 14 to 17, 19 and 31 above). As has been recalled many times in the Court's case-law, it is primarily for the national authorities to interpret and apply domestic law (see, for example, the Chorherr v. Austria judgment of 25 August 1993, Series A no. 266-B, pp. 35-36, § 25). In the absence of any domestic precedents to the opposite effect adduced by the applicant, the Court considers that the detailed provisions invoked by the Government cannot be held to be in contradiction with the general wording of the Constitution. Further, the adoption of the constitutional amendment in question did not result in the annulment of the 1990 Regulations, which were therefore in force when the impugned circular letters were issued. As a consequence, there appears to have existed at the relevant time a framework of provisions partly permitting – occasionally subject to authorisation – and partly restricting the participation of police officers in certain kinds of political activity.

36. As to the wording of these provisions, it is inevitable, in the Court's opinion, that conduct which may entail involvement in political activities cannot be defined with absolute precision. It seems, therefore, acceptable for the 1990 Regulations (see paragraph 19 above) – as for the 1994 Police Act and the 1995 Regulations (see paragraphs 18 and 20 above) – to lay down the conditions for undertaking types of conduct and activities with potential political aspects, such as participation in peaceful assemblies, making statements to the press, participating in radio or television programmes, publications or joining trade unions, associations or other organisations representing and protecting police officers' interests.

37. The Court is satisfied that in the circumstances these provisions were clear enough to enable the applicant to regulate his conduct accordingly. Even accepting that it might not be possible on occasions for police officers to determine with certainty whether a given action would or would not – against the background of the 1990 Regulations – fall foul of Article 40/B § 4 of the Constitution, it was nevertheless open to them to seek advice beforehand from their superior or clarification of the law by means of a court judgment.

38. Having regard to these considerations, the Court finds that the interference was "prescribed by law" for the purposes of paragraph 2 of Article 10.

2. Legitimate aim

39. The Government submitted that the constitutional provision in question was aimed at depoliticising the police, and this during a period when Hungary was being transformed from a totalitarian regime to a pluralistic democracy. In view of the police's past commitment to the ruling political party, the restriction served the purpose of protecting national security and public safety as well as preventing disorder.

40. Neither the applicant nor the Commission expressed an opinion on this point.

41. In the present case the obligation imposed on certain categories of public officials including police officers to refrain from political activities is intended to depoliticise the services concerned and thereby to contribute to the consolidation and maintenance of pluralistic democracy in the country. The Court notes that Hungary is not alone, in that a number of Contracting States restrict certain political activities on the part of their police. Police officers are invested with coercive powers to regulate the conduct of citizens, in some countries being authorised to carry arms in the discharge of their duties. Ultimately the police force is at the service of the State. Members of the public are therefore entitled to expect that in their dealings with the police they are confronted with politically neutral officers who are detached from the political fray, to paraphrase the language of the recent judgment in the case of Ahmed and Others v. the United Kingdom (judgment of 2 September 1998, Reports 1998-VI, pp. 2376-77, § 53, which judgment concerned the compatibility with Article 10 of restrictions on the involvement of senior local government officers in certain types of political activity). In the Court's view, the desire to ensure that the crucial role of the police in society is not compromised through the corrosion of the political neutrality of its officers is one that is compatible with democratic principles.

This objective takes on a special historical significance in Hungary because of that country's experience of a totalitarian regime which relied to a great extent on its police's direct commitment to the ruling party (see, mutatis mutandis, the previously cited Vogt judgment, p. 25, § 51).

Accordingly, the Court concludes that the restriction in question pursued legitimate aims within the meaning of paragraph 2 of Article 10, namely the protection of national security and public safety and the prevention of disorder.

3. "Necessary in a democratic society"

(a) General principles

42. In its above-mentioned Vogt judgment (pp. 25-26, § 52) the Court summarised as follows the basic principles concerning Article 10 as laid down in its case-law:

(i) Freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and each individual's self-fulfilment. Subject to paragraph 2 of Article 10, it is applicable not only to "information" or "ideas" that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offend, shock or disturb; such are the demands of that pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness without which there is no "democratic society". Freedom of expression, as enshrined in Article 10, is subject to a number of exceptions which, however, must be narrowly interpreted and the necessity for any restrictions must be convincingly established.

(ii) The adjective "necessary", within the meaning of Article 10 § 2 implies the existence of a "pressing social need". The Contracting States have a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether such a need exists, but it goes hand in hand with a European supervision, embracing both the law and the decisions applying it, even those given by independent courts. The Court is therefore empowered to give the final ruling on whether a "restriction" is reconcilable with freedom of expression as protected by Article 10.

(iii) The Court's task, in exercising its supervisory jurisdiction, is not to take the place of the competent national authorities but rather to review under Article 10 the decisions they delivered pursuant to their power of appreciation. This does not mean that the supervision is limited to ascertaining whether the respondent State exercised its discretion reasonably, carefully and in good faith; what the Court has to do is to look at the interference complained of in the light of the case as a whole and determine whether it was "proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued" and whether the reasons adduced by the national authorities to justify it are "relevant and sufficient". In so doing, the Court has to satisfy itself that the national authorities applied standards which were in conformity with the principles embodied in Article 10 and, moreover, that they based their decisions on an acceptable assessment of the relevant facts.

43. In the same judgment the Court declared that "these principles apply also to civil servants. Although it is legitimate for a State to impose on civil servants, on account of their status, a duty of discretion, civil servants are individuals and, as such, qualify for the protection of Article 10 of the Convention. It therefore falls to the Court, having regard to the circumstances of each case, to determine whether a fair balance has been struck between the fundamental right of the individual to freedom of expression and the legitimate interest of a democratic State in ensuring that its civil service properly furthers the purposes enumerated in Article 10 § 2. In carrying out this review, the Court will bear in mind that whenever civil servants' right to freedom of expression is in issue the 'duties and responsibilities' referred to in Article 10 § 2 assume a special significance, which justifies leaving to the national authorities a certain margin of appreciation in determining whether the impugned interference is proportionate" to the legitimate aim in question (p. 26, § 53). Such considerations apply equally to military personnel (see the previously cited Engel and Others judgment, pp. 23 and 41-42, §§ 54 and 100) and police officers (see paragraph 26 above).

(b) Application of the above principles to the instant case

44. The Government contended that for decades preceding Hungary's return to democracy in 1989 to 1990, the police had been a self-avowed tool of the ruling party and had taken an active part in the implementation of the party policies. Career members of the police were expected to be politically committed to the ruling party. Given Hungary's peaceful and gradual transformation towards pluralism without a general purge in the public administration, it was necessary to depoliticise, inter alia, the police and restrict the political activities of its members so that the public should no longer regard the police as a supporter of the totalitarian regime but rather as a guardian of democratic institutions.

45. Neither the applicant nor the Commission expressed an opinion on this point.

46. Bearing in mind the role of the police in society, the Court has recognised that it is a legitimate aim in any democratic society to have a politically neutral police force (see paragraph 41 above). In view of the particular history of some Contracting States, the national authorities of these States may, so as to ensure the consolidation and maintenance of democracy, consider it necessary to have constitutional safeguards to achieve this aim by restricting the freedom of police officers to engage in political activities and, in particular, political debate.

What remains to be determined is whether the particular restrictions imposed in the present case can be regarded as "necessary in a democratic society".

47. The Court observes that between 1949 and 1989 Hungary was ruled by one political party. Membership of that party was, in many social spheres, expected as a manifestation of the individual's commitment to the regime. This expectation was even more pronounced within the military and the police, where party membership on the part of the vast majority of serving staff guaranteed that the ruling party's political will was directly implemented. This is precisely the vice that rules on the political neutrality of the police are designed to prevent. It was not until 1989 that Hungarian society succeeded in building up the institutions of a pluralistic democracy, leading to the first multi-party parliamentary elections in more than forty years being held in 1990. The impugned amendment to the Constitution was adopted some months prior to the second democratic parliamentary elections in 1994.

48. Regard being had to the margin of appreciation left to the national authorities in this area, the Court finds that, especially against this historical background, the relevant measures taken in Hungary in order to protect the police force from the direct influence of party politics can be seen as answering a "pressing social need" in a democratic society.

49. As to the extent of the restriction on the applicant's freedom of expression, although the wording of Article 40/B § 4 might prima facie suggest that what is in issue is an absolute ban on political activities, an examination of the relevant laws shows that police officers have in fact remained entitled to undertake some activities enabling them to articulate their political opinions and preferences. Notably, whilst sometimes subject to restrictions imposed in the interest of the service, police officers have had the right to expound election programmes, promote and nominate candidates, organise election campaign meetings, vote in and stand for elections to Parliament, local authorities and the office of mayor, participate in referenda, join trade unions, associations and other organisations, participate in peaceful assemblies, make statements to the press, participate in radio or television programmes or publish works on politics (see paragraphs 14 to 20 above). In these circumstances the scope and the effect of the impugned restrictions on the applicant's exercise of his freedom of expression do not appear excessive.

50. In the light of the foregoing considerations, the Court concludes that the means employed in order to achieve the legitimate aims pursued were not disproportionate. Accordingly, the impugned interference with the applicant's freedom of expression is not in violation of Article 10.

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 11 OF THE CONVENTION

51. The applicant submitted that the prohibition on joining a party, prescribed by Article 40/B § 4 of the Constitution, violated his right to freedom of association guaranteed under Article 11 of the Convention which provides:

> "1. Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to freedom of association with others, including the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.
> 2. No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of these rights other than such as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of > others. This Article shall not prevent the imposition of lawful restrictions on the exercise of these rights by members of the armed forces, of the police or of the administration of the State."

52. Both the Commission and the Government accepted that the facts complained of by the applicant attracted the application of the safeguard set forth in Article 11 and that the prohibition interfered with the exercise of his right under that Article. They took the view, however, that the interference was justified under the last sentence of paragraph 2 of Article 11.

A. Submissions of those appearing before the Court as to whether the interference was justified

1. The applicant

53. The applicant argued that while Regulation 433 of the 1990 Regulations, which remained in force until March 1995, permitted police officers to be members of a party, Article 40/B § 4 of the Constitution expressly prohibited this as from 1 January 1994. This situation, which lasted fifteen months, was contradictory and unconstitutional.

Moreover, the aims of the impugned prohibition were not indicated in Hungarian law. In fact, the prohibition could only be seen as serving political interests, and thus as not pursuing a "legitimate aim" for the purposes of Article 11 § 2.

54. Furthermore, although the last sentence of paragraph 2 of Article 11 did not expressly refer to the requirement of "necessity", the restriction in issue nevertheless had to be "necessary in a democratic society" in order to be justified under this paragraph, a condition not met in the present case. The fact that Hungary had recently become a pluralistic democracy and a member State of the Council of Europe should not give rise to any leniency when examining the criteria for justification of the interference. Neither could the interference be regarded as "proportionate" to the aims pursued, given that the restriction in fact amounted to a complete ban on police officers' exercise of their right to freedom of association.

2. The Government

55. The Government expressed the view that, in any event, the last sentence of Article 11 § 2 provided sufficient justification for the impugned restriction on freedom of association, should it not be justified under the first sentence of that paragraph. In their opinion, the justification provided for in the last sentence was entirely independent of that in the first sentence; otherwise the provision would be superfluous.

56. As to the requirement under the last sentence of Article 11 § 2 that a restriction be "lawful", the Government first pointed out that what was in issue was a provision of the Hungarian Constitution. In reply to the applicant's argument that between January 1994 and March 1995 Regulation 433 of the 1990 Regulations had been in contradiction with the contested constitutional provision, they explained that such ambiguities in the law were to be resolved by the Constitutional Court.

They submitted that the wish to depoliticise the police could not be regarded as "unlawful" in the sense of being arbitrary. In this respect they mainly reiterated their arguments concerning Article 10 (see paragraphs 39 and 44 above) and maintained in particular that the prohibition on party membership on the part of police officers had been intended to contribute to the elimination of any direct party political influence on the police by severing the institutional links which had previously existed between the armed forces and the police on the one hand and political circles on the other. Furthermore, the restriction in question could not be regarded as disproportionate to the legitimate aims pursued, since police officers' right to freedom of association had been restricted exclusively in respect of political parties within the meaning of Law no. 33 of 1989 on political parties.

3. The Commission

57. The Commission was of the view that the prohibition in question fell to be examined under the last sentence of paragraph 2 of Article 11. To be "lawful" for the purposes of that sentence, a restriction must be in accordance with the national law and devoid of arbitrariness. Having been prescribed by the Constitution, the restriction was to be considered as being in accordance with the national law. As regards arbitrariness, the Commission recalled that States must be given a wide discretion when ensuring the protection of their national security (see the Leander v. Sweden judgment of 26 March 1987, Series A no. 116, p. 25, § 59 in fine). Against the background of Hungary's recent history and the repercussions of a politically committed police force exploited for decades by a totalitarian regime, the Commission considered that the efforts to depoliticise the police could not be regarded as arbitrary. The prohibition was, therefore, also "lawful" within the wider meaning of that term in the second sentence of Article 11 § 2.

B. The Court's assessment

58. Notwithstanding its autonomous role and particular sphere of application, Article 11 must in the present case also be considered in the light of Article 10. As the Court has explained in previous judgments, "the protection of personal opinions, secured by Article 10, is one of the objectives of the freedoms of assembly and association as enshrined in Article 11" (see the Vogt judgment cited above, p. 30, § 64).

59. The last sentence of paragraph 2 of Article 11 – which is undoubtedly applicable in the present case – entitles States to impose "lawful restrictions" on the exercise of the right to freedom of association by members of the police.

Like the Commission, the Court considers that the term "lawful" in this sentence alludes to the very same concept of lawfulness as that to which the Convention refers elsewhere when using the same or similar expressions, notably the expressions "in accordance with the law" and "prescribed by law" found in the second paragraph of Articles 9 to 11. As recalled above in relation to Article 10, the concept of lawfulness in the Convention, apart from positing conformity with domestic law, also implies qualitative requirements in the domestic law such as foreseeability and, generally, an absence of arbitrariness (see paragraph 34 above).

60. In so far as the applicant criticises the basis in domestic law of the impugned restriction (see paragraph 53 above), the Court reiterates that it is primarily for the national authorities to interpret and apply domestic law, especially if there is a need to elucidate doubtful points (see the S.W. v. the United Kingdom judgment of 22 November 1995, Series A no. 335-B, p. 42, § 36, and also the previously cited Chorherr and Cantoni judgments). In the present case, however, the prohibition on membership of a political party by police officers as contained in Article 40/B § 4 of the Constitution is in fact unambiguous (see paragraph 13 above) and it would not appear to be arguable that subordinate legislation introduced some four years earlier (Regulation 433 of Decree no. 1/1990 of 10 January 1990 – see paragraph 19 above) was capable of affecting the scope of this prohibition. In the circumstances the Court concludes that the legal position was sufficiently clear to enable the applicant to regulate his conduct and that the requirement of foreseeability was accordingly satisfied. Further, the Court finds no ground for holding the restriction imposed on the applicant's exercise of his freedom of association to be arbitrary. The contested restriction was consequently "lawful" within the meaning of Article 11 § 2.

61. Finally, it is not necessary in the present case to settle the disputed issue of the extent to which the interference in question is, by virtue of the second sentence of Article 11 § 2, excluded from being subject to the conditions other than lawfulness enumerated in the first sentence of that paragraph. For the reasons previously given in relation to Article 10 (see paragraphs 41 and 46 to 48 above), the Court considers that, in any event, the interference with the applicant's freedom of association satisfied those conditions (see, mutatis mutandis, the previously cited Vogt judgment, p. 31, § 68).

62. In sum, the interference can be regarded as justified under paragraph 2 of Article 11. Accordingly, there has been no violation of Article 11 either.

III. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 14 OF THE CONVENTION TAKEN IN CONJUNCTION WITH ARTICLES 10 OR 11

63. The applicant further alleged that the impugned prohibition on engaging in political activities and on joining a party was discriminatory. He relied on Article 14 of the Convention, which provides:

> "The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in [the] Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status."

64. In his memorial, the applicant did not address the issue under Article 14 taken in conjunction with Article 10.

As to Article 14 taken in conjunction with Article 11, he argued that there was no objective and reasonable justification for the prohibition on party membership, either in respect of police officers or other groups of public servants. The issue of party affiliation had in fact only very limited connection to the duties and responsibilities peculiar to members of the armed forces and the police. Any difference in treatment as to the possibility of joining a party should not be based on a prohibition of an unacceptably general character.

65. The Government submitted that the restrictions in issue had been imposed not only on police officers but members of the armed forces, judges, Constitutional Court judges and public prosecutors as well. They maintained that any distinction between police officers and other groups of citizens as to the exercise of the right to freedom of expression – and, mutatis mutandis, freedom of association – could be justified on the ground of differences between the conditions of military and of civil life and, more specifically, by the duties and responsibilities peculiar to members of the armed forces and the police. They referred in this respect to the Engel and Others judgment (judgment cited above, p. 42, § 103).

66. The Commission did not find it necessary to examine the applicant's complaint under Article 14 taken in conjunction with Article 10.

As to Article 14 taken in conjunction with Article 11, the Commission observed that the specific status of the applicant had already been taken into account when it had examined the justification for the prohibition in question under Article 11 § 2. The Commission found that those considerations were equally valid in the context of Article 14 and concluded that there was no appearance of any discrimination in breach of that Article taken in conjunction with Article 11.

67. The Court's conclusions that the contested restrictions do not amount to a violation of Articles 10 and 11 (see paragraphs 50 and 62 above) do not preclude the finding of a violation of Article 14 of the Convention. While it is true that the guarantee laid down in Article 14 has no independent existence in the sense that under the terms of that Article it relates solely to "rights and freedoms set forth in [the] Convention", a measure which in itself is in conformity with the requirements of the Article enshrining the right or freedom in question may however infringe this Article when read in conjunction with Article 14 for the reason that it is of a discriminatory nature (see the case "relating to certain aspects of the laws on the use of languages in education in Belgium" (merits), judgment of 23 July 1968, Series A no. 6, pp. 33-34, § 9).

68. The considerations underlying the Court's conclusions that the interferences with the applicant's freedoms of expression and association were justified under Articles 10 § 2 and 11 § 2 have already taken into account the applicant's special status as a police officer (see paragraphs 41, 46 to 49 and 61 above). These considerations are equally valid in the context of Article 14 and, even assuming that police officers can be taken to be in a comparable position to ordinary citizens, justify the difference of treatment complained of. There has accordingly been no violation of Article 14 taken in conjunction with Articles 10 or 11.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Holds unanimously that there has been no violation of Article 10 of the Convention;

2. Holds by sixteen votes to one that there has been no violation of Article 11 of the Convention;

3. Holds unanimously that there has been no violation of Article 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with Articles 10 or 11.

P.J.M.

PARTLY DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE FISCHBACH

(Translation)

While I agree with the majority that there has been no violation of Article 10, I regret that I am unable to share its view that there has been no breach of Article 11 of the Convention.

As I read the travaux préparatoires on Article 11 of the Convention (see paragraph IX, pages 18 and 19), restrictions on freedom of association must not only be lawful, as required by the second sentence of Article 11 § 2, they must also be necessary in a democratic society.

I can see no convincing argument which, in a pluralist, democratic society, could justify a ban on joining a political party.

On the contrary, I consider that the unhappy experiences suffered under the communist regime ought to encourage political leaders to advocate a fresh approach so that the democratic process can be consolidated and the future prepared for in a spirit of open-mindedness and tolerance.

As the police are now no longer at the service of the communist party, but of democracy, it is essential that change be accompanied by an approach fostering awareness of democratic pluralism through divergent political views that fuel debate over ideas.

Banning the police from joining a political party amounts to depriving them of a right, if not the democratic duty, which all citizens have to hold opinions and political convictions, to take a close interest in public affairs and to participate in the fashioning of the will of the people and of the State.

Admittedly, the right to state one's personal convictions by belonging to a party should not be confused with either freedom to express opinions and political convictions irrespective of time or place or, above all, with freedom to comment in public on the actions of political leaders. Those are freedoms that have always to be reconciled with the obligation of discretion to which all public servants and, a fortiori, members of the police are subject by virtue of their duties to the executive of impartiality and loyalty.

It is for that reason that I share the majority's view that there has been no violation of Article 10.

However, the total ban on belonging to a political party and, consequently, the legislature's refusal to allow policemen to take part in the internal workings of a party is, to my mind, disproportionate and made yet more unjust by the fact that the selfsame legislature affords all members of the police the right to stand for elections at national, local or municipal level on condition that they inform the head of police of their intention to do so and remain off duty from the sixtieth day preceding the election until publication of the results.

I very much doubt the effectiveness of such a right to stand for election since its exercise is highly dependent on the person concerned being given the freedom to familiarise himself with a party's ideas, working methods and machinery and, hence, enough time to acquire a taste for politics and to begin a political career.

SUMMARY[1]

Judgment delivered by a Chamber

Switzerland – disciplinary penalty imposed on lawyer following criticisms of the judiciary made at a press conference (Articles 12 and 13 of the Statute of the Bar of the Canton of Lucerne)

ARTICLE 10 OF THE CONVENTION

Special status of lawyers gives them central position in administration of justice as intermediaries between public and courts – legitimate to expect them to contribute to proper administration of justice, and thus to maintain public confidence therein.

Applicant first publicly criticised administration of justice in Hochdorf and then exercised a legal remedy which proved effective – conduct scarcely compatible with contribution it is legitimate to expect lawyers to make to maintaining public confidence in judicial authorities.

Freedom of expression secured to lawyers too, who are entitled to comment in public on administration of justice, but their criticism must not overstep certain bounds – balance to be struck between various interests involved, which include public's right to receive information about questions arising from judicial decisions, requirements of proper administration of justice and dignity of legal profession.

General nature, seriousness and tone of complaints raised in public – applicant was lawyer – criminal proceedings still pending – competent authorities not first applied to via legal channels – modest amount of fine – margin of appreciation not exceeded.

Conclusion: no violation (seven votes to two).

1. This summary by the registry does not bind the Court.

In the case of Schöpfer v. Switzerland[1],

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") and the relevant provisions of Rules of Court B[2], as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr THÓR VILHJÁLMSSON, President,
Mr J. DE MEYER,
Mr R. PEKKANEN,
Mr A.B. BAKA,
Mr M.A. LOPES ROCHA,
Mr L. WILDHABER,
Mr J. MAKARCZYK,
Mr P. JAMBREK,
Mr M. VOICU,

and also of Mr H. PETZOLD, Registrar, and Mr P.J. MAHONEY, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 24 February and 24 April 1998,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court by a Swiss national, Mr Alois Schöpfer ("the applicant"), and by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 28 May and 3 June 1997 respectively, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 § 1 and Article 47 of the Convention. It originated in an application (no. 25405/94) against the Swiss Confederation lodged by the applicant with the Commission under Article 25 on 11 August 1994.

Mr Schöpfer's application to the Court and the Commission's request referred to Article 48 of the Convention as amended by Protocol No. 9 which Switzerland has ratified. The object of the application and of the request was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Article 10 of the Convention.

Notes by the Registrar

1. The case is numbered 56/1997/840/1046. The first number is the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court in the relevant year (second number). The last two numbers indicate the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court since its creation and on the list of the corresponding originating applications to the Commission.

2. Rules of Court B, which came into force on 2 October 1994, apply to all cases concerning States bound by Protocol No. 9.

2. On 3 September 1997 the President of the Court gave the applicant leave to present his own case (Rule 31 of Rules of Court B) and on 30 September he gave him leave to use the German language (Rule 28 § 3).

3. The Chamber to be constituted included ex officio Mr L. Wildhaber, the elected judge of Swiss nationality (Article 43 of the Convention), and Mr R. Ryssdal, the President of the Court (Rule 21 § 4 (b)). On 3 July 1997, in the presence of the Registrar, the President drew by lot the names of the other seven members, namely Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr R. Pekkanen, Mr A.B. Baka, Mr M.A. Lopes Rocha, Mr J. Makarczyk, Mr P. Jambrek and Mr M. Voicu (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 § 5). Subsequently, Mr Ryssdal being unable to take part in the further consideration of the case, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson took his place as President of the Chamber and Mr J. De Meyer, substitute judge, was called upon to sit as a full member (Rules 21 § 6 and 24 § 1).

4. As President of the Chamber, Mr Ryssdal, acting through the Registrar, had consulted Mr P. Boillat, the Agent of the Swiss Government ("the Government"), the applicant and Mr E. Alkema, the Delegate of the Commission, on the organisation of the proceedings (Rules 39 § 1 and 40). Pursuant to the order made in consequence, the Registrar received the Government's and the applicant's memorials on 25 November and 1 December 1997 respectively and their replies on 19 December 1997 and 8 January 1998 respectively. On 2 February 1998 the Secretary to the Commission produced a number of documents requested by the Registrar on the President's instructions.

5. On 24 February 1998 the Chamber decided to dispense with a hearing in the case, having satisfied itself that the condition for this derogation from its usual procedure had been met (Rules 27 and 40).

AS TO THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

6. The applicant, who is a lawyer and former member of the Cantonal Council (Großrat), lives in Root (Canton of Lucerne). At the material time he was an advocate acting as defence counsel for a Mr S., who had been placed in detention pending trial (Untersuchungshaft) on suspicion of committing a number of thefts.

7. On 6 November 1992 Mr S.'s wife informed Mr Schöpfer that the two district clerks (Amtsschreiber) of the Hochdorf district authority (Amtsstatthalteramt) had urged her to instruct a different lawyer to defend her husband if he wished to be released.

A. The applicant's public statements

8. On 9 November 1992 the applicant then held a press conference in his office in Lucerne at which he declared that at the Hochdorf district authority offices both the laws of the Canton of Lucerne and human rights were flagrantly disregarded, and had been for years (werden sowohl die Luzerner Gesetze als auch die Menschenrechte in höchstem Grade verletzt, und zwar schon seit Jahren). He pointed out that he was speaking to the press because it was his last resort (deshalb bleibt mir nur noch der Weg über die Presse).

9. The following day the daily newspaper Luzerner Neueste Nachrichten ("the LNN") published the following article (at page 25):

> "Former Christian Democratic Party (CDP) councillor demands investigation into Hochdorf district authority
> 'I won't let those gentlemen make a fool of me any longer'
> Former CDP councillor Alois Schöpfer makes serious accusations against the Hochdorf district authority.
> 'I've had enough of letting those gentlemen at the Hochdorf district authority make a fool of me' thundered Alois Schöpfer. 'So the only recourse left to me is to take the matter to the press.' The former CDP councillor was prompted to take the unusual step of approaching the public during pending proceedings on account of a case entrusted to him as a lawyer in mid-October. At that time his client had already been in pre-trial detention at the Hochdorf district authority prison for a month.
> Detained without an arrest warrant
>
> The 20 year-old father of a one and a half year-old daughter was arrested on 18 August with his brother for the theft of car radios and clothes, and released after admitting the offences. When, on 15 September, he went to the Lucerne cantonal police to ask how his brother was, he was again immediately arrested.
> 'When I enquired at the Hochdorf district authority about the arrest warrant, I was told that the order had been issued to him orally' said Alois Schöpfer, who sees the conduct of the police as a clear breach of the cantonal Code of Criminal Procedure, Article 82 of which provides: 'The arrest shall be carried out by the police, duly authorised by a written warrant of arrest.'

When these accusations were put to him, the Hochdorf prefect [Mr H. B.] was giving nothing away. 'Where I'm in charge nobody is arrested without a written arrest warrant', he said. 'I cannot say any more about a pending case.' On the other hand, Alois Schöpfer, who was asked by the accused's wife to defend her husband, will not remain silent any longer: 'The wife came to me because the lawyer appointed under the legal aid scheme had still not contacted his client even though he had been in pre-trial detention for six weeks.'

Schöpfer immediately contacted the officially appointed counsel who handed the case over to him. However, the Hochdorf district authority did not want Schöpfer to take over as defence counsel under the legal aid scheme and refused his request on 29 October on the ground that there were no reasons to dismiss the lawyer to whom the case had been assigned until then. He was, however, free to represent his client on a private basis.

Schöpfer as the ground for detention?

The last straw for Alois Schöpfer came when the accused's wife informed him last Friday that [T.B.] and [B.B.], the two district clerks, had advised her not to keep him on the case. 'They told me' she confirmed for the LNN, 'that my husband would not be released as long as Alois Schöpfer remained his defence counsel.' But [T.B.] denied any involvement: 'That's ridiculous. I never said anything like that. [B.B.] can confirm that. He was present when I spoke with the man's wife.'

Alois Schöpfer will not let the matter drop: 'I demand the immediate resignation of the prefect and the district clerks and a thorough investigation of the case by an impartial commission of inquiry from outside the canton.'"

In a box inside the article was the following text:

"Accusations

It is not the first time that serious charges have been levelled against the Hochdorf district authority. Prefect [H.B.] was previously prosecuted in connection with the conviction of [H.S.], the Rothenburg debt collection officer [Betreibungsbeamter]. He was fined 400 francs by the Lucerne District Court for disclosure of official secrets. Although the Court of Appeal also found that the objective elements of the offence had been made out, [H.B.] was acquitted on appeal."

The article was illustrated by two photographs, one showing the Hochdorf district authority building and the other Prefect H.B. with the caption: "Where I'm in charge nobody is arrested without a written arrest warrant (Bei mir wird niemand ohne schriftlichen Haftbefehl festgehalten)."

10. Another daily newspaper, the Luzerner Zeitung, also published, on 10 November 1992, an article on the press conference under the title: "Young man arrested without a warrant? Lucerne lawyer accuses Hochdorf district authority of breaking the law (Junger Mann ohne Haftbefehl verhaftet? Luzerner Anwalt wirft Amtsstatthalteramt Hochdorf Rechtsverletzungen vor)."

11. On 10 November 1992 the public prosecutor's office (Staatsanwaltschaft) of the Canton of Lucerne issued a reply to the effect that the accused person concerned had been arrested in accordance with the law, and that the applicant had not filed an appeal against the refusal to allow him to take over as the officially appointed defence counsel. This reply was published in the press on 11 November 1992.

12. On 13 November 1992 the Luzerner Zeitung published a summary of a press communiqué issued by the applicant in reply to the public prosecutor's statement. According to Mr Schöpfer, S.'s arrest had breached both the Convention and – "in a crude and unacceptable manner (in absolut grober und nicht mehr zu verantwortender Weise)" – the cantonal Code of Criminal Procedure. The applicant also quoted the following passage from a letter he had received from another lawyer: "The situation in Hochdorf is far from satisfactory... What makes it even worse is the fact that the judicial authorities know what is going on in Hochdorf and even make indirect allusions to the situation." In conclusion, Mr Schöpfer called on the Court of Appeal and the Cantonal Council to look into the case.

13. On 15 October, 3 November and 13 November 1992 the applicant had lodged applications for the release of Mr S. (Haftentlassungsgesuch), which the Hochdorf prefect refused on 19 October, 5 November and 16 November 1992 respectively.

Mr Schöpfer lodged an appeal (Rekurs) against the last of these decisions. This was dismissed by the Court of Appeal (Obergericht) of the Canton of Lucerne on 30 November 1992, on the ground, among others, that the prefect had subsequently validly extended Mr S.'s pre-trial detention, so that Mr S. no longer had standing to bring an action challenging the conditions of his arrest. It noted, however, that after his arrest Mr S. should have been brought, not before a district clerk, but before the prefect himself, the only person who could be considered a judge or other officer for the purposes of Article 5 § 3 of the Convention. It therefore ordered that its decision should be brought to the attention of the public prosecutor's office, which was the prefect's supervisory authority (Aufsichtsbehörde).

B. The disciplinary proceedings against the applicant

14. On 16 November 1992 the Lucerne Bar's Supervisory Board (Aufsichtsbehörde über die Rechtsanwälte) informed Mr Schöpfer that his conduct raised certain ethical questions, relating in particular to the need for discretion (Zurückhaltung) with regard to pending proceedings and to covert publicity, and asked him what he had to say on the matter.

In a letter of 18 November which he communicated to the press, the applicant replied that he had acted only in the general interest and in that of his client.

15. On 16 November 1992 the Hochdorf prefect had lodged a complaint (Anzeige) with the Supervisory Board and asked for disciplinary proceedings to be brought against Mr Schöpfer. He asserted that by his statements the latter had not only slandered the prefect and his two district clerks but had also been guilty of a serious breach of lawyers' professional ethics (Standesregeln) by spreading false accusations through the media rather than making use of the available legal remedies.

16. On 21 December 1992 the Supervisory Board brought disciplinary proceedings against the applicant.

On 15 March 1993, pursuant to Article 13 of the Statute of the Bar (Anwaltsgesetz) of the Canton of Lucerne (see paragraph 18 below), it fined him 500 Swiss francs (CHF) for a breach of professional ethics (Verletzung von Berufs- und Standespflichten).

In its decision the Supervisory Board observed in particular that the applicant had omitted to refer his complaints – which were serious – in the first place to the public prosecutor's office or the Court of Appeal, which were the relevant supervisory bodies for the district authority. He had therefore failed to observe the discretion which lawyers were required to maintain, in public, with regard to pending proceedings. In addition, he had engaged in covert publicity (versteckte Reklame) and cheap showmanship (Effekthascherei), thus demonstrating that he was more concerned about his own public profile than about the merits of the case. In any event, lawyers' statements to the press always had to be not only of real public interest (reelles öffentliches Interesse) but also objective and moderate in tone (objektiv in der Darstellung und sachlich im Ton).

But the tone of a number of passages in Mr Schöpfer's statements to the press left something to be desired. For example he had said: "I won't let those gentlemen make a fool of me any longer" and "I demand … a thorough investigation of the case by an impartial commission of inquiry from outside the canton" and also "So the only recourse left to me is to take the matter to the press." This last statement was not even true, since at that time Mr Schöpfer had not even applied to the relevant supervisory bodies for the district authority, nor had he tried exercising the ordinary legal remedies. He had thus disparaged not only the Hochdorf district authority but all the canton's judicial authorities, which was incompatible with a lawyer's professional ethics.

17. The applicant lodged a public-law appeal against the above decision. This was dismissed by the Federal Court on 21 April 1994.

It observed that lawyers enjoyed considerable freedom to criticise the judicial authorities, provided that this was done according to the correct procedures, and in the first place in the course of representing and defending their clients. When, however, a lawyer appealed to public opinion, he was under a duty, like any other person employed in the service of justice, to refrain from any conduct inconducive to the proper administration thereof. Article 10 § 2 of the Convention also enunciated the principle that interference could be justified if its purpose was to maintain the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. Admittedly, there might be circumstances in which the public interest required alleged violations of constitutional or human rights to be made public. In order to determine whether that was the case, it was necessary to ascertain how obvious the alleged violations were, whether pending proceedings were likely to be influenced, whether the available remedies had been exercised and in what form the criticism had been made.

In the instant case Mr Schöpfer had been punished not so much for denouncing human rights violations as for the way in which he had done so. When considering the case the Supervisory Board had indeed taken into account the fact that one of the complaints raised by the applicant, concerning the fact that Mr S. had been brought before a district clerk rather than the prefect, had subsequently been upheld by the Court of Appeal. However, Mr Schöpfer's other criticisms – which were likely to influence pending proceedings – had been found by the Supervisory Board to be unjustified. Furthermore, the Board had ruled that the applicant had not employed the right tone in his criticism and that he had made untrue allegations. It had given sufficient grounds for its decision and the applicant had not adduced any convincing counter-arguments.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW

18. Article 10 of the Statute of the Bar (Anwaltsgesetz) of the Canton of Lucerne establishes a Lawyers' Supervisory Board (Aufsichtsbehörde über die Anwälte) whose members – two judges of the Court of Appeal, one administrative court judge and two lawyers – are appointed by the Court of Appeal for four years. Under Article 12 § 1 of the Statute the Board has jurisdiction to investigate lawyers' breaches of professional ethics (Berufs- und Standespflichten) and may impose disciplinary penalties. Under Article 13 these range from a reprimand (Verweis) to temporary or permanent disbarment, with fines of up to CHF 5,000 as intermediate penalties.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

19. Mr Schöpfer applied to the Commission on 11 August 1994, alleging that the disciplinary penalty imposed on him had breached Article 10 of the Convention.

20. The Commission (Second Chamber) declared the application (no. 25405/94) admissible on 4 September 1996. In its report of 9 April 1997 (Article 31), it expressed the opinion by nine votes to six that there had been no violation of that provision. The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the dissenting opinion contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to this judgment[1].

FINAL SUBMISSIONS TO THE COURT

21. In their memorial the Government requested the Court "to declare that there [had] been no violation of Article 10 of the Convention in the present case".

22. In his memorial the applicant asked the Court to hold that there had been a breach of Article 10 and to order Switzerland to pay him compensation for the damage he had sustained.

AS TO THE LAW

ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 10 OF THE CONVENTION

23. Mr Schöpfer alleged that the penalty imposed on him by the Lawyers' Supervisory Board had breached Article 10 of the Convention, which provides:

> "1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.

1. Note by the Registrar. For practical reasons this annex will appear only with the printed version of the judgment (in Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1998), but a copy of the Commission's report is obtainable from the registry.

> 2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary."

24. The penalty in issue incontestably amounted to "interference" with the applicant's exercise of his freedom of expression. The participants in the proceedings agreed that it was "prescribed by law" and pursued a legitimate aim for the purposes of Article 10 § 2, namely maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. It is apparent from the Supervisory Board's decision of 15 March 1993 that the penalty in question was imposed on the applicant because, inter alia, he had disparaged all the canton's judicial authorities (see paragraph 16 above).

The Court, which agrees with the participants on this point, must now determine, therefore, whether the interference was "necessary in a democratic society" in order to achieve that aim.

25. The applicant explained that the reason why he had chosen to make his criticisms through the press was that it was not only his client's case which gave him cause for concern but an intolerable situation that had persisted for years at the Hochdorf district authority. He had already exercised remedies against this state of affairs in connection with previous cases, but to no avail.

Mr Schöpfer asserted that he had deliberately refrained from appealing against the Hochdorf district authority's refusal of his application to take over as his client's officially appointed counsel so as not to make that issue the central theme of the case. In any event, such appeals were usually unsuccessful. It was only when his client's wife had come to tell him that, according to district authority officials, her husband would remain incarcerated for as long as he, Schöpfer, was defending him that he had decided to speak to the press. He could, admittedly, have complained to the public prosecutor's office, which was the district authority's supervisory authority, but the statements the public prosecutor's office had made to the newspapers after the press conference were enough to show that such a step would also have been bound to fail.

Moreover, in his statements he had not criticised the judiciary as such but only the conduct of the Hochdorf prefect and, indirectly, that of the public prosecutor's office, as the supervisory authority. His criticisms had been justified, since they had been aimed not at an isolated case but at a long-standing practice contrary to the Convention. A lawyer who noted that such a practice had been followed to the detriment of a number of his clients had the right to begin a public debate on the subject. Furthermore, he had expressed his opinion not only as a lawyer but also as a politician.

26. The Government submitted that a distinction had to be drawn in the first place, according to the case-law of the Federal Court, between a lawyer's statements in the context of judicial proceedings and statements made outside the context of such proceedings, inasmuch as there might be stricter requirements for a lawyer who expressed an opinion in public. Only in special circumstances would he be justified in doing so and he should be objective in the way he presented the facts and moderate in tone.

Further, the criticisms of the Hochdorf district authority were not only formulated in totally exaggerated terms, they were also without foundation. The only substantiated complaint, the one concerning the fact that Mr Schöpfer's client had been brought before a district clerk, had been upheld by the Court of Appeal and had then been taken into account during the disciplinary proceedings, by the Lawyers' Supervisory Board and the Federal Court. But even that complaint, which, according to the applicant, concerned an extremely serious violation of human rights, had been formulated in unacceptably exaggerated terms for a lawyer, given the fact that it related to pending judicial proceedings.

Not content with making very serious allegations, Mr Schöpfer had in addition done so in a spiteful and aggressive tone, thus failing to observe the discretion, integrity and dignity that a lawyer should maintain. When seen against all that, the fine of CHF 500 imposed on the applicant appeared moderate in the light of the scale of penalties provided for in the Statute of the Bar of the Canton of Lucerne.

27. In the Commission's view, the applicant had exaggerated his grievances, by asserting for instance that for years the Hochdorf district authority had been flagrantly violating the laws of the Canton of Lucerne and human rights. In addition, he had omitted to exercise first of all the ordinary remedies at his disposal to raise the complaints he had made at the press conference. Moreover, he had made his allegations while the criminal proceedings against his client were still pending, which could be regarded as an attempt to exert pressure on the Hochdorf authorities dealing with the investigation and, more generally, to impair the independence of the judiciary. Lastly, the fine of CHF 500 was at the lower end of the scale of penalties provided for in the Statute of the Bar of the Canton of Lucerne. There had accordingly been no violation of Article 10.

28. The Court notes that at his press conference on 9 November 1992 Mr Schöpfer complained, essentially, of the fact that his client had been arrested at the Hochdorf district authority offices without an arrest warrant and then brought before a district clerk, and that the district authority had refused his application to take over the case as his client's defence counsel under the legal aid scheme (see paragraph 9 above). The Lawyers' Supervisory Board, when it imposed the penalty on the applicant, attached great importance to the fact that he had preferred to speak to the press before exercising the available legal remedies (see paragraph 16 above).

29. The Court reiterates that the special status of lawyers gives them a central position in the administration of justice as intermediaries between the public and the courts. Such a position explains the usual restrictions on the conduct of members of the Bar (see the Casado Coca v. Spain judgment of 24 February 1994, Series A no. 285-A, p. 21, § 54).

Moreover, the Court has already held that the courts – the guarantors of justice, whose role is fundamental in a State based on the rule of law – must enjoy public confidence (see the De Haes and Gijsels v. Belgium judgment of 24 February 1997, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1997-I, p. 234, § 37). Regard being had to the key role of lawyers in this field, it is legitimate to expect them to contribute to the proper administration of justice, and thus to maintain public confidence therein.

30. In the present case Mr Schöpfer held his press conference on 9 November 1992, stating on that occasion, inter alia, that the journalists were his last resort (see paragraph 8 above). On 18 November 1992 he appealed to the Lucerne Court of Appeal against the Hochdorf prefect's refusal of the application for his client's release. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal for lack of standing, but upheld the complaint that bringing Mr Schöpfer's client before one of the district clerks had been unlawful. It accordingly ordered its decision to be brought to the attention of the public prosecutor's office, as the prefect's supervisory authority (see paragraph 13 above).

31. Thus Mr Schöpfer first publicly criticised the administration of justice in Hochdorf and then exercised a legal remedy which proved effective with regard to the complaint in question. In so doing his conduct was scarcely compatible with the contribution it is legitimate to expect lawyers to make to maintaining public confidence in the judicial authorities.

32. The above finding is reinforced by the seriousness and general nature of the criticisms made by the applicant and the tone in which he chose to make them. For example, he said at the press conference that he was speaking to the journalists because they were his last resort and because at the Hochdorf district authority offices the laws of the Canton of Lucerne and human rights had for years been flagrantly disregarded (see paragraph 8 above). On 13 November 1992 a daily newspaper published a summary of a press release in which Mr Schöpfer had stated that his client's arrest had breached the Convention and – "in a crude and unacceptable manner" – the cantonal Code of Criminal Procedure (see paragraph 12 above).

33. It is true that Article 10 protects not only the substance of the ideas and information expressed but also the form in which they are conveyed (see the De Haes and Gijsels judgment cited above, p. 236, § 48). It also goes without saying that freedom of expression is secured to lawyers too, who are certainly entitled to comment in public on the administration of justice, but their criticism must not overstep certain bounds. In that connection, account must be taken of the need to strike the right balance between the various interests involved, which include the public's right to receive information about questions arising from judicial decisions, the requirements of the proper administration of justice and the dignity of the legal profession (see the Casado Coca judgment cited above, p. 21, § 55, and the De Haes and Gijsels judgment cited above, pp. 233–34, § 37). Because of their direct, continuous contact with their members, the Bar authorities and a country's courts are in a better position than an international court to determine how, at a given time, the right balance can be struck. That is why they have a certain margin of appreciation in assessing the necessity of an interference in this area, but this margin is subject to European supervision as regards both the relevant rules and the decisions applying them (see the Casado Coca judgment cited above, pp. 20–21, §§ 50 and 55).

34. The Court notes that Mr Schöpfer – who was a lawyer – had raised in public his complaints on the subject of criminal proceedings which were at that time pending before a criminal court. In addition to the general nature, the seriousness and the tone of the applicant's assertions, the Court notes that he first held a press conference, claiming that this was his last resort, and only afterwards lodged an appeal before the Lucerne Court of Appeal, which was partly successful. He also omitted to apply to the other supervisory body for the district authority, the public prosecutor's office, whose ineffectiveness he did not attempt to establish except by means of mere assertions. Having regard also to the modest amount of the fine imposed on the applicant, the Court considers that the authorities did not go beyond their margin of appreciation in punishing Mr Schöpfer. There has accordingly been no breach of Article 10.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

Holds by seven votes to two that there has been no breach of Article 10 of the Convention.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DE MEYER

(Translation)

The applicant took exception to the arrest of one of his clients, which he considered unlawful. He was annoyed to learn from the man's wife that two district clerks had told her that she would have to instruct a different lawyer if she wanted to obtain her husband's release. In order to express his dissatisfaction he held a press conference at which he apparently stated, among other assertions, that at the Hochdorf district authority offices the laws of the canton and human rights had been flagrantly breached for years. When articles on the case then appeared in two Lucerne newspapers, together with a press release issued by the public prosecutor's office, the applicant also issued a press release, repeating his criticisms and stating in particular that his client's arrest had breached the Convention and the Code of Criminal Procedure in a crude and unacceptable manner[1].

The Lucerne Court of Appeal upheld, at least in part, the applicant's complaints about the lawfulness of the procedure followed at the time of his client's arrest[2].

Was it, in those circumstances, "necessary in a democratic society" to fine him 500 Swiss francs? I have not been convinced that it was.

I find the criticisms made of him – that he had failed to observe discretion, engaged in covert publicity, indulged in cheap showmanship and used an immoderate tone[3] – rather artificial and strained. I do not think they were sufficient to justify the interference in the present case with his freedom of expression on matters of public interest which particularly concerned him as a lawyer[4], namely the administration of justice and respect for human rights[5].

1. See paragraphs 6 to 12 of the judgment.
2. See paragraph 13 of the judgment.
3. See paragraph 16 of the judgment.
4. And no doubt also to some extent as a former member of the Cantonal Council, although that was not necessarily relevant as regards the Bar's code of conduct.
5. See, mutatis mutandis, the Ezelin v. France judgment of 26 April 1991, Series A no. 202, pp. 20–23, §§ 48–53, the Barthold v. Germany judgment of 25 March 1985, Series A no. 90, pp. 24–26, §§ 55–59, and the De Haes and Gijsels v. Belgium judgment of 24 February 1997, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1997-I, pp. 233–37, §§ 37–49.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE JAMBREK

This case concerns a lawyer's freedom of expression. The situation in the Lucerne judicial system as relevant for the present case was exceptional. Both Mr Schöpfer and the authorities engaged in a long-standing polemic. The applicant's role was not that of a politician but a legal expert promoting changes in criminal law, who got involved in conflict with local civil servants. Furthermore, he was involved in a concrete case and on top of that he was influenced by the wife of his client. In such a situation he might have had grounds to believe her although her allegations were denied by civil servants. Thus the applicant found himself in exceptional circumstances and his reaction might have been improper due to such circumstances, which however could also be considered to justify his behaviour. At the same time he was engaged in a legislative fight for his principles. The applicant considered that he could not rely on the remedies available in his efforts to get appointed as an ex officio lawyer for his client. Therefore he did not act on purpose in a political way. His statements to the press seem partly right and partly wrong. Furthermore, those originating from the press were authored by the press and the applicant therefore cannot be held responsible for everything that was included in them.

Although the penalty of 500 Swiss francs represents a relatively small sum it nevertheless degraded his personal esteem and professional status in a symbolic way. In this light the penalty may be considered rather harsh and not necessary in a democratic society.

I also wish to refer to the kind of points raised in public by the applicant. It transpires from paragraph 56 of the Worm v. Austria judgment of 29 August 1997 (Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1997-V, p. 1554) that matters of general concern relating to a trial may be reported and commented upon without necessarily interfering with the independent judicial process.

CASE OF SILVER AND OTHERS v. THE UNITED KINGDOM

(Application no. 5947/72; 6205/73; 7052/75; 7061/75; 7107/75; 7113/75; 7136/75)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

25 March 1983

In the case of Silver and others,

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Court*, as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr. G. WIARDA, President,
Mr. Thór VILHJÁLMSSON,
Mr. F. GÖLCÜKLÜ,
Mr. F. MATSCHER,
Mr. L.-E. PETTITI,
Sir Vincent EVANS,
Mr. C. RUSSO,

and also Mr. M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr. H. PETZOLD, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 23 and 24 September 1982 and 24 and 25 February 1983,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case of Silver and others was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission"). The case originated in seven applications (nos. 5947/72, 6205/73, 7052/75, 7061/75, 7107/75, 7113/75 and 7136/75) against the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland lodged with the Commission on various dates between 1972 and 1975 by Mr. Reuben Silver, Mr. Clifford Dixon Noe, Mrs. Judith Colne, Mr. James Henry Tuttle, Mr. Gary Cooper, Mr. Michael McMahon and Mr. Desmond Roy Carne under Article 25 (art. 25) of the Convention. The Commission ordered the joinder of the applications on 11 March 1977.

2. The Commission's request was lodged with the registry of the Court on 18 March 1981, within the period of three months laid down by Articles 32 § 1 and 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47). The request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) and to the declaration whereby the United Kingdom recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46). The purpose of the request was to obtain a decision as to whether or not the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Articles 6 § 1, 8 and 13 (art. 6-1, art. 8, art. 13).

* Note by the registry: In the version of the Rules applicable when proceedings were instituted. A revised version of the Rules of Court entered into force on 1 January 1983, but only in respect of cases referred to the Court after that date.

3. The Chamber of seven judges to be constituted included, as ex officio members, Sir Vincent Evans, the elected judge of British nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr. G. Wiarda, the President of the Court (Rule 21 § 3 (b) of the Rules of Court). On 25 April 1981, the President drew by lot, in the presence of the Registrar, the names of the five other members, namely Mrs. D. Bindschedler-Robert, Mr. F. Matscher, Mr. L.-E. Pettiti, Mr. C. Russo and Mr. R. Bernhardt (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 § 4) (art. 43).

Subsequently, Mr. F. Gölcüklü and Mr. Thór Vilhjálmsson, substitute judges, took the respective places of Mrs. Bindschedler-Robert, whom the President had exempted from sitting on the case, and Mr. Bernhardt, who was prevented from taking part in the further consideration of the case (Rules 22 § 1 and 24 §§ 1 and 4).

4. Mr. Wiarda, who had assumed the office of President of the Chamber (Rule 21 § 5), ascertained, through the Registrar, the views of the Agent of the Government of the United Kingdom ("the Government") and the Delegates of the Commission regarding the procedure to be followed. He decided on 4 May that the Agent should have until 4 September 1981 to file a memorial and that the Delegates should be entitled to file a memorial in reply within two months from the date of the transmission of the Government's memorial to them by the Registrar. The President agreed on 13 August to extend the first of these time-limits until 2 October 1981.

The Government's memorial was received at the registry on 2 October 1981. On 4 December, the Secretary to the Commission, who had informed the Registrar on 14 October that the Delegates did not themselves wish to reply in writing, transmitted to the Court observations on the memorial, which had been submitted to the Delegates by the applicants' lawyers.

5. The Court held a preparatory meeting on 27 January 1982 when it formulated certain proposals with a view to the limitation of the scope of the hearings to be held before it. On the same occasion, the Court drew up a list of questions and requests which were communicated by the Registrar on 10 February to the Government and the Commission; replies thereto were received from the Government on 14 June and, as regards one question, from the Commission on 6 August.

6. After consulting, through the Registrar, the Agent of the Government and the Delegates of the Commission, the President directed, on 17 May, that the hearings should open on 22 September 1982 and, on 22 July that their scope should be limited in the manner set out in his Order of the last-mentioned date.

7. The hearings were held in public at the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 22 September 1982.

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government:

Mrs. A. GLOVER, Legal Adviser,

Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Agent,
Mr. S. BROWN,
Mr. N. BRATZA, Barristers-at-Law, Counsel,
Mrs. S. EVANS,
Mr. C. OSBORNE,
Miss V. DEWS, Home Office,
Mr. R. PHILLIPS, Treasury Solicitor's Office, Advisers;

- for the Commission:
Mr. J. FAWCETT,
Mr. F. ERMACORA, Delegates,
Mr. A. LESTER, Q.C.,
Mr. M. BELOFF, Q.C.,
Mr. B. RAYMOND,
Mr. S. GROSZ, Solicitors, assisting the Delegates (Rule 29 § 1, second sentence, of the Rules of Court).

The Court heard addresses by Mr. Brown for the Government and by Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Ermacora and Mr. Lester for the Commission, and also replies to questions put by two of its members.

8. On 22 September, the Commission filed a number of documents, including a memorial which they had received from the applicants regarding the application of Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention in the event that the Court should find a violation to have occurred.

On the same date, the President directed that the Government should have until 22 November to reply in writing to the said memorial, a time-limit which he subsequently extended at the Government's request to 14 January 1983. The reply was received at the registry on the last-mentioned date.

On 25 January 1983, the President directed that the Delegates of the Commission should have until 14 March 1983 to file any observations which they or the applicants might wish to make on the aforesaid reply.

AS TO THE FACTS

9. The principal complaint of all seven applicants was that the control of their mail by the prison authorities constituted a breach of their right to respect for correspondence and of their freedom of expression, guaranteed by Articles 8 and 10 (art. 8, art. 10) of the Convention, respectively. They also alleged that, contrary to Article 13 (art. 13), no effective domestic remedy existed for the aforesaid breaches. In addition, Mr. Silver claimed that he had been denied access to the courts, in violation of Article 6 § 1

(art. 6-1), on account of the refusal of two petitions for permission to seek legal advice.

I. FACTS PARTICULAR TO THE INDIVIDUAL APPLICANTS

A. Mr. Silver

10. The first applicant, Mr. Reuben Silver, was born in 1915 and was a United Kingdom citizen. When he lodged his application with the Commission (20 November 1972), he was detained in prison in England. He was released from prison in February 1974 and died in March 1979.

11. In the period from January 1972 to March 1973, 7 of Mr. Silver's letters were stopped by the prison authorities for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 59, 62, 63, 66, 68 and 69 below.

This applicant did not complain through the internal prison channels (see paragraphs 51-53 below) of the stopping of his correspondence; he claimed that the prison governor prevented him from raising each incident by way of petition to the Home Secretary because he, Mr. Silver, already had petitions outstanding at the material times.

12. On 20 November 1972, Mr. Silver petitioned the Home Secretary for permission to seek legal advice concerning allegedly negligent treatment in prison and also complained, inter alia, about his medical and dental treatment. Permission was refused on 18 April 1973. On 30 July 1973, he submitted another petition in which he referred to his earlier petition and requested leave to seek legal advice about his dental treatment. The second petition was apparently granted on 1 October 1973, but Mr. Silver claimed that he was never so informed. At the time of both petitions, prisoners could not seek legal advice about prospective civil proceedings without the Home Secretary's leave (see paragraph 32 below).

B. Mr. Noe

13. The second applicant, Mr. Clifford Dixon Noe, is a citizen of the United States of America, born in 1930. When he lodged his application with the Commission (1 February 1973), he was serving a sentence of imprisonment in England after being convicted of fraud. He was released from prison on 31 January 1977 and subsequently deported from the United Kingdom.

14. In the period from May 1972 to April 1975 and for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 6O, 61, 67 and 71 below, 4 of Mr. Noe's letters were stopped by the prison authorities and the posting of a further letter was delayed for three weeks.

This applicant apparently complained through the internal prison channels of this action, other than the stopping of his letter no. 9, but without success.

C. Mrs. Colne

15. The third applicant, Mrs. Judith Colne, is an Australian citizen, born in 1927. She is a schoolteacher and resides in London.

16. Around May 1974, Mrs. Colne began correspondence with a Mr. Michael Williams, the brother of an imprisoned friend of hers. Mr. Williams was then detained in H.M. Prison Albany and was a "category A" prisoner, this being the security category reserved for persons who, if they escaped, would be highly dangerous to the public or the police or to the security of the State. Following his transfer in July 1974 to H.M. Prison Hull, their correspondence was noticed and stopped for the reason indicated in paragraph 59 below. It resumed, unnoticed, following his further transfer to H.M. Prison Wakefield in August 1974 but was discovered during the following month; thereafter, and for the same reason, all correspondence between them was prevented.

This applicant raised the matter, both directly and through a Member of Parliament, with the Home Secretary, but without success.

D. Mr. Tuttle

17. The fourth applicant, Mr. James Henry Tuttle, is a United Kingdom citizen, born in 1914. When he lodged his application with the Commission (20 March 1975), he was detained in prison in England. He was released on licence on 5 January 1981.

18. In March 1975, 2 of Mr. Tuttle’s letters were stopped by the prison authorities for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 62, 64 and 68 below.

This applicant apparently complained, in a petition to the Home Secretary, of the stopping of his correspondence, but without success.

E. Mr. Cooper

19. The fifth applicant, Mr. Gary Cooper, is a United Kingdom citizen, born in 1946. When he lodged his application with the Commission (28 October 1974), he was serving a sentence of imprisonment in England. He was released on 14 December 1981, but was later imprisoned again.

20. In the period from April 1974 to March 1976, 14 of Mr. Cooper’s letters were stopped by the prison authorities for the reasons or in the circumstances indicated in paragraphs 60, 65, 67 and 71 below.

This applicant apparently complained unsuccessfully through the internal prison channels of the stopping of 6 of the 14 letters, namely nos. 20, 22, 23, 24, 26 and 27.

F. Mr. McMahon

21. The sixth applicant, Mr. Michael McMahon, is a United Kingdom citizen, born in 1944. When he lodged his application with the Commission (8 July 1975), he was serving a sentence of imprisonment in England, as a "category A" prisoner, after being convicted of murder. He was released on 18 July 1980.

22. In the period from March 1975 to February 1976, 11 of Mr. McMahon's outgoing letters were stopped by the prison authorities and one letter to him was withheld.

This applicant submitted three petitions to the Home Secretary, of which one was successful: it was admitted that a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury (no. 33) should not have been stopped as the addressee was a Member of Parliament; the letter was accordingly sent and Mr. McMahon withdrew his complaint in this respect. The reasons for the stopping or withholding of the remaining 11 letters are indicated in paragraphs 59, 61, 66 and 70 below.

G. Mr. Carne

23. The seventh applicant, Mr. Desmond Roy Carne, is a United Kingdom citizen, born in 1945. When he lodged his application with the Commission (5 April 1975), he was serving a sentence of imprisonment in England after being convicted of theft. He was released on 30 August 1977.

24. In the period from November 1974 to May 1976, 22 of Mr. Carne's letters were stopped by the prison authorities for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 59, 60, 64, 66, 67 and 68 below.

This applicant apparently complained, either through the internal prison channels or by having the matter raised with the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, of the stopping of each of these letters, but to no avail.

II. DOMESTIC LAW AND PRACTICE

25. The control over and responsibility for prisons and prisoners in England and Wales is vested by the Prison Act 1952 in the Home Secretary. He is empowered by section 47(1) of that Act to make rules "for the regulation and management of prisons ... and for the classification, treatment, employment, discipline and control of persons required to be detained therein". Such rules are contained in statutory instruments laid before Parliament and made in accordance with the negative resolution procedure, that is, they come into operation unless Parliament otherwise resolves.

The rules made by the Home Secretary currently in force, a number of which relate to prisoners' correspondence, are the Prison Rules 1964, as amended ("the Rules").

26. With a view to securing uniformity of practice throughout prison establishments, the Home Secretary also issues to prison governors management guides or directives in the form of Standing Orders ("Orders") and Circular Instructions ("Instructions"). Unless otherwise authorised, governors are required to comply with these directives, but they do not have, or purport to have, the force of law.

At the time of the events giving rise to this case and until 30 November 1981, both Orders and Instructions contained, in addition to directives on the control of prisoners' correspondence, internal rules and guidance of a general nature concerning the day to day administration of the prison. The Orders and Instructions were made available to Members of both Houses of Parliament for reference but not to the public or prisoners, although the latter received, by means of cell cards, information about certain aspects of the control of correspondence.

With effect from 1 December 1981, the directives on prisoners' correspondence were substantially revised. In addition, revised Orders relating to correspondence have been published in their entirety, matters of a management or administrative nature which do not concern a prisoner's entitlement to correspond and were considered inappropriate for publication having been eliminated from the Orders and embodied in Instructions. The Rules themselves have not been amended, although the Government indicated at the hearing before the Court that as soon as practicable Rule 34(8) (see paragraph 29 below) would be repealed in so far as it affected correspondence.

27. As far as prisoners' correspondence is concerned, the Home Secretary's directives to governors were and are intended to serve a dual function: on the one hand, to circumscribe the discretion conferred on governors by the Rules, and, on the other, to state the manner in which the Home Secretary has decided in certain respects to exercise his own discretionary powers thereunder. The principal provisions which the Rules contain on the subject are set out below, accompanied by a summary of:

(a) the relevant Orders and Instructions in force until 30 November 1981; and

(b) the changes that took effect after that date.

A. General provisions

28. The following Rules, containing general provisions on the control of correspondence, came into operation on 25 March 1964 and are still in force:

> "33(1) The Secretary of State may, with a view to securing discipline and good order or the prevention of crime or in the interests of any persons, impose restrictions, either generally or in a particular case, upon the communications to be permitted between a prisoner and other persons.
> (3) Except as provided by these Rules, every letter or communication to or from a prisoner shall" (or, with effect from 1 June 1974, "may") "be read or examined by the governor or an officer deputed by him, and the governor may, at his discretion, stop any letter or communication on the ground that its contents are objectionable or that it is of inordinate length."

B. Provisions concerning the identity of correspondents

29. The following basic Rules, both concerning the identity of persons with whom a prisoner may correspond, came into effect on 25 March 1964 and are still in force:

> "33(2) Except as provided by statute or these Rules, a prisoner shall not be permitted to communicate with any outside person, or that person with him, without the leave of the Secretary of State.
> 34(8) A prisoner shall not be entitled under Rule 34" - which regulates the quantity of correspondence - "to communicate with any person in connection with any legal or other business, or with any person other than a relative or friend, except with the leave of the Secretary of State."

1. Position prior to 1 December 1981

30. Under Rule 34(8), as supplemented by Orders 5A 22, 5A 23 and 5A 30, prisoners had to seek the Home Secretary’s leave to correspond with any person other than a close relation; they were, however, also normally allowed, without the necessity to seek such leave, to correspond with other relatives or existing friends, but the governor had discretion to forbid such correspondence on grounds of security or good order and discipline or in the interests of the prevention or discouragement of crime. Governors had a discretion - which they would have been unlikely to exercise in favour of a "category A" prisoner, such as Mr. Williams or Mr. McMahon - to allow communications with other persons not personally known to the prisoner before he came into custody, but generally he could not write to other prisoners, ex-prisoners, marriage bureaux, "Monomark addresses" or specified categories of pen friends.

In addition, standing leave had been granted for correspondence falling into certain special categories, as explained in paragraphs 31-36 below.

(a) Correspondence with legal advisers

31. With effect from 1 January 1973, uncensored correspondence relating to civil or criminal proceedings to which the prisoner was already a party was permitted under Rule 37A(1), which is still in force and reads:

> "A prisoner who is a party to any legal proceedings may correspond with his legal adviser in connection with the proceedings and unless the Governor has reason to suppose that any such correspondence contains matter not relating to the proceedings it shall not be read or stopped under Rule 33(3) of these Rules."

32. Until 6 August 1975, inmates had to petition the Home Secretary for permission to seek advice about, or give instructions for, the institution of civil proceedings (with the exception of certain divorce cases). On that date, Instruction 45/1975 introduced changes which were subsequently reflected in Rule 37A(4) and directions made by the Secretary of State thereunder, in the shape of Order 17A. Rule 37A(4), which came into operation on 26 April 1976 and is still in force, reads:

> "Subject to any directions of the Secretary of State, a prisoner may correspond with a solicitor for the purpose of obtaining legal advice concerning any cause of action in relation to which the prisoner may become a party to civil proceedings or for the purpose of instructing the solicitor to issue such proceedings."

Order 17A provided, inter alia, that:

(i) the inmate had to have sought a solicitor’s advice before he would be permitted to institute proceedings;

(ii) at each stage a written application, with reasons, had first to be made to the prison governor for the necessary facilities; they had to grant immediately, except that, in the case of prospective civil proceedings against the Home Office "arising out of or in connexion with" the imprisonment, the "prior ventilation rule" (see paragraph 47 below) generally applied.

Correspondence in this category was otherwise subject to the restrictions on contents mentioned at paragraphs 41-47 below.

(b) Correspondence with Members of Parliament

33. Prisoners were free to communicate with their Members of Parliament, subject to the restrictions on contents mentioned at paragraphs 41-47 below.

(c) Correspondence with Consular and Commonwealth officials

34. Prisoners who were foreign nationals or citizens of the Irish Republic or a Commonwealth country were free to communicate with the accredited representatives of their countries in the United Kingdom, subject to the restrictions on contents mentioned at paragraphs 41-47 below.

(d) Correspondence with certain organisations

35. Under Order 5A 31(2) b., a prisoner could, without first seeking leave from the Home Secretary or the prison governor, write to the National Council for Civil Liberties, "Justice", "Release" or the Howard League for Penal Reform to seek legal advice about his conviction and sentence, or about general matters. He could, in addition, write to these organisations to ask for legal proceedings to be instituted and, although originally he could not seek legal advice from them about any matter relating to his prison treatment, this was subsequently allowed by Instruction 38/1977, subject however to the "prior ventilation rule" (see paragraph 47 below). In the two latter cases, however, the prisoner had first to follow the procedures introduced by Instruction 45/1975 and then enshrined in Order 17A (application to the governor for facilities; see paragraph 32 above).

Correspondence in this category was otherwise subject to the restrictions on contents mentioned at paragraphs 41-47 below.

(e) Applications to the European Commission of Human Rights

36. Special provisions applied to applications to the Commission; in particular, the Home Secretary's leave was required neither for their submission nor for correspondence with legal advisers relative thereto, and the "prior ventilation rule" did not apply.

2. Position with effect from 1 December 1981

37. Most of the restrictions which the earlier Orders and Instructions contained on the identity of correspondents have now been abolished. Although the relevant Rules have not themselves been amended, the revised Orders (nos. 5B23-5B30) state that, provided the provisions concerning the contents of correspondence (see paragraph 48 below) are observed, a prisoner may communicate with any person or organisation, subject to certain exceptions of which the principal are:

(a) recipients of correspondence (other than spouses) who have requested that no further letters be sent;

(b) other prisoners, who are not relatives, where there is reason to believe that correspondence would seriously impede rehabilitation or where the prevention of communication is desirable in the interests of security or good order or discipline;

(c) ex-prisoners, where there is reason to believe that correspondence would seriously impede rehabilitation;

(d) a person (other than a close relative) or organisation believed to be planning or engaged in activities that seriously threaten the security or good order of a prison establishment.

C. Provisions concerning the quantity of correspondence

38. The following basic Rules concerning the amount of correspondence which a prisoner may conduct came into operation on 25 March 1964 and are still in force:

> "34(1) An unconvicted prisoner may send and receive as many letters ... as he wishes within such limits and subject to such conditions as the Secretary of State may direct, either generally or in a particular case.
> (2) A convicted prisoner shall be entitled
> (a) to send and to receive a letter on his reception into a prison and thereafter once a week;
> ...
> (3) The governor may allow a prisoner an additional letter ... where necessary for his welfare or that of his family.
> (4) The governor may allow a prisoner entitled to a visit to send and to receive a letter instead.
> (6) The visiting committee or board of visitors" (or, with effect from 1 January 1972, "The board of visitors") "may allow a prisoner an additional letter ... in special circumstances ...
> (7) The Secretary of State may allow additional letters ... in relation to any prisoner or class of prisoners."

1. Position prior to 1 December 1981

39. In addition to his entitlement under Rule 34(2) to send - at public expense - and to receive one letter per week, a convicted prisoner was allowed to send at his own expense at least one extra letter per week, and to receive a reply (Order 5A 3(8) and Instruction 155/1968).

The prison authorities' discretion under Rules 34(3), (6) and (7) to allow further letters was exercised where possible.

These quantitative restrictions did not apply to remand prisoners (Rule 34(1)), but they were in most other respects subject to the same regulations on correspondence as convicted prisoners.

2. Position with effect from 1 December 1981

40. The revised Orders (nos. 5B7 and 5B14) do not alter the basic entitlement but specify that additional extra letters should be allowed as far as practicable.

D. Provisions concerning the contents of correspondence

41. In addition to Rule 33(3), the text whereof appears at paragraph 28 above, the following basic Rule concerning the contents of prisoners' correspondence came into operation on 25 March 1964 and is still in force:

> "34(8) A prisoner shall not be entitled under Rule 34" - which regulates the quantity of correspondence - "to communicate with any person in connection with any legal or other business ... except with the leave of the Secretary of State."

1. Position prior to 1 December 1981

42. Rules 33(3) and 34(8) were supplemented as follows by various Orders and Instructions.

43. Under Order 5A 31, a convicted prisoner was specifically prohibited from making representations on matters connected with his trial, conviction or sentence to any judge, public authority, representative of any Commonwealth or foreign government (subject to certain exceptions for prisoners who were foreign nationals or citizens of another Commonwealth country) or unofficial organisation (subject again to certain specific exceptions). Such representations could, however, be made to the Home Secretary.

44. Under Order 5A 24, prisoners were not allowed to send letters requesting anyone to make on their behalf a communication which they would not be permitted to make directly, or certain other letters which would circumvent the regulations.

45. (a) Orders 5A 26(4) a. and b. and 5A 29 prohibited the inclusion in outgoing letters (other than those to Members of Parliament or Consular or Commonwealth officials, to which special rules applied) of any of the following matters:

(i) objectionable references to persons in public life;

(ii) discussion of crime and criminal methods or of the offences of others;

(iii) any complaint about the courts, the police and the prison authorities that was a deliberate and calculated attempt to hold them up to contempt;

(iv) threats of or incitement to violence;

(v) material intended for publication or for use on wireless or television (this rule was relaxed as regards certain specialised publications);

(vi) grossly improper language;

(vii) statements about private individuals which were patently scandalous or libellous or otherwise deliberately calculated to do them harm;

(viii) begging requests for money or valuable property;

(ix) complaints about prison treatment;

(x) allegations against prison officers;

(xi) attempts to stimulate public agitation or petition.

Similar regulations applied to incoming letters (Order 5A 26(4) d.).

As recorded in paragraphs 32 and 35 above, the prohibition on the inclusion of complaints about prison treatment or allegations against prison officers did not apply to certain correspondence with legal advisers (after 6 August 1975) and with specified organisations (after 26 August 1977), provided always that the "prior ventilation rule" (see paragraph 47 below) had been satisfied.

(b) Until 28 November 1975, a broadly similar list of prohibited contents applied to letters to Members of Parliament, except that they could contain complaints about prison treatment or against prison staff in respect of which the "prior ventilation rule" had been observed. Thereafter, a letter to a Member of Parliament would have been stopped only if it included an unventilated complaint of that kind (Order 5C, as amended by Instruction 62/1975). At the time of the change of practice, a notice summarising the regulations concerning letters to Members of Parliament was issued for the information of prisoners. It contained the following passage:

> "A complaint or request about prison treatment should be made to the Governor, Board of Visitors or visiting officer, or by petition to the Home Secretary .... A complaint against a member of staff should be made to the Governor. A complaint on these matters may not be made to a Member of Parliament before official action is complete."

(c) Letters from convicted prisoners who were foreign nationals or citizens of the Irish Republic or a Commonwealth country to Consular or Commonwealth officials were subject to the same rules as to contents as letters to Members of Parliament until 3 September 1975. On that date this restriction was abolished (Order 5A 20, as amended by the Instruction of 3 September 1975).

46. With the exception of certain correspondence in connection with legal business for which standing leave had been granted as explained in paragraphs 31, 32 and 35 above, Rule 34(8) prohibited any communications on any legal or other business without the prior leave of the Home Secretary. The conduct of business by prisoners was further dealt with by Orders 1C 4-6, the basic provision being that "an inmate" - whether convicted or not - "may not conduct any business activity in prison, but should be allowed reasonable facilities for arranging its conduct on his behalf". However, subject to this general rule, governors had discretion to allow an inmate to deal with certain limited personal business matters, in particular to dispose of private property, to sign a cheque or to make or sign a will or other document. The broad effect of the regulations was that, although a prisoner could not participate personally on a continuing basis in a business concern, he was allowed to make arrangements to protect the value, for his own and his family's benefit, of his personal property and any business interests.

47. A complaint about prison treatment or an allegation against a prison officer could be contained or referred to only in correspondence with legal advisers, specified organisations, Members of Parliament or Consular or Commonwealth officials, as indicated in paragraph 45 above. Moreover, under the "prior ventilation rule" - set out, in particular, in Order 17A - a letter in any of these categories which alluded to such a matter would, with certain exceptions, be stopped unless and until the prisoner had ventilated his complaint through the normal internal channels (petition to the Home Secretary, or application to the Board of Visitors, a visiting officer of the Home Secretary or the prison governor) and been given a definitive reply. Thereafter, and in general irrespective of the outcome, the correspondence could proceed.

2. Position with effect from 1 December 1981

48. Rules 33(3) and 34(8) are now supplemented by the new Orders 5B34 and 5B40. The current position is as follows.

(a) The prohibition on representations about trial, conviction or sentence (see paragraph 43 above) is abolished.

(b) Provisions similar to the earlier Order 5A 24 (designed to prevent the evasion or circumvention of the regulations - see paragraph 44 above) remain in force.

(c) The list of prohibited contents (see paragraph 45 (a) above) has been revised; the main items which may now not be included in incoming or outgoing letters may be summarised as follows:

(i) material which would jeopardise prison security;

(ii) material which would assist or encourage the commission of a disciplinary or criminal offence;

(iii) material which could jeopardise national security;

(iv) descriptions of the making of certain destructive devices;

(v) certain obscure or coded messages;

(vi) threats of violence or damage to property likely to induce fear in the recipient;

(vii) blackmail or extortion;

(viii) certain indecent or obscene material;

(ix) information which would create a clear threat or present danger of violence or physical harm to any person;

(x) complaints about prison treatment, in respect of which the "simultaneous ventilation rule" (see paragraph 49 below) has not been observed;

(xi) material initiating a private prosecution;

(xii) certain specified material intended for publication or for use by radio or television;

(xiii) in the case of a convicted prisoner, material constituting the conduct of a business activity, which expression is defined so as to exclude certain specified personal transactions.

The foregoing list does not apply to correspondence with Consular and Commonwealth officials or, with the exception of item (x), to correspondence with Members of the United Kingdom Parliament (new Orders 5D5 and 5E6).

As regards item (xiii) above, it remains the basic rule that inmates may not conduct any business activity from prison, but this no longer applies to unconvicted prisoners who may correspond without restriction about such matters (revised Orders 1C 4 and 1C 5).

49. The "prior ventilation rule" (see paragraph 47 above) has now been replaced by the "simultaneous ventilation rule", set out in Order 5B34 j. A complaint about prison treatment may be referred to in correspondence as soon as it has been raised through the prescribed procedures and without the prisoner’s having to await the outcome of the internal enquiry. The rule does not apply to complaints not requiring investigation or to general complaints in respect of which no corrective or remedial action is possible (for example, regarding overcrowding): these may be mentioned in correspondence without any internal ventilation. Moreover, the effect of the new Orders is that, in contrast to the earlier position, a duly ventilated complaint may now be referred to in any letter, irrespective of the identity of the correspondent.

E. Censorship practice (before and after 1 December 1981)

50. Except as otherwise provided by the Rules (for example, Rule 37A(1); see paragraph 31 above) and until 1 June 1974, all communications to or from a prisoner had, according to Rule 33(3), to be read and examined, although Order 5A 26 gave prison governors a discretion to subject specified domestic correspondence to no more than a cursory examination. With effect from that date, Rule 33(3) was amended to make reading and examination optional, but governors remained and remain subject to the Home Secretary’s directives in this respect. Thus, at the present time, outgoing domestic correspondence is normally not to be read or examined at open establishments; elsewhere, all correspondence is to be examined but not necessarily read (new Order 5B32).

A prisoner whose letter is stopped on account of its contents will be given the opportunity of rewriting it. Where the cause of the stoppage is the addressee's identity, the prisoner may use his entitlement to that letter to write to another person.

F. Complaints concerning censorship (before and after 1 December 1981)

1. Internal channels of complaint

51. An inmate who is aggrieved by a decision to stop or censor his correspondence may complain to the prison governor, the Board of Visitors or a visiting officer of the Home Secretary or he may petition the Home Secretary himself. A prisoner may ventilate his complaint through any or all of these channels and, if more than one is utilised, in such sequence as he wishes.

(a) The Board of Visitors

52. As far as the Board of Visitors is concerned, it may examine the compatibility of the decision complained of with the Rules and the Home Secretary's directives. It will draw the governor's attention to any irregularity, or report to the Home Secretary; although its powers are advisory in character, its advice will be implemented save in exceptional circumstances.

(b) Petitions to the Home Secretary

53. Inmates have the right to submit petitions to the Home Secretary about any matter, for example to seek a permission which the local prison management is not empowered to grant or has refused, or to complain of prison treatment.

On a petition being made by a prisoner, complaining of a decision of the prison authorities to stop or censor his correspondence, the Home Secretary would, if he concluded that the relevant Orders had not been properly interpreted or applied by the prison authorities, issue directions to them to secure compliance. Although it is possible for him to depart from the Orders in particular cases, this is likely to occur only rarely, if at all, since their very purpose is to ensure uniformity of practice and to avoid arbitrary interference with correspondence.

Prior to 1 December 1981, directives concerning the submission of petitions were contained in Orders 5B 1-16. It was, in particular, provided that, with certain exceptions, a prisoner could not petition if and so long as he was awaiting a reply to an earlier petition (Order 5B 12(2)).

With effect from 1 December 1981, the provisions of Order 5B 12(2) have been relaxed by new Orders 5C9 and 5C10. A further petition may now be submitted if a month has elapsed since the submission of the previous petition. Moreover, even though an earlier petition be outstanding, a prisoner may petition forthwith on certain specified matters, including interference with his correspondence.

2. The Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration

54. Complaints concerning the control of correspondence may also be raised with the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration (the Ombudsman). Under section 5 of the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967, this officer, who is appointed by the Crown, may, if so requested by a member of the House of Commons, investigate any action taken in the exercise of administrative functions by specified authorities (including the Home Office) where a complaint has been made by a member of the public who claims to have sustained injustice in consequence of "maladministration". Such an investigation may generally not be conducted where court proceedings are available. Section 12 of the Act expressly provides that the Ombudsman may not question the merits of a discretionary decision taken without maladministration; accordingly, his jurisdiction does not extend to interferences with a prisoner's correspondence effected pursuant to a correct exercise of a discretion conferred by the Rules or the Home Secretary's directives. Moreover, he cannot grant direct relief for maladministration since he is limited to reporting the results of his investigation to the Member of Parliament who requested it, the authority concerned and, in certain circumstances, each House of Parliament (section 10).

Until 23 August 1979, prisoners could communicate with the Ombudsman only through a Member of Parliament who was willing to assist. Although this remains the normal method of approach, they may now write directly; however, their letters to the Ombudsman are subject to the same restriction with regard to the simultaneous ventilation of complaints about prison treatment as correspondence with Members of Parliament (see paragraphs 48 and 49 above) and he still cannot proceed with an investigation unless the prisoner's constituency Member so requests.

3. Application to the domestic courts

55. The exercise by the prison authorities of their powers under the Rules to control correspondence is subject to the supervisory control of the English courts by way of proceedings for judicial review. In the exercise of this jurisdiction the courts will intervene to secure compliance by the prison authorities with the Rules in so far as they confer on prisoners an entitlement to send or receive correspondence (for example, Rule 37(A)1; see paragraph 31 above), and to ensure that the discretion to restrict correspondence, conferred on the authorities by the Rules, is not exercised arbitrarily, in bad faith, for an improper motive or in an ultra vires manner.

The Court notes in this context that in Raymond v. Honey 1982 1 All England Law Reports 759, Lord Wilberforce pointed out that it was a principle of English law that "a convicted prisoner, in spite of his imprisonment, retains all civil rights which are not taken away expressly or by necessary implication".

4. Malicious or groundless complaints

56. Sanctions may be imposed on prisoners who commit disciplinary offences. Under Rule 47, the latter include making "any false and malicious allegation against an officer" and repeatedly making "groundless complaints", be it in a petition, correspondence or otherwise. An inmate who makes an allegation against a member of the prison staff is to be warned accordingly (Instruction 88/1961, now replaced by unpublished Instruction 14/1980).

III. THE APPLICATION IN THE PRESENT CASE OF DOMESTIC LAW AND PRACTICE ON THE CONTROL OF CORRESPONDENCE

57. The present case arises from the stopping of 62 letters written by the applicants, that is to say 7 by Mr. Silver, 4 by Mr. Noe, 3 by Mrs. Colne, 2 by Mr. Tuttle, 14 by Mr. Cooper, 10 by Mr. McMahon and 22 by Mr. Carne; in the case of Mrs. Colne, the 3 letters are examples of the correspondence which she was prevented from continuing with Mr. Williams. In addition, Mr. Noe complained of delay in posting one of his outgoing letters and Mr. McMahon of the withholding of one of his incoming letters.

The Government informed the Court that the total number of letters sent and received by prisoners in England and Wales in a year was of the order of ten million. An indication of the total volume of the correspondence of the applicants in this case who were in prison is given by the fact that, in the under-mentioned periods (being periods for which records are most readily available), the number of letters written by them and posted by the prison authorities in the form in which they were written was: Mr. Silver - 419 (20 March 1968 to 2 August 1973); Mr. Noe - 149 (14 November 1972 to 15 April 1975, during which time he was at liberty for almost two years); Mr. Tuttle - 94 (2 January to 29 December 1975); Mr. Cooper - 299 (8 August 1974 to 24 June 1976); Mr. McMahon - 492 (5 December 1974 to 9 February 1977); Mr. Carne - 480 (14 October 1974 to 16 June 1976).

58. The provisions under which, pursuant to the law and practice applicable before 1 December 1981, the 64 letters in question were stopped or delayed are indicated below. In those cases where a letter was stopped for more than one reason, the subsidiary ground or grounds are also stated.

The texts of 59 of these letters are set out in Appendix III to the Commission's report, copies of the remaining 5 not being available. The available letters are those hereinafter referred to by number, the others those referred to solely by date.

A. Provisions concerning the identity of correspondents

Restriction on correspondence other than with a relative or friend (see paragraphs 29-30 above)

59. The following letters were stopped on the ground that they were not sent by or addressed to a relative or existing friend:

(a) Mrs. Colne's letters nos. 13, 14 and 15 to Mr. Williams (see also paragraph 16 above);

(b) Mr. McMahon's letters nos. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40 and 41 (addressed respectively to a broadcasting association, a barrister, the presenter of a television programme, a journalist, the police officer who had been in charge of the investigation of Mr. McMahon's case, a professor of law and the Mayor of Islington) and a letter of 31 December 1975 from the same journalist to Mr. McMahon. The applicant had previously exchanged three letters with the barrister in question, who was not known to him, but their correspondence was prohibited when it appeared that it would go further than a general enquiry. Although letter no. 41 was stopped, Mr. McMahon was apparently allowed to write to a local borough councillor.

This restriction was also a subsidiary ground for stopping Mr. Silver's letter no. 4 and Mr. Carne's letter no. 48 (see paragraph 68 below).

B. Provisions concerning the contents of correspondence

1. Restriction on communications in connection with any legal or other business (see paragraphs 32, 35, 41 and 46 above)

60. (a) Mr. Carne's letter no. 57 to a solicitor and his letter of 15 September 1975 to the National Council for Civil Liberties were stopped as he had not previously applied to the prison governor for facilities to seek legal advice. Both of these letters were written after the entry into force of Instruction 45/1975 (see paragraph 32 above).

(b) Mr. Cooper's letter no. 27 to a solicitor concerning a pending prosecution, which letter also post-dated Instruction 45/1975, was stopped as it was considered that he had already had sufficient facilities to seek legal advice.

(c) The following letters were stopped on the ground of failure to seek the Home Secretary's prior leave:

(i) Mr. Noe's letter no. 10 to a solicitor, which included the following passage: "... the property is going to be lost if you don't come quickly - It is worth 100 to £125,000 - the equity - after refinancing and allowing good solicitor's fees - will be £50 to £75,000 - of which you will have a piece also";

(ii) Mr. Carne's letter no. 49 to the Devon Crown Court, which contained a request that medical reports produced at his trial be sent to his Member of Parliament.

2. Prohibition on representations connected with the prisoner's trial, conviction or sentence (see paragraph 43 above)

61. This prohibition led to the stopping of Mr. Noe's letter no. 8, which was addressed to the Lord Chancellor but actually concerned legal representation at the applicant's appeal. Permission to send the letter was later granted by the Home Office, apparently after the appeal had been heard.

It was also a subsidiary ground for the stopping of Mr. McMahon's letters nos. 35 and 37 (see paragraph 59 above).

3. Prohibition on letters evading or circumventing the regulations (see paragraph 44 above)

62. Mr. Silver's letter no. 1 and Mr. Tuttle's letter no. 18 (see paragraph 68 below), which pre-dated Instruction 45/1975 and Instruction 38/1977 respectively (see paragraphs 32 and 35 above), were also stopped on the subsidiary ground that they therein asked their wives to do what they were not allowed to do themselves: in the first case, to contact a solicitor concerning an injunction against the Home Office in respect of prison treatment and, in the second, to seek legal advice from the National Council for Civil Liberties concerning control of correspondence.

4. Prohibition on discussion of the offences of others (see paragraph 45 (a), item (ii), above)

63. Mr. Silver's letter no. 7, to his wife, was stopped as it contained the following passage: "... one of my close neighbours in the prison is one of the train robbers ... Another one who arrived here last Wednesday is one of the two Asian brothers who reputedly killed .... McKay ..."

5. Prohibition on complaints calculated to hold the authorities up to contempt (see paragraph 45 (a), item (iii), above)

64. Mr. Tuttle's letter no. 17, addressed to his wife, was stopped on the ground that it contained material deliberately calculated to hold the prison authorities up to contempt.

This was also a subsidiary ground for stopping Mr. Carne's letter no. 51 (see paragraph 68 below).

6. Prohibition on threats of violence and grossly improper language (see paragraph 45 (a), items (iv) and (vi), above)

65. Mr. Cooper's letters nos. 28, 29, 30 and 31, all addressed to his parents were stopped on two grounds: that they contained threats of violence and that they employed grossly improper language.

7. Prohibition on material intended for publication (see paragraph 45 (a), item (v), above)

66. The following letters were stopped on the ground that they contained material intended for publication:

(a) Mr. Silver's letter no. 5, addressed to the Advisory Rabbi, The Jewish Chronicle, and seeking dietary advice. The letter was stopped although it was marked "Not for publication" and contained an express request that, because of the rules of the prison, no part of it be published;

(b) Mr. McMahon's letters nos. 32, 34 and 42, the first two being addressed to the producer of a television programme and the third to a newspaper.

This was also a subsidiary ground for stopping Mr. McMahon's letter no. 37 (see paragraph 59 above) and Mr. Carne's letters nos. 60 and 61 (see paragraph 68 below).

8. Prohibition on the inclusion in letters to legal advisers and Members of Parliament of unventilated complaints about prison treatment (see paragraphs 45 (a) and (b) and 47 above)

67. The following letters, all addressed to Members of Parliament, were stopped on the ground that they contained complaints about prison treatment, in respect of which the "prior ventilation rule" had not been observed:

(a) Mr. Noe's letters nos. 9 and 11;

(b) Mr. Cooper's letters nos. 20, 22, 23, 24 and 26, and a further letter of 3 April 1974;

(c) Mr. Carne's letters nos. 43, 45, 53, 54, 58 and 59, and further letters of 27 December 1974 and 11 January 1975.

The stopping of letter no. 43, written whilst Mr. Carne was detained on remand, was the subject of an unsuccessful petition to the Home Secretary; the Government subsequently conceded before the Commission that the censorship was erroneous, as the letter could not be said to contain a complaint.

The same prohibition also led to the stopping of Mr. Carne's letter no. 56, to a solicitor.

Mr. Noe's letters nos. 9 and 11 were stopped under this rule for the additional reason that the addressee was a barrister as well as a Member of Parliament.

9. Prohibition on the inclusion in general correspondence of complaints about prison treatment (see paragraph 45 (a), item (ix), above)

68. The following letters were stopped because they included complaints about prison treatment:

(a) Mr. Silver's letters nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 6, no. 4 being addressed to the Chief Rabbi and the remainder to the applicant's wife. It appears that, one week after the stopping of letter no. 4, which concerned dietary grievances, Mr. Silver was allowed to send a similar letter to the Rabbi;

(b) Mr. Tuttle's letter no. 18, to his wife;

(c) Mr. Carne's letters nos. 44, 46, 47, 48, 50, 51, 52, 55, 60 and 61, addressed respectively to a Mr. McAndrew (nos. 44 and 50), the National Council for Civil Liberties (nos. 46 and 55), the Howard League for Penal Reform (no. 47), a medical practitioner (no. 48), the Health Service Commissioner (no. 51), the Secretary of the National Association for Mental Health (no. 52) and journalists (nos. 60 and 61). Letters nos. 46, 55 and 47 all pre-dated Instruction 38/1977 (see paragraph 35 above).

10. Prohibition on allegations against prison officers (see paragraph 45 (a), item (x), above)

69. This prohibition was a subsidiary ground for stopping Mr. Silver's letter no. 6 (see paragraph 68 above).

11. Prohibition on attempts to stimulate public agitation or petition (see paragraph 45 (a), item (xi), above)

70. A subsidiary ground for stopping Mr. McMahon's letters nos. 32 and 34 (see paragraph 66 above) was that they attempted to stimulate public petition.

12. Miscellaneous

71. The posting of Mr. Noe's letter no. 12, addressed to the United States Consul and containing complaints about the control of correspondence, was delayed for three weeks as it was referred to the Home Office for instructions. The letter was written before the abolition of restrictions on the contents of letters to Consular officials (see paragraph 45 (c) above).

Mr. Cooper's letters nos. 19, 21 and 25, all addressed to relatives, were stopped on grounds of the general control of "objectionable" letters under Rule 33(3) but without an official explanation being given. The Commission observed that the authority for this action was not clear, beyond the general discretion under the said Rule.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

72. Mr. Silver, Mr. Noe, Mrs. Colne, Mr. Tuttle, Mr. Cooper, Mr. McMahon and Mr. Carne applied to the Commission on 20 November 1972, 1 February 1973, 2 June 1975, 20 March 1975, 28 October 1974, 8 July 1975 and 5 April 1975, respectively. They alleged that the control of their correspondence by the prison authorities had given rise to violations of Articles 8 and 10 (art. 8, art. 10) of the Convention. Mr. Silver also asserted that the refusal of two petitions to the Home Secretary seeking permission to obtain legal advice constituted a denial of his right of access to the courts, guaranteed by Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1).

On 5 March 1976, 19 December 1975 and 4 October 1977, respectively, the Commission declared inadmissible the applications of Mr. Silver, Mr. Noe and Mr. Cooper in so far as they contained certain additional complaints. On the last-mentioned date, it declared admissible the remainder of those applications and the whole of the other four; previously, on 11 March 1977, it had ordered the joinder of the seven applications in pursuance of Rule 29 of its Rules of Procedure. Subsequently, each applicant also contended that there had been breach of Article 13 (art. 13) on account of the absence of an effective remedy before a national authority in respect of the alleged violations of his or her Convention rights.

73. On 3 April 1979, Mr. Silver's legal representative notified the Commission of his client's death. In view of the wishes, expressed by Mr. Silver's next of kin, to continue the case and of the issues of general interest raised, the Commission decided on 8 May 1979 to retain the application.
Although the next of kin are today to be regarded as having the status of "applicants" (see the Deweer judgment of 27 February 1980, Series A no. 35, pp. 19-20, § 37), for the sake of convenience the present judgment will continue to refer to Mr. Silver as an "applicant".

74. In its report of 11 October 1980 (Article 31 of the Convention) (art. 31), the Commission expressed the opinion:

- by a series of votes (with one exception unanimous), that, save in respect of six letters (namely, Mr. Silver's letter no. 7, Mr. Cooper's letters nos. 28-31 and Mr. Noe's letter no. 12), the censorship of the applicants' mail by the prison authorities constituted a violation of their right to respect for correspondence, ensured by Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention;

- that it was not necessary to pursue a further examination of the matter in the light of Article 10 (art. 10);

- unanimously, that there had been a violation of Mr. Silver's right of access to the civil courts, ensured by Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1);

- by fourteen votes to one, that the absence of effective domestic remedies for the applicants' claims under Article 8 (art. 8) constituted a violation of Article 13 (art. 13).

FINAL SUBMISSIONS MADE TO THE COURT BY THE GOVERNMENT

75. At the hearings on 22 September 1982, the Government maintained in substance the submissions set out in their memorial of 2 October 1981, whereby they had requested the Court:

"(1) With regard to Article 8 (art. 8)

(i) in so far as the Commission concluded that the facts found disclosed no breach by the United Kingdom of its obligations under Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention, to confirm and uphold the Commission's conclusions;

(ii) in so far as the Commission's conclusions in respect of the issues under Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention are contested by the United Kingdom Government, to make findings in accordance with the submissions set out in the Government's memorial;

(iii) in so far as the Commission's findings of breaches of the Convention are not contested by the United Kingdom Government on the grounds of the changes made by the revised Standing Orders to the practice in the United Kingdom relating to prisoners' correspondence:

(a) to decide and declare that the facts found disclose no breaches otherwise than as set forth in the report of the Commission;

(b) to take express note in its judgment of the changes made by the revised Standing Orders as remedying the breaches so found by the Commission;

(2) With regard to Article 6 (art. 6)

(i) to take express note in its judgment of the changes made to the law and practice in the United Kingdom relating to the control of correspondence between prisoners and their legal advisers since the judgment of the Court in the Golder case;

(a) in light of such changes to decline to examine further the claims of breaches of Article 6 (art. 6) of the Convention;

alternatively

(b) to decide and declare that the facts found disclose no breaches by the United Kingdom of its obligations under Article 6 (art. 6) of the Convention otherwise than as set forth in the report of the Commission;

(3) With regard to Article 13 (art. 13)

to decide and declare that the facts found do not disclose a breach by the United Kingdom of its obligations under Article 13 (art. 13) of the Convention, alternatively that such facts would not disclose any such breach after the coming into effect of the revised Standing Orders relating to prisoners' correspondence."

AS TO THE LAW

I. THE SCOPE OF THE PRESENT CASE

76. The applicants complained principally of the stopping or delaying of particular letters, but they also alleged that in this area practices in breach of the Convention continued to exist.

77. The Court does not have to examine this additional allegation. This is because the Commission's decision declaring an application admissible determines the object of the case brought before the Court (see, inter alia, the Ireland v. the United Kingdom judgment of 18 January 1978, Series A no. 25, p. 63, § 157). And, in the present case, the Commission, in its decisions on the admissibility of the applications, stated that the questions which necessitated an examination on the merits were whether the interference constituted by the censorship of correspondence in a number of instances was justified under Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2) and whether it involved other issues under the Convention. The Commission's subsequent consideration of the case did not extend beyond those questions.

78. As is recorded in paragraphs 25-56 above, the practice in England and Wales on the control of prisoners' correspondence has undergone substantial modification since the date of the Commission's report. For this reason, the Government did not contest many of the Commission's findings; they emphasised that the revised Orders had now been published and that the majority of the letters involved in this case would not have been stopped under the new regime. These circumstances enabled the President to make his Order of 22 July 1982 limiting the scope of the hearings to the issues still in dispute (see paragraph 6 above).

The applicants criticised the new control system in various respects. The Government, for their part, asked the Court to take note of the changes effected in 1981 and also in 1975 (see paragraph 32 above); although their submissions suggested that the Court should at least take the new regime into account as remedying breaches of the Convention which had previously existed, they stated at the hearings that they were not seeking a ruling on its compatibility with the Convention.

79. In general, it is not the Court's task to rule on legislation in abstracto; indeed, at the time of the events giving rise to this case, the new regime was not yet in force. Its compatibility with the Convention therefore cannot be examined by the Court (see notably, mutatis mutandis, the National Union of Belgian Police judgment of 27 October 1975, Series A no. 19, p. 17, § 36, and the above-mentioned Ireland v. the United Kingdom judgment, Series A no. 25, p. 72, § 189). However, the Court notes with satisfaction that, following its Golder judgment of 21 February 1975 (Series A no. 18) on the one hand and as a result of the applications in which this case originated on the other, substantial changes have been made by the United Kingdom with a view to ensuring the observance of the engagements undertaken by it in the Convention.

II. THE ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 6 § 1 (art. 6-1)

80. Mr. Silver claimed that the refusal of his 1972 and 1973 petitions to the Home Secretary for permission to seek legal advice (see paragraph 12 above) constituted a denial of access to the courts, in violation of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention, as interpreted by the Court in its above-mentioned Golder judgment. The Article (art. 6-1), so far as is relevant, reads:

> "In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law."

The Court will confine itself to the 1972 petition: the Commission found it not to have been established that the 1973 petition had been refused and the point was not pursued before the Court.

81. The Government's principal plea was that the Court should decline to rule on the matter in light of the changes made to the law and practice since the Golder judgment (see, inter alia, paragraph 32 above).

The Court is unable to accept this plea. The changes in question were introduced, firstly, to give effect to the terms of that judgment and, secondly, as a result of the proceedings before the Commission in the present case. Nevertheless, dating as they do from 1975 and 1981, they clearly could not have restored the right claimed by Mr. Silver under Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1); it is therefore not possible to speak of a "solution", even partial, "of the matter" (see, mutatis mutandis, Rule 47 § 2 of the Rules of Court and the X v. the United Kingdom judgment of 5 November 1981, Series A no. 46, p. 27, § 64). In addition, the memorial of 22 September 1982 (see paragraph 8 above) contains a claim in the name of this applicant for just satisfaction under Article 50 (art. 50) and a determination by the Court of the Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) issue may be of relevance in this connection.

82. The Government, in the alternative, stated that in light of the Golder judgment they did not contest the Commission's finding that there had been a violation of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1). There being no material difference between the facts of Mr. Silver's case and those of Mr. Golder's, the Court confirms that finding.

III. THE ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 (art. 8)

83. In the applicants' submission, the stopping or delaying of the 64 letters in question constituted a violation of Article 8 (art. 8), which reads as follows:

> "1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

84. It is clear - and indeed this was not disputed - that there were "interferences by a public authority" with the exercise of the applicants' right to respect for their correspondence, which is guaranteed by paragraph 1 of Article 8 (art. 8-1). Such interferences entail a violation of that Article if they do not fall within one of the exceptions provided for in paragraph 2 (art. 8-2). The Court therefore has to examine in turn whether the interferences in the present case were "in accordance with the law", whether they had an aim or aims that is or are legitimate under Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2) and whether they were "necessary in a democratic society" for the aforesaid aim or aims (see notably, mutatis mutandis, the Sunday Times judgment of 26 April 1979, Series A no. 30, p. 29, § 45).

A. Were the interferences "in accordance with the law"?

1. General principles

85. In its Sunday Times judgment of 26 April 1979, the Court examined the meaning of the expression "prescribed by law", noting in this connection certain differences which exist between the French and English versions of Articles 8, 9, 10 and 11 (art. 8, art. 9, art. 10, art. 11) of the Convention, Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 (P1-1) and Article 2 of Protocol No. 4 (P4-2) (ibid., p. 30, § 48).

The Government accepted that the principles enounced in the said judgment concerning the expression "prescribed by law/prévues par la loi" in Article 10 (art. 10) were also applicable to the expression "in accordance with the law/ prévue par la loi" in Article 8 (art. 8). Indeed, this must be so, particularly because the two provisions overlap as regards freedom of expression through correspondence and not to give them an identical interpretation could lead to different conclusions in respect of the same interference.

86. A first principle that emerges from the Sunday Times judgment is that the interference in question must have some basis in domestic law (ibid., p. 30, § 47). In the present case, it was common ground between Government, Commission and applicants that a basis for the interferences was to be found in the Prison Act and the Rules, but not in the Orders and Instructions which lacked the force of law (see paragraph 26 above). There was also no dispute that the measures complained of were in conformity with English law.

87. A second principle is that "the law must be adequately accessible: the citizen must be able to have an indication that is adequate, in the circumstances, of the legal rules applicable to a given case" (ibid., p. 31, § 49). Clearly, the Prison Act and the Rules met this criterion, but the Orders and Instructions were not published.

88. A third principle is that "a norm cannot be regarded as a ‘law’ unless it is formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct: he must be able - if need be with appropriate advice - to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail" (ibid.).

A law which confers a discretion must indicate the scope of that discretion. However, the Court has already recognised the impossibility of attaining absolute certainty in the framing of laws and the risk that the search for certainty may entail excessive rigidity (ibid.). These observations are of particular weight in the "circumstances" of the present case, involving as it does, in the special context of imprisonment, the screening of approximately ten million items of correspondence in a year (see paragraph 57 above). It would scarcely be possible to formulate a law to cover every eventuality. Indeed, the applicants themselves did not deny that some discretion should be left to the authorities.

In view of these considerations, the Court points out once more that "many laws are inevitably couched in terms which, to a greater or lesser extent, are vague and whose interpretation and application are questions of practice" (ibid.). And in the present case the operation of the correspondence control system was not merely a question of practice that varied in each individual instance: the Orders and Instructions established a practice which had to be followed save in exceptional circumstances (see paragraphs 26 and 27 above). In these conditions, the Court considers that although those directives did not themselves have the force of law, they may - to the admittedly limited extent to which those concerned were made sufficiently aware of their contents - be taken into account in assessing whether the criterion of foreseeability was satisfied in the application of the Rules.

89. For this reason, the Court cannot accept the applicants' additional contention that the conditions and procedures governing interferences with correspondence - and in particular the directives set out in the Orders and Instructions - should be contained in the substantive law itself.

90. The applicants further contended that the law itself must provide safeguards against abuse.

The Government recognised that the correspondence control system must itself be subject to control and the Court finds it evident that some form of safeguards must exist. One of the principles underlying the Convention is the rule of law, which implies that an interference by the authorities with an individual's rights should be subject to effective control (see, inter alia, the Klass and others judgment of 6 September 1978, Series A no. 28, pp. 25-26, § 55). This is especially so where, as in the present case, the law bestows on the executive wide discretionary powers, the application whereof is a matter of practice which is susceptible to modification but not to any Parliamentary scrutiny (see paragraph 26 above).

However, the Court does not interpret the expression "in accordance with the law" as meaning that the safeguards must be enshrined in the very text which authorises the imposition of restrictions. In fact, the question of safeguards against abuse is closely linked with the question of effective remedies and the Court finds it preferable to take this issue into account in the wider context of Article 13 (art. 13) (see paragraphs 111-119 below).

2. Application in the present case of the above-mentioned principles

(a) Non-contested items

91. The Commission expressed the opinion that the stopping on the following principal or subsidiary grounds of the following letters was not foreseeable and, hence, was not "in accordance with the law":

(a) restriction on correspondence with legal adviser, on the ground that the applicant had already had sufficient facilities to seek legal advice (see paragraphs 32 and 60 above): Mr. Cooper's letter no. 27;

(b) prohibition on representations connected with the prisoner's trial, conviction or sentence (see paragraphs 43 and 61 above): Mr. Noe's letter no. 8 and Mr. McMahon's letters nos. 35 and 37;

(c) prohibition of grossly improper language (see paragraphs 45 (a), item (vi), and 65 above): Mr. Cooper's letters nos. 28-31;

(d) prohibition on material intended for publication (see paragraphs 45 (a), item (v), and 66 above): Mr. Silver's letter no. 5, Mr. McMahon's letters nos. 32, 34, 37 and 42 and Mr. Carne's letters nos. 60 and 61;

(e) prohibition on the inclusion in letters to legal advisers and Members of Parliament of unventilated complaints about prison treatment (see paragraphs 45 (a) and (b), 47 and 67 above): Mr. Noe's letters nos. 9 and 11, Mr. Cooper's letters nos. 20, 22, 23, 24 and 26 and his further letter of 3 April 1974, and Mr. Carne's letters nos. 43, 45, 53, 54 and 56 and his further letters of 27 December 1974 and 11 January 1975;

(f) prohibition on the inclusion in general correspondence of complaints about prison treatment (see paragraphs 45 (a), item (ix), and 68 above): Mr. Silver's letters nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 6, Mr. Tuttle's letter no. 18 and Mr. Carne's letters nos. 44, 46, 47, 48, 50, 51, 52, 55, 60 and 61;

(g) prohibition on allegations against prison officers (see paragraphs 45 (a), item (x), and 69 above): Mr. Silver's letter no. 6;

(h) the petition aspect of the prohibition on attempts to stimulate public agitation or petition (see paragraphs 45 (a), item (xi), and 70 above): Mr. McMahon's letters nos. 32 and 34;

(i) the general control of "objectionable" letters (no official explanation having been given - see paragraph 71 above): Mr. Cooper's letters nos. 19, 21 and 25.

As regards items (a) and (i), the Commission considered that the actual measure of interference complained of was not foreseeable; in the remaining cases, it considered that the rule under which the stopping was effected could not itself be foreseen.

The Government did not contest these findings on the part of the Commission, and the Court sees no reason to disagree. It therefore holds that the stopping of these letters on the grounds indicated above was not "in accordance with the law".

(b) Contested items

92. The Government or the applicants contested the Commission's findings on the "in accordance with the law" issue as regards three separate groups of letters. In accordance with the President's Order of 22 July 1982 (see paragraph 6 above), argument was presented to the Court at the hearings on these items, which will be considered in turn.

93. The first group comprises Mrs. Colne's letters nos. 13-15, Mr. McMahon's letters nos. 35-41 and a letter of 31 December 1975 to him from a journalist, all of which were stopped on the ground that they were not sent by or addressed to a relative or existing friend (see paragraphs 29-30 and 59 above). The Government contested the Commission's view that the relevant practice, by excluding correspondence with persons of good character, went further than could reasonably be deduced from Rule 34(8) in conjunction with Rule 33(1) and that the stopping of these letters was accordingly not "in accordance with the law".

In determining whether the foreseeability criterion was satisfied in this instance, account cannot be taken of the Orders which supplemented Rule 34(8): they were not available to prisoners nor do their contents appear to have been explained in cell cards (see paragraphs 26, 30 and 88 above). However, the wording of Rule 34(8) (see paragraph 29 above) is itself quite explicit: a reader would see not that correspondence with persons other than friends or relatives is allowed subject to certain exceptions but rather that it is prohibited save where the Secretary of State gives leave. Moreover, the Court considers that account should also be taken of Rule 33(2) - which contains a prohibition similar to that found in Rule 34(8) - and of Rule 34(2), from which it would be apparent that there were limits on the quantity of the correspondence of convicted prisoners (see paragraphs 29 and 38 above).

For these reasons, the Court concludes that the interferences in question were "in accordance with the law".

94. The second group comprises Mr. Carne’s letters nos. 58 and 59, dated 12 December 1975 and 2 January 1976 and addressed to a Member of Parliament, which were stopped on the ground that they contained complaints about prison treatment, in respect of which the "prior ventilation rule" had not been observed (see paragraphs 45 (b), 47 and 67 above). Whilst not contesting the Commission’s view that the stopping of certain other letters in the same category was not foreseeable since the "prior ventilation rule" was not contained in the Rules themselves, the Government submitted that the position was otherwise as regards these two items. They relied on the explanatory notice which was issued for the information of prisoners in November 1975, that is before the two letters were written (see paragraph 45 (b) above).

The Court considers that the terms of the notice in question were such as to make those concerned sufficiently aware of the practice in the matter (see paragraph 88 above). The stopping of these letters was therefore a foreseeable application of the Rules and, hence, "in accordance with the law".

95. The third group comprises the following letters which were stopped or delayed on the principal or subsidiary grounds indicated:

(a) restrictions on communications in connection with any legal or other business (see paragraphs 32, 35, 41, 46 and 60 above): Mr. Noe’s letter no. 10, and Mr. Carne’s letters nos. 49 and 57 and his letter of 15 September 1975 to the National Council for Civil Liberties;

(b) prohibition on letters evading or circumventing the regulations (see paragraphs 44 and 62 above): Mr. Silver’s letter no. 1 and Mr. Tuttle’s letter no. 18;

(c) prohibition on discussion of the offences of others (see paragraphs 45 (a), item (ii), and 63 above): Mr. Silver's letter no. 7;

(d) prohibition on complaints calculated to hold the authorities up to contempt (see paragraphs 45 (a), item (iii), and 64 above): Mr. Tuttle's letter no. 17;

(e) prohibition on threats of violence (see paragraphs 45 (a), item (iv), and 65 above): Mr. Cooper's letters nos. 28-31;

(f) Mr. Noe's letter no. 12, which was delayed pending receipt of instructions from the Home Office (see paragraph 71 above).

The Commission found that each of the above interferences was foreseeable from the text of the Rules and was therefore "in accordance with the law". The applicants disputed this on the ground that the two further requirements which, in their submission, flowed from that expression (see paragraphs 89 and 90 above) had not been satisfied.

In view of the position which the Court has taken in those paragraphs on the applicants' said submission, it concurs with the Commission's finding.

B. Did the interferences have aims that are legitimate under Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2)?

96. The applicants did not allege that the restrictions at issue in the present case were designed or applied for a purpose other than those listed in paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2). The Government pleaded before the Commission that the aim pursued was "the prevention of disorder", "the prevention of crime", "the protection of morals" and/or "the protection of the rights and freedoms of others", and the Commission considered whether each interference was "necessary" for one or more of those purposes.

This matter was not discussed or questioned before the Court. It sees no reason to doubt that each interference had an aim that was legitimate under Article 8 (art. 8).

C. Were the interferences "necessary in a democratic society"?

1. General principles

97. On a number of occasions, the Court has stated its understanding of the phrase "necessary in a democratic society", the nature of its functions in the examination of issues turning on that phrase and the manner in which it will perform those functions. It suffices here to summarise certain principles:

(a) the adjective "necessary" is not synonymous with "indispensable", neither has it the flexibility of such expressions as "admissible", "ordinary",

"useful", "reasonable" or "desirable" (see the Handyside judgment of 7 December 1976, Series A no. 24, p. 22, § 48);

(b) the Contracting States enjoy a certain but not unlimited margin of appreciation in the matter of the imposition of restrictions, but it is for the Court to give the final ruling on whether they are compatible with the Convention (ibid., p. 23, § 49);

(c) the phrase "necessary in a democratic society" means that, to be compatible with the Convention, the interference must, inter alia, correspond to a "pressing social need" and be "proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued" (ibid., pp. 22-23, §§ 48-49);

(d) those paragraphs of Articles of the Convention which provide for an exception to a right guaranteed are to be narrowly interpreted (see the above-mentioned Klass and others judgment, Series A no. 28, p. 21, § 42).

98. The Court has also held that, in assessing whether an interference with the exercise of the right of a convicted prisoner to respect for his correspondence was "necessary" for one of the aims set out in Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2), regard has to be paid to the ordinary and reasonable requirements of imprisonment (see the above-mentioned Golder judgment, Series A no. 18, p. 21, § 45). Indeed, the Court recognises that some measure of control over prisoners' correspondence is called for and is not of itself incompatible with the Convention.

2. Application in the present case of the above-mentioned principles

(a) Non-contested items

99. The Commission expressed the opinion that the stopping on the following principal or subsidiary grounds of the following letters was not "necessary in a democratic society":

(a) restriction on correspondence other than with a relative or friend (see paragraphs 29-30 and 59 above): Mrs. Colne's letters nos. 13-15, Mr. McMahon's letters nos. 35-41 and a letter of 31 December 1975 to him from a journalist, Mr. Silver's letter no. 4 and Mr. Carne's letter no. 48;

(b) restriction on communications in connection with any legal or other business (see paragraphs 32, 35, 41, 46 and 6O above): Mr. Cooper's letter no. 27, and Mr. Carne's letters nos. 49 and 57 and his letter of 15 September 1975 to the National Council for Civil Liberties;

(c) prohibition on complaints calculated to hold the authorities up to contempt (see paragraphs 45 (a), item (iii), and 64 above): Mr. Tuttle's letter no. 17 and Mr. Carne's letter no. 51;

(d) prohibition on the inclusion in letters to legal advisers and Members of Parliament of unventilated complaints about prison treatment (see paragraphs 45 (a) and (b), 47 and 67 above): Mr. Noe's letters nos. 9 and ll, Mr. Cooper's letters nos. 20, 22, 23, 24 and 26 and his further letter of 3

April 1974, and Mr. Carne's letters nos. 43, 45, 53, 54, 56, 58 and 59 and his further letters of 27 December 1974 and 11 January 1975;

(e) the petition aspect of the prohibition on attempts to stimulate public agitation or petition (see paragraphs 45 (a), item (xi), and 70 above): Mr. McMahon's letters nos. 32 and 34;

(f) prohibition on letters evading or circumventing the regulations (see paragraphs 44 and 62 above): Mr. Silver's letter no. 1 and Mr. Tuttle's letter no. 18.

As regards item (f), the Commission considered that the measure, although taken on an intrinsically legitimate ground, was excessive. In the remaining cases, on the other hand, it was the ground itself as well as the measure which did not correspond to a necessity, within the meaning of Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2); the Commission expressed the same opinion as regards the stopping, on the principal or subsidiary grounds indicated in sub-paragraphs (b), (c), (d), (f) and (g) of paragraph 91 above, of the letters listed in those sub-paragraphs. Finally, the Commission considered that the stopping of Mr. Cooper's letters nos. 19, 21 and 25 (see paragraph 71 above) was not "necessary".

The Government did not contest these findings on the part of the Commission, and the Court sees no reason to disagree. It therefore holds that the stopping of the letters in question was not "necessary in a democratic society".

(b) Contested items

100. As regards certain letters, the Government or the applicants contested the Commission's findings on the "necessity" issue. In accordance with the President's Order of 22 July 1982 (see paragraph 6 above), argument was presented to the Court at the hearings on these items, which will be considered in turn.

101. Mr. Noe's letter no. 10 to a solicitor was stopped as it contained a reference to a business transaction (see paragraphs 41, 46 and 60 above). The Commission found it not to be established that the interference was "necessary in a democratic society", notably because there was no supporting evidence to that effect. The Government contested this conclusion.

The Court notes that this letter - written by a prisoner convicted of fraud (see paragraph 13 above) - did not simply concern legal problems but interpretations (see paragraph 60 above). Without expressing any opinion on the restrictions in force at the relevant time on the conduct by prisoners of business activities in general, the Court considers, making due allowance for the United Kingdom's margin of appreciation, that the authorities were entitled to think that the stopping of this particular letter was necessary "for the prevention of disorder or crime", within the meaning of Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2) of the Convention.

102. Mr. Silver’s letter no.7 was stopped because it alluded to the presence in his prison of certain other criminals (see paragraphs 45 (a), item (ii), and 63 above). The Commission considered that the interference could be regarded as "necessary", notably since Mr. Silver could have rewritten the letter without the offending passage. His counsel claimed that the Government had not established that the opportunity to rewrite had been provided and that their statement that the letter would not be stopped under the regime in force since December 1981 demonstrated that the measure taken in 1973 was not "necessary".

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the Court must assume that Mr. Silver was given the aforesaid opportunity, in accordance with the usual procedure (see paragraph 50 above). Bearing in mind that the other criminals referred to were "category A" prisoners (see paragraph 16 above), the Court finds that the authorities were entitled to think that the stopping of this particular letter was necessary "in the interests of public safety" and "for the prevention of disorder or crime", within the meaning of Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-)2).

103. Mr. Cooper’s letters nos. 28-31 were stopped not only for employing grossly improper language but also for containing threats of violence (see paragraphs 45 (a),item (iv), and 65 above). His counsel contested the Commission’s view that the interference was "necessary" on the second ground.

The Court agrees with the Commission. Letters nos. 28-30 contained clear threats and letter no. 31 can be regarded as a continuation thereof. In the Court’s judgment, the authorities had sufficient reason for concluding that the stopping of these letters was necessary "for the prevention of disorder or crime", within the meaning of Article 8 § 2 (art. 8-2).

104. Finally, Mr. Noe’s letter no. 12, to the United States Consul, was delayed for three weeks before being posted (see paragraph 71 above). His counsel questioned the necessity for this interference, whereas the Commission, in arriving at its conclusion that there had here been no violation of Article 8 (art. 8), found that there was no evidence that the interference was not justified as being "necessary" for one or more of the aims set out in paragraph 2 (art. 8-2) thereof.

The Court is of the view that when in any particular instance subordinate prison authorities are in doubt as to how they should exercise their supervisory functions regarding prisoners’ correspondence, they must be able to seek instructions from higher authority. In the case of Mr. Noe’s letter no. 12, the prison authorities found it necessary in the light of the law and practice applicable at the time to refer the letter to the Home Secretary for instructions; he decided that it should not be stopped. In these circumstances and bearing in mind that the subject-matter of the letter was not really urgent, the Court does not consider that the resultant delay of three weeks in despatching the letter was so serious as to constitute a violation of Article 8 (art. 8).

D. Conclusions on Article 8 (art. 8)

105. To sum up, the stopping of Mr. Silver's letter no. 7, Mr. Noe's letter no. 10 and Mr. Cooper's letters nos. 28-31 was both "in accordance with the law" and justifiable as "necessary in a democratic society" (see paragraphs 95, 102, 101 and 103 above). These interferences therefore did not constitute a violation of Article 8 (art. 8). The same conclusion applies as regards the delaying of Mr. Noe's letter no. 12 (see paragraphs 95 and 104 above).

On the other hand, the stopping of the 57 remaining letters was not "necessary in a democratic society" (see paragraph 99 above); there has therefore been a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) in each case.

IV. THE ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 10 (art. 10)

106. The applicants also submitted that the control of their mail by the prison authorities constituted a breach of their right to freedom of expression, guaranteed by Article 10 (art. 10) of the Convention.

107. The Commission concluded that since, in the context of correspondence, the right to free expression was guaranteed by Article 8 (art. 8), it was not necessary to pursue a further examination of the matter in the light of Article 10 (art. 10).

Neither Government nor applicants dissented from this opinion, with which the Court concurs.

V. THE ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 13 (art. 13)

108. The applicants alleged that there existed in the United Kingdom no effective remedy in respect of their claims under Articles 6 § 1, 8 and 10 (art. 6-1, art. 8, art. 10) and that they were therefore victims of a violation of Article 13 (art. 13), which provides as follows:

> "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

A. Article 13 taken in conjunction with Article 6 § 1 and Article 10 (art. 13+6-1, art. 13+10)

109. The Commission expressed the opinion, which was not contested by the applicants before the Court, that:

- as regards Mr. Silver's complaint under Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) concerning the refusal of his 1972 petition (see paragraph 12 above), no separate issue arose under Article 13 (art. 13);

- its opinion concerning Article 10 (art. 10) (see paragraph 107 above) rendered it unnecessary to examine under Article 13 (art. 13) the Article 10 (art. 10) aspects of the applicants' complaints.

110. The Court shares the Commission's opinion. Having regard to its decision on Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) (see paragraphs 8O-82 above), there is no need to examine Mr. Silver's complaint under Article 13 (art. 13); this is because the requirements of the latter Article (art. 13) are less strict than, and are here absorbed by, those of the former (see, inter alia, the Sporrong and Lönnroth judgment of 23 September 1982, Series A no. 52, p.32, § 88). Again, there is no call to examine under Article 13 (art. 13) the Article 10 (art. 10) aspects of the complaints, since Articles 8 and 10 (art. 8, art. 10) overlap in this case (see paragraph 107 above).

B. Article 13 taken in conjunction with Article 8 (art. 13+8)

111. The same does not apply to the Article 8 (art. 8) aspects of the applicants' complaints, especially as the Court has decided to consider in the context of Article 13 (art. 13) the question of safeguards against abuse of the powers to control prisoners' correspondence (see paragraph 90 above).

The Commission, having examined various possible channels of complaint, came to the conclusion that there was no effective domestic remedy and, hence, a violation of Article 13 (art. 13). The Government requested the Court to hold that the facts of the case disclosed no breach of that provision or, alternatively, that they would disclose no such breach after the coming into effect of the revised Orders.

l12. Having held that the scope of the present case does not extend to the correspondence control system in force since December 1981 (see paragraph 79 above), the Court is unable to examine the Government's alternative plea.

113. The principles that emerge from the Court's jurisprudence on the interpretation of Article 13 (art. 13) include the following:

(a) where an individual has an arguable claim to be the victim of a violation of the rights set forth in the Convention, he should have a remedy before a national authority in order both to have his claim decided and, if appropriate, to obtain redress (see the above-mentioned Klass and others judgment, Series A no. 28, p. 29, § 64);

(b) the authority referred to in Article 13 (art. 13) may not necessarily be a judicial authority but, if it is not, its powers and the guarantees which it affords are relevant in determining whether the remedy before it is effective (ibid., p. 30, § 67);

(c) although no single remedy may itself entirely satisfy the requirements of Article 13 (art. 13), the aggregate of remedies provided for under domestic law may do so (see, mutatis mutandis, the above-mentioned X v. the United Kingdom judgment, Series A no. 46, p. 26, § 60, and the Van Droogenbroeck judgment of 24 June 1982, Series A no. 50, p. 32, § 56);

(d) neither Article 13 (art. 13) nor the Convention in general lays down for the Contracting States any given manner for ensuring within their internal law the effective implementation of any of the provisions of the Convention - for example, by incorporating the Convention into domestic law (see the Swedish Engine Drivers' Union judgment of 6 February 1976, Series A no. 2O, p. 18, § 50).

It follows from the last-mentioned principle that the application of Article 13 (art. 13) in a given case will depend upon the manner in which the Contracting State concerned has chosen to discharge its obligation under Article 1 (art. 1) directly to secure to anyone within its jurisdiction the rights and freedoms set out in section I (see the above-mentioned Ireland v. the United Kingdom judgment, Series A no. 25, p. 91, § 239).

114. In the present case, it was not suggested that any remedies were available to the applicants other than the four channels of complaint examined by the Commission, namely an application to the Board of Visitors, an application to the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, a petition to the Home Secretary and the institution of proceedings before the English courts.

115. As regards the first two channels, the Court, like the Commission, considers that they do not constitute an "effective remedy" for the present purposes.

The Board of Visitors cannot enforce its conclusions (see paragraph 52 above) nor can it entertain applications from individuals like Mrs. Colne who are not in prison.

As regards the Parliamentary Commissioner, it suffices to note that he has himself no power to render a binding decision granting redress (see paragraph 54 above).

116. As for the Home Secretary, if there were a complaint to him as to the validity of an Order or Instruction under which a measure of control over correspondence had been carried out, he could not be considered to have a sufficiently independent standpoint to satisfy the requirements of Article 13 (art. 13) (see, mutatis mutandis, the above-mentioned Klass and others judgment, Series A no. 28, p. 26, § 56): as the author of the directives in question, he would in reality be judge in his own cause. The position, however, would be otherwise if the complainant alleged that a measure of control resulted from a misapplication of one of those directives. The Court is satisfied that in such cases a petition to the Home Secretary would in general be effective to secure compliance with the directive, if the complaint was well-founded. The Court notes, however, that even in these cases, at least prior to 1 December 1981, the conditions for the submission of such petitions imposed limitations on the availability of this remedy in some circumstances (see paragraph 53 above).

117. The English courts, for their part, are endowed with a certain supervisory jurisdiction over the exercise of the powers conferred on the Home Secretary and the prison authorities by the Prison Act and the Rules (see paragraph 55 above). However, their jurisdiction is limited to determining whether or not those powers have been exercised arbitrarily, in bad faith, for an improper motive or in an ultra vires manner.

In this connection, the applicants stressed that the Convention, not being incorporated into domestic law, could not be directly invoked before the English courts; however, they acknowledged that it was relevant for the interpretation of ambiguous legislation, according to the presumption of the latter's conformity with the treaty obligations of the United Kingdom.

118. The applicants made no allegation that the interferences with their correspondence were contrary to English law (see paragraph 86 above). Like the Commission, the Court has found that the majority of the measures complained of in the present proceedings were incompatible with the Convention (see paragraph 105 above). In most of the cases, the Government did not contest the Commission's findings. Neither did they maintain that the English courts could have found the measures to have been taken arbitrarily, in bad faith, for an improper motive or in an ultra vires manner.

In the Court's view, to the extent that the applicable norms, whether contained in the Rules or in the relevant Orders or Instructions, were incompatible with the Convention there could be no effective remedy as required by Article 13 (art. 13) and consequently there has been a violation of that Article (art. 13).

To the extent, however, that the said norms were compatible with Article 8 (art. 8), the aggregate of the remedies available satisfied the requirements of Article 13 (art. 13), at least in those cases in which it was possible for a petition to be submitted to the Home Secretary (see paragraph 116 above): a petition to the Home Secretary was available to secure compliance with the directives issued by him and, as regards compliance with the Rules, the English courts had the supervisory jurisdiction described in paragraph 117 above.

119. To sum up, in those instances where the norms in question were incompatible with the Convention and where the Court has found a violation of Article 8 (art. 8) to have occurred there was no effective remedy and Article 13 (art. 13) has therefore also been violated. In the remaining cases, there is no reason to assume that the applicants' complaints could not have been duly examined by the Home Secretary and/or the English courts and Article 13 (art. 13) has therefore not been violated; this, however, is subject to the exception of Mr. Silver's letter no. 7, in respect of which the remedy of petition to the Home Secretary was not available (see paragraphs 11 and 53 above).

VI. THE APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 50 (art. 50)

120. Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention reads as follows:

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the present Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

121. In the memorial filed on 22 September 1982 (see paragraph 8 above), the applicants claimed "general" damages for violation of their rights and reimbursement of specified legal costs and expenses; a claim for "special" damages was also put forward in the name of Mr. Silver, Mr. McMahon and Mr. Carne.

122. The written procedure on this issue has not yet been concluded (see paragraph 8 above). In these circumstances, the question of the application of Article 50 (art. 50) is not ready for decision and must therefore be reserved. The Court delegates to the President power to fix the further procedure in this respect.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY

1. Holds that the refusal of Mr. Silver's petition of 20 November 1972 to the Home Secretary gave rise to a violation of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention;

2. Holds that, with the exception of Mr. Silver's letter no. 7, Mr. Noe's letters nos. 10 and 12 and Mr. Cooper's letters nos. 28 to 31, the stopping or delaying of all the letters written by or addressed to each applicant which are at issue in the present case constituted a violation of Article 8 (art. 8);

3. Holds that it is not necessary also to examine the case under Article 10 (art. 10);

4. Holds that it is also not necessary to examine under Article 13 (art. 13) the article 6 § 1 and Article 10 (art. 6-1, art. 10) aspects of the applicants' complaints;

5. Holds that there has been a violation of Article 13 (art. 13) to the extent specified in paragraph 119 of the judgment;

6. Holds that the question of the application of Article 50 (art. 50) is not ready for decision;

accordingly,

(a) reserves the whole of the said question;

(b) delegates to the President of the Chamber power to fix the further procedure.

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

24 October 1983

In the case of Silver and others,

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Court*, as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr. G. WIARDA, President,
Mr. Thór VILHJÁLMSSON,
Mr. F. GÖLCÜKLÜ,
Mr. F. MATSCHER,
Mr. L.-E. PETTITI,
Sir Vincent EVANS,
Mr. C. RUSSO,

and also Mr. M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr. H. PETZOLD, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 23 September 1983,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on that date, on the application in the present case of Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention:

PROCEDURE AND FACTS

1. The present case was referred to the Court in March 1981 by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission"). The case originated in seven applications (nos. 5947/72, 6205/73, 7052/75, 7061/75, 7107/75, 7113/75 and 7136/75) against the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland lodged with the Commission on various dates between 1972 and 1975 by Mr. Reuben Silver, Mr. Clifford Dixon Noe, Mrs. Judith Colne, Mr. James Henry Tuttle, Mr. Gary Cooper, Mr. Michael McMahon and Mr. Desmond Roy Carne.

2. By judgment of 25 March 1983, the Court held that the stopping by the prison authorities of a number of letters written by or addressed to the applicants had given rise to violations of Articles 8 and 13 (art. 8, art. 13) of the Convention. It also held that the refusal of a petition by Mr. Silver for permission to seek legal advice had constituted a breach of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) (Series A no. 61, paragraphs 80-105 and 111-119 of the reasons and points 1, 2 and 5 of the operative provisions, pp. 31-45).

The only outstanding matter to be settled is the question of the application of Article 50 (art. 50) in the present case. Accordingly, as regards the facts, the Court will confine itself here to giving the pertinent details; for further particulars, reference should be made to paragraphs 9-71 of the above-mentioned judgment (ibid., pp. 9-28).

3. In a memorial filed on 22 September 1982, the applicants had claimed, as just satisfaction under Article 50 (art. 50), "general" damages for violation of their rights and reimbursement of specified costs and expenses; a claim for "special" damages had also been put forward in the names of Mr. Silver, Mr. McMahon and Mr. Carne.

The Government of the United Kingdom ("the Government") had replied in writing to the said memorial on 14 January 1983.

In its judgment of 25 March 1983, the Court reserved the question of the application of Article 50 (art. 50), the written procedure on that issue not then having been concluded (paragraphs 120-122 of the reasons and point 6 of the operative provisions, pp. 44-45).

4. In accordance with the Orders and directions of the President of the Chamber, the registry subsequently received the following documents:

(a) on 9 March 1983, letter of 8 March from the Secretary to the Commission, with which was enclosed a further memorial of the applicants;

(b) on 10 May 1983, comments of the Government on the last-mentioned memorial;

(c) on 17 May and 1 June 1983, from the Secretary to the Commission, copies of letters of 18 April and 25 May which he had received from the applicants' lawyers.

In his letter of 8 March, the Secretary to the Commission indicated that its Delegates had no observations on the issues arising under Article 50 (art. 50), considering them to be matters to be left to the Court's judgment. Further particulars of the applicants' claims and of the Government's position relative thereto are set out below in the section "As to the law".

5. Having consulted, through the Registrar, the Agent of the Government and the Delegates of the Commission, the Court decided on 23 September 1983 that there was no call to hold hearings.

AS TO THE LAW

I. INTRODUCTION

6. Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention, the applicability of which was not contested in the present case, reads as follows:

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the present Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

7. The applicants sought just satisfaction under a number of different heads. Their various claims will be considered in turn.

II. "GENERAL" DAMAGES

8. The applicants claimed in the first place "general" damages for the violation of their Convention rights, alleging that they had been caused very great distress. They emphasised such factors as the scale of the breaches that had occurred - amounting in their view to a practice in breach of the Convention - and the absence of any domestic remedy, their complaints about censorship having themselves been censored. They submitted that in general a finding of violation contained in a judgment of the Court could not, of itself, be considered to amount to just satisfaction, and did not do so in the present case.

The Government's principal plea was that here an award of "general" damages was neither necessary nor appropriate, the Court's judgment of 25 March 1983 itself constituting just satisfaction. They pointed out that only a small proportion of the applicants' mail had been stopped and stressed the significant changes that had been made, in the light of the Commission's report in this case, to the practice in England and Wales on the control of prisoners' correspondence.

9. The Court would recall that under Article 50 (art. 50) just satisfaction will be afforded only "if necessary" (see, inter alia, the Dudgeon judgment of 24 February 1983, Series A no. 59, p. 7, § 11). In exercising the discretion thus conferred on it, the Court will have regard to what is equitable in all the circumstances of the case.

10. It is true that those applicants who were in custody may have experienced some annoyance and sense of frustration as a result of the restrictions that were imposed on particular letters. It does not appear, however, that this was of such intensity that it would in itself justify an award of compensation for non-pecuniary damage. As the figures supplied by the Government reveal (see the above-mentioned judgment of 25 March 1983, p. 24, § 57), the number of letters in respect of which the Court found a violation as regards each of the applicants was very small compared with the number of letters which they were allowed to send. Furthermore, although the Court held that it could not examine the compatibility with the Convention of the correspondence control regime in force since 1981 (ibid., p. 31, § 9), substantial changes were introduced as a result of the applications in which this case originated and do appear in principle to have led to a significant improvement.

In these circumstances, the Court considers that in relation to this head of claim the judgment of 25 March 1983 constitutes in itself adequate just satisfaction for the applicants concerned, without it being necessary to afford financial compensation (see, as the most recent authority, the Zimmermann and Steiner judgment of 13 July 1983, Series A no. 66, p. 14, § 35). The same applies a fortiori to Mrs. Colne, who was not in custody and was thus not subject to the constraints of prison life.

III. "SPECIAL" DAMAGES

A. Mr. Silver

11. An unquantified claim for "special" damages was put forward in the name of Mr. Silver. It was maintained that the stopping of his letters, which dealt with matters of intimate concern such as medical treatment and diet, had caused him great distress and adversely affected his health.

The Government contended on various grounds that there was no basis for this claim and that, in any event, the absence of evidence of material loss rendered an award inappropriate.

12. Mr. Silver died in March 1979, while his case was pending before the Commission. The injury alleged under this head was of a purely personal nature, involved no element of material damage and did not affect his estate. His next of kin are not seeking compensation, as "injured parties" in their own right, for any mental suffering caused to them. In the particular circumstances, the Court considers that the cause of justice does not require an award of a sum of money to be received by them in compensation for any mental distress that Mr. Silver might have suffered by reason of the breaches of Articles 6 § 1, 8 and 13 (art. 6-1, art. 8, art. 13) (see, mutatis mutandis, the X v. the United Kingdom judgment of 18 October 1982, Series A no. 55, p. 16, § 19).

B. Mr. McMahon

13. Throughout his detention Mr. McMahon protested that he was innocent of the crime for which he had been imprisoned, and a campaign was mounted on his behalf. The remainder of his sentence was remitted and he was released in 1980 after the publication in that year of a book concerning his case.

According to the applicant, the book contained material written by him and smuggled out of his prison in 1977. It was alleged that his eleven letters which had been stopped (see the above-mentioned judgment of 25 March 1983, p. 12, § 22) were all directed to enlisting support or obtaining fresh evidence for his campaign and that, had he been able to correspond freely, he might have secured earlier reconsideration of his case and earlier release; he claimed "special" damages of £4,500 for wrongful imprisonment for a period estimated at one year.

The Government contended that there was no basis for the claim. They did not accept that the outcome of the proceedings to obtain Mr. McMahon's release would have been any different had the letters been allowed to be sent.

14. The Court notes that the applicant himself did not attribute his release solely to the appearance of the book but rather to a combination of its publication and of outside pressures. Furthermore, perusal of those of the eleven letters whose text is available reveals that they did not contain new material but were in the main designed to seek further support for an already existing campaign.

In these circumstances, the Court is not persuaded that the stopping of the letters in question did in fact delay Mr. McMahon's release. It therefore rejects this claim.

C. Mr. Carne

15. In 1976, Mr. Carne had been subjected to prison disciplinary penalties in respect of two clandestine letters, addressed respectively to Dr. Owen and the National Council for Civil Liberties, purporting to come from other persons but in fact written by him. He alleged that had his letters nos. 54 and 55, to the same respective addressees, not been stopped by the prison authorities (see the above-mentioned judgment of 25 March 1983, pp. 27-28, §§ 67 and 68), the clandestine communications - which concerned the same subjects as the stopped letters - would not have been written, in which event he would not have incurred the penalties. He claimed £750 in respect of the "special" damages thereby occasioned.

The Government denied that the various letters dealt with the same matters and contended that there was no basis for this claim; in any event, an award would not be appropriate as no material loss had been shown.

16. The Court observes that whilst the subject-matter of the letters in question was not identical, there were certain common features: censorship of correspondence and medical treatment were mentioned in both letters addressed to Dr. Owen and the former matter was referred to in both communications to the National Council for Civil Liberties. The fact that Mr. Carne was unable to write without restriction on these subjects may have been one reason for the fabrication of the clandestine letters. However, whatever Mr. Carne's motives may have been, the subterfuge to which he resorted nevertheless constituted a transgression of the prison regulations which, in this respect, have not been found by the Court to be incompatible with the Convention.

Having regard to all the circumstances, the Court considers that it is not necessary to make an award in respect of this claim.

IV. COSTS AND EXPENSES

17. The applicants claimed in respect of costs and expenses which they were liable to pay in connection with the proceedings before the Convention institutions the following sums (in each case exclusive of value added tax):

(a) £17,093.63 - including £750 for services rendered in connection with the Article 50 (art. 50) claim - for the fees and disbursements of Messrs. Bindman & Partners, solicitors, who initially acted for Mrs. Colne, Mr. McMahon and Mr. Carne before the Commission and subsequently had primary responsibility for the conduct of the seven joined applications before the Commission and the Court;

(b) £16,250 for the fees of Mr. Anthony Lester, Q.C., and Mr. Michael Beloff, Q.C., who also represented the applicants before the Commission and the Court;

(c) £780 for the fees and disbursements of Messrs. Friedman, Fredman & Co., solicitors, who represented Mr. Tuttle before the Commission and the Court;

(d) £1,540 for the fees and disbursements of Messrs. Hughmans, solicitors, who represented Mr. Silver (or his next of kin), Mr. Noe and Mr. Cooper before the Commission and the Court.

Items (a) and (b) were subject to deduction of the amounts which the applicants had received by way of free legal aid before the Commission and, after reference of the case to the Court, in their relations with the Commission's Delegates; items (c) and (d), on the other hand, represented costs and expenses that were not covered by that legal aid.

18. The Court will apply the various criteria which emerge from its case-law on the subject, as regards the purpose for which the costs in question were incurred and the requirements that they be actually incurred, necessarily incurred and reasonable as to quantum (see, as the most recent authority, the above-mentioned Zimmermann and Steiner judgment, Series A no. 66, p. 14, § 36). In this connection the Court wishes to reiterate the comments made in its Young, James and Webster judgment of 18 October 1982 (Series A no. 55, p. 8, § 15), where it observed:

> "... high costs of litigation may themselves constitute a serious impediment to the effective protection of human rights. It would be wrong for the Court to give encouragement to such a situation in its decisions awarding costs under Article 50 (art. 50). It is important that applicants should not encounter undue financial difficulties in bringing complaints under the Convention and the Court considers that it may expect that lawyers in Contracting States will co-operate to this end in the fixing of their fees."

19. The Government indicated that they were prepared to pay the reasonable and necessary costs actually incurred by the applicants which were not covered by the Commission's legal aid. With the exception of the points mentioned in paragraph 20 below, the Government did not contest that the applicants had incurred liability for costs additional to those covered by their legal aid (cf., inter alia, the Airey judgment of 6 February 1981, Series A no. 41, p. 9, § 13) and that their claim satisfied the criteria referred to in paragraph 18 above. Subject to an examination of those points, the Court therefore retains the whole of the claim.

20. (a) The Government drew attention to an error in the calculation of the fees of Messrs. Bindman & Partners in respect of certain letters. That firm having admitted the error, the fees in question are to be reduced by £40.

(b) The Government claimed that Messrs. Bindman & Partners had charged fees for an excessive number of hours of work.

These solicitors have charged for a total of 294 hours of work, up to 1982. Bearing in mind that they had the primary responsibility for the conduct of a complex case which involved seven joined applications and by 1982 had lasted, as far as they were concerned, for some seven years, the Court does not consider this figure excessive.

(c) The Government contended that the same firm had charged at an excessive hourly rate (£40) and that a figure of £35 would be more appropriate. They referred in particular to the heavy reliance that had been placed on counsel and the fact that, in the early stages, the case had been handled by persons who were not partners in the firm. The applicants cited in support of their claim advice which they had received from professional law costs draftsmen.

The Court sees no reason to conclude that on this occasion greater reliance was placed on counsel than is customarily done when solicitors and barristers are instructed in contentious business. With regard to the hourly rate charged, the Court considers that £35 is the maximum which it should allow.

(d) The Government maintained that the sum of £62.06, for certain travel expenses in London, should be deducted from the amount claimed in respect of the disbursements of Messrs. Bindman & Partners, since in England such items would not be allowed under the relevant Supreme Court Taxing Office Practice Direction.

Although the Court is not bound by this Direction (see, mutatis mutandis, the Eckle judgment of 21 June 1983, Series A no. 65, p. 15, § 35), it agrees that these local travel expenses should not be allowed.

(e) The Government submitted that the fees charged by counsel were excessive and should be reduced by a total of £5,100. Domestic practice was referred to by the Government to support, and by the applicants to contest, this submission. The applicants also cited the award of £10,000 in respect of counsel's fees contained in the Court's Sunday Times judgment of 6 November 1980 (Series A no. 38, p. 15, § 30).

Here again, parallels drawn with domestic practice do not bind the Court, although they may assist it. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case - which, as the applicants rightly pointed out, was a test case raising issues of major importance for all prisoners and generating substantial documentation -, the fees in question, with the exception of the brief fees for appearance before the Court, cannot be regarded as out of proportion or excessive for the work involved. As regards the brief fees, the Court considers that £2,000 for Mr. Lester and £1,000 for Mr. Beloff would be reasonable.

(f) The Government contended that in any event there should be excluded Mr. Lester's fees referable to the friendly settlement negotiations, on the ground that this work could have been done by the solicitors alone. The applicants stressed that the negotiations, at which the Government were very fully represented, covered consideration of far-reaching modifications to the system of control of prisoners' correspondence.

During the proceedings before the Court, the Government themselves emphasised the significance of the changes made as a result of the applications in which the present case originated. The scale of those changes can be gauged from paragraphs 25 to 56 of the Court's above-mentioned judgment of 25 March 1983 (pages 12-23). The Court entertains no doubt that in the circumstances the participation of counsel with experience in the matter was of great importance. It therefore rejects the Government's plea.

(g) Finally, the Government maintained that the sum of £180 claimed in respect of the disbursements of Messrs. Friedman, Fredman & Co. should be disallowed as it had not been particularised. The applicants stated that this sum related to travel and accommodation expenses in connection with the hearing before the Commission in 1978, the exact breakdown of which was no longer available.

In the absence of further particulars, the Court disallows this item.

21. The costs and expenses accepted by the Court total £31,661.57, from which has to be deducted the sum of 34,692.64 FF (to be converted into pounds sterling at the rate applicable on the date of delivery of the present judgment) which the applicants have received from the Commission by way of legal aid in respect of the fees and disbursements of Messrs. Bindman & Partners and the fees of Mr. Lester and Mr. Beloff. The resulting figure is to be increased by any value added tax that may be due.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY

1. Holds that the United Kingdom is to pay, in respect of the applicants' costs and expenses referable to the proceedings before the Commission and the Court, the sum resulting from the calculations to be made in accordance with paragraph 21 of the judgment;

2. Rejects the remainder of the applicants' claims.

DECLARATION OF JUDGE THÓR VILHJÁLMSSON

In a judgment delivered on 18 October 1982 in the case of X v. the United Kingdom (Article 50) (art. 50), the majority of the Court rejected a claim put forward on behalf of the estate of the deceased applicant. I was then in a minority of one. In my opinion the estate was, in the circumstances of that particular case, entitled to compensation.

One of the points decided in the present case concerns a claim made on behalf of the next of kin of Mr. Silver, who died in 1979, for "special" damages (see paragraphs 11-12 of the judgment). My vote on this particular point reflects a change from my vote in the case of X v. the United Kingdom (Article 50) (art. 50). This change is prompted by the majority vote in that case.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

CASE OF SLIVENKO v. LATVIA

(Application no. 48321/99)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

9 October 2003

In the case of Slivenko v. Latvia,

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting as a Grand Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr L. WILDHABER, President,
Mr C.L. ROZAKIS,
Mr J.-P. COSTA,
Mr G. RESS,
Sir Nicolas BRATZA,
Mr J. MAKARCZYK,
Mr I. CABRAL BARRETO,
Mrs F. TULKENS,
Mrs V. STRÁŽNICKÁ,
Mr P. LORENZEN,
Mrs M. TSATSA-NIKOLOVSKA,
Mrs H.S. GREVE,
Mr A.B. BAKA,
Mr R. MARUSTE,
Mr K. TRAJA,
Mrs S. BOTOUCHAROVA,
Mr A. KOVLER,

and also of Mr P.J. MAHONEY, Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 12 July 2002, 25 September 2002 and 9 July 2003,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case originated in an application (no. 48321/99) against the Republic of Latvia lodged with the Court under Article 34 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") by two former residents of Latvia, Mrs Tatjana Slivenko and Ms Karina Slivenko ("the applicants"), on 28 January 1999. Initially, the application had also been brought by Mr Nikolay Slivenko, a Russian citizen married to the first applicant and father of the second applicant.

2. The applicants, who had been granted legal aid, were represented by Mr A. Asnis and Mr V. Portnov, lawyers practising in Moscow. The Latvian Government ("the respondent Government") were represented by their Agent, Ms K. Maļinovska.

3. The applicants alleged, in particular, that their removal from Latvia had violated Article 8 of the Convention, taken alone or in conjunction with Article 14, and that the applicants' detention on 28-29 October 1998 and 16-17 March 1999 had breached Article 5 §§ 1 and 4 of the Convention.

4. The application was allocated to the Second Section of the Court (Rule 52 § 1 of the Rules of Court).

5. The Chamber called upon to deal with the case was constituted according to Rule 26. Mr E. Levits, the judge elected in respect of Latvia, withdrew from sitting in the case (Rule 28). The respondent Government accordingly appointed Mr R. Maruste, the judge elected in respect of Estonia, to sit in his place (Article 27 § 2 of the Convention and Rule 29 § 1).

6. On 27 January 2000 the Chamber communicated the case to the respondent Government (former Rule 54 § 3 (b)). The parties submitted observations in writing and subsequently replied to each other's observations. In addition, third-party comments were received from the Russian Government, having exercised their right to intervene (Article 36 § 1 of the Convention and Rule 61 § 2). The parties replied to those comments (Rule 61 § 5).

7. On 14 June 2001 the Chamber of the Second Section, composed of Mr C.L. Rozakis, President, Mr A. B. Baka, Mrs V. Stráznická, Mr P. Lorenzen, Mrs M. Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr R. Maruste, Mr A. Kovler, judges, and Mr E. Fribergh, Section Registrar, relinquished jurisdiction in favour of the Grand Chamber, none of the parties having objected to relinquishment (Article 30 of the Convention and Rule 72).

8. The composition of the Grand Chamber was determined according to the provisions of Article 27 §§ 2 and 3 of the Convention and Rule 24, Mr Maruste continuing in his function as an elected judge designated ad hoc by the respondent Government to replace the judge elected in respect of the respondent State (Rule 29 § 1).

9. A hearing on the admissibility and merits of the case took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 14 November 2001 (Rule 59 § 3).

There appeared before the Court:

(a) for the respondent Government
Ms K. MAĻINOVSKA, Agent,
Ms A. ASTAHOVA, Counsel;

(b) for the applicants
Mr A. ASNIS,
Mr V. PORTNOV,
Ms T. RYBINA, Counsel;

(c) for the third party
Mr P. LAPTEV, Representative of the Russian Federation,
Mr S. VOLKOVSKIY,

The applicants also attended the hearing.

The Grand Chamber heard addresses by Ms Maļinovska, Mr Portnov and Mr Laptev as well as their replies to questions from judges.

10. By a decision of 23 January 2002[1], the Grand Chamber declared the application admissible in so far as the applicants' complaints under Articles 5 §§ 1 and 4, 8 and 14 were concerned. Their remaining complaints, as well as those of Mr Nikolay Slivenko, were declared inadmissible.

11. At the Court's request, the parties and the third party submitted supplementary observations on the merits of the case. The parties replied to each other's observations.

12. On 12 July 2002 the Court rejected requests by the applicants and the third party to obtain an independent expert opinion on an allegedly falsified document submitted by the respondent Government (see paragraphs 19 and 20 below) and to hold a further hearing on the merits.

13. Although the applicants and the respondent Government had only been invited to comment on the Russian Government's third-party submissions, they made further extensive submissions which went beyond such comments. On 25 September 2002 the Court decided to admit those submissions to the file and to give the parties and the third party an opportunity to present their final conclusions. Final conclusions were received from the parties and the third party in November 2002.

THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

14. The facts of the case, as submitted by the parties, may be summarised as follows.

15. The first applicant is Mrs Tatjana Slivenko, born in 1959. The second applicant is her daughter, Ms Karina Slivenko, born in 1981.

16. The applicants are of Russian origin. The first applicant was born in Estonia into the family of a military officer of the Union of Soviet Socialist

1. Note by the Registry. Extracts of the decision are published in ECHR 2002-II.

Republics (USSR). At the age of one month she moved to Latvia together with her parents. Her husband, Nikolay Slivenko, born in 1952, was transferred to Latvia in 1977 to serve as a Soviet military officer. He met the first applicant in Latvia and married her there in 1980. In 1981 the first applicant gave birth to their daughter, the second applicant. The first applicant's father retired from the army in 1986.

17. Latvia regained independence from the USSR in 1991. On 28 January 1992 the Russian Federation assumed jurisdiction over the former Soviet armed forces, including those stationed in the territory of Latvia.

18. On 4 March 1993 the applicants and the first applicant's parents were entered in the register of Latvian residents ("the register") as "ex-USSR citizens" (see paragraphs 50-56 below). At that time, none of them were citizens of any particular State. In her request to be entered in the register, the first applicant had not indicated that her husband was a Russian military officer.

19. The respondent Government state that, in requesting her entry in the register, the first applicant submitted false information about the occupation of Nikolay Slivenko, stating that he worked at a factory. The respondent Government have submitted a copy of an annex to the first applicant's application for residence in Latvia, including the statement that her husband worked at a factory.

20. The applicants and the third party submit that the document is falsified, and that it does not exist. They also refer to the fact that, during the subsequent proceedings concerning the legality of their stay in Latvia (see paragraphs 34-39 below), the immigration authorities did not refer to any such false information, and the Latvian courts did not establish that the applicants had at any point submitted the information mentioned by the respondent Government.

21. Nikolay Slivenko, who had become a Russian citizen on an unspecified date in the early 1990s, continued his service in the Russian army until his discharge in 1994 on the ground of the abolition of his post. The parties disagree as to the actual date of his discharge: the applicants state that he was discharged on 2 March 1994. They rely on the fact that an order for his discharge was signed and became effective on 2 March 1994. The Russian Government support this conclusion. The respondent Government argue that the first applicant's husband was discharged on 5 June 1994 as it was only on that date that he formally completed his leave; his leave allowance and retirement benefits had been calculated with reference to that date.

22. The treaty between Latvia and Russia on the withdrawal of the Russian troops ("the treaty") was signed in Moscow on 30 April 1994 and became effective on that date (see paragraphs 64-67 below).

23. According to the respondent Government, even before the signature and entry into force of the treaty, various Latvian and Russian authorities cooperated in establishing the names of the Russian military personnel liable to be removed from Latvia. In this context, on 31 March 1994, the Russian military authorities submitted to the Latvian authorities a list of the Russian military officers in Latvia, including the first applicant's husband, with an accompanying request to prolong his and his family's temporary residence in Latvia. This, the respondent Government contend, made it clear that their stay in Latvia was temporary, and that they would be required to leave.

24. According to the applicants and the Russian Government, the list of 31 March 1994 did not entail any obligation on Nikolay Slivenko to leave Latvia as it was a document solely requesting the prolongation of his temporary stay in Latvia, submitted before the actual signature and entry into force of the treaty.

25. On 7 October 1994 Nikolay Slivenko applied to the Latvian Citizenship and Migration Authority ("the CMA") for a temporary residence permit in Latvia by reason, inter alia, of his marriage to the first applicant, a permanent resident of Latvia. This was refused on the ground that, as a Russian military officer, he was required to leave Latvia as a result of the withdrawal of the Russian troops in accordance with the treaty.

26. On 29 November 1994 the CMA annulled the applicants' entry in the register on the ground of Nikolay Slivenko's military status. The applicants state that they were not informed about the decision, and that they found out about it only in 1996, in the context of the court proceedings brought by the first applicant's husband (see paragraph 29 below).

27. The respondent Government have also produced a list dated 10 December 1994, which according to them had been submitted to the Latvian authorities by the Russian armed forces. In the list Nikolay Slivenko was included in the category of military personnel who had retired after 28 January 1992. The applicants and the third party contest the authenticity of the list.

28. The respondent Government have further produced a list dated 16 October 1995, which according to them had been sent to the Latvian Ministry of Foreign Affairs by the Russian consulate in Riga. According to the respondent Government, Nikolay Slivenko's name appeared on the list among those Russian military pensioners who had been discharged from the Russian armed forces after 28 January 1992. It was also noted in the list that on 3 August 1994 Nikolay Slivenko had been given housing in the city of Kursk in Russia, and that he had left Latvia on 31 December 1994. The applicants and the third party contest the authenticity of the list.

29. In point of fact, however, the first applicant's husband had stayed in Latvia. He brought a court action against the CMA, claiming that their refusal to issue him with a temporary residence permit was void. On 2 January 1996 the Riga City Vidzeme District Court found in his favour. The CMA appealed against the judgment.

30. On 19 June 1996 the Riga Regional Court allowed the CMA's appeal, finding, inter alia, that Nikolay Slivenko had been a Russian military officer until 5 June 1994 and that the treaty of 30 April 1994 required all Russian officers in service on 28 January 1992 to leave Latvia together with their families. The Regional Court referred, inter alia, to the list of 16 October 1995, which confirmed that he had been provided with accommodation in Kursk, and that he had left Latvia in 1994. He did not bring a cassation appeal against the appellate judgment.

31. On 20 August 1996 the immigration authorities issued a deportation order in respect of the applicants. The order was served on them on 22 August 1996.

32. On that date the local authorities decided to evict the applicants from their flat, which they rented from the Latvian Ministry of Defence. Russian military officers and their families as well as other residents of Latvia lived in the block where the flat was located. The eviction order was not enforced.

33. On an unspecified date in 1996 Nikolay Slivenko moved to Russia, while the applicants remained in Latvia.

34. The first applicant brought a court action in her own name and on behalf of her daughter, claiming that they were in fact permanent residents of Latvia and that they could not be removed from the country.

35. On 19 February 1997 the Riga City Vidzeme District Court found in favour of the applicants. The court held, inter alia, that the first applicant had come to Latvia as a relative of her father, not her husband. As her father had retired in 1986, he could thereafter no longer be regarded as a military officer, and his close relatives, including the applicants, could be entered in the register as permanent residents of Latvia. The court quashed the deportation order in respect of the applicants and authorised their re-entry in the register.

36. The CMA appealed against the judgment of 19 February 1997. On 30 October 1997 the Riga Regional Court dismissed the appeal, finding that the first-instance court had decided the case properly. Upon a cassation appeal by the CMA, on 7 January 1998 the Supreme Court quashed the decisions of the lower courts and remitted the case to the appellate court for a fresh examination. The Supreme Court referred to the fact that the applicants had been provided with a flat in Kursk, and that they were subject to the provisions of the treaty of 30 April 1994.

37. On 6 May 1998 the Riga Regional Court allowed the CMA's appeal, finding that Nikolay Slivenko had been a serving Russian military officer until 5 June 1994. Referring to the fact that he had been given housing in Kursk in 1994 following his retirement from the Russian military, the court decided that he had been required to leave Latvia with his family in accordance with the treaty. The court found that the decision of the immigration authorities to annul the applicants' entry in the register had been lawful.

38. On 12 June 1998 the first applicant was informed by the immigration authorities that the deportation order of 20 August 1996 had become effective upon the delivery of the appellate court's judgment of 6 May 1998.

39. On 29 July 1998, on a cassation appeal by the applicants, the Supreme Court confirmed the decision of 6 May 1998. The Supreme Court stated that Nikolay Slivenko had been discharged from the Russian armed forces on 5 June 1994. The Supreme Court noted that the applicants had been allocated the flat in Kursk in the context of the material assistance provided by the United States of America for the withdrawal of Russian troops. Relying on the fact that Nikolay Slivenko had been discharged from the military after 28 January 1992, the Supreme Court concluded that the applicants, as part of his family, had also been required to leave Latvia in accordance with the treaty.

40. On 14 September 1998 the first applicant requested the CMA to defer execution of the deportation order. That was refused on 22 September 1998.

41. On 7 October 1998 the first applicant lodged with the immigration authorities an appeal against the deportation order, requesting a residence permit and her re-entry in the register. She stated, inter alia, that Latvia was her and her daughter's motherland as they had lived there all their lives and had no other citizenship, and that she was required to take care of her disabled parents who were permanently resident in Latvia.

42. In the late evening of 28 October 1998 the police entered the applicants' flat. They were arrested at 10.30 p.m. on the same date. On 29 October 1998, at 12.30 a.m., a police officer issued an arrest warrant in respect of the applicants on the basis of section 48-5 of the Aliens Act. The warrant stated that the applicants had no valid documents justifying their stay in Latvia, and that the applicants' entry in the register of Latvian residents had been annulled by the Supreme Court's final judgment of 29 July 1998. It was also mentioned in the warrant that the applicants "did not leave Latvia following the judgment, and there were reasonable grounds to suspect that they were staying in Latvia illegally". The warrant was signed by the applicants. On the basis of the warrant the applicants were immediately detained in a centre for illegal immigrants.

43. Also on 29 October 1998 the Director of the CMA sent a letter to the immigration police, stating that the applicants' arrest had been "premature" in view of the fact that the first applicant had lodged an appeal on 7 October 1998. No reference to domestic law was made in the letter. The Director of the CMA ordered the immigration police to release the applicants. They were released at an unspecified time on 29 October 1998.

44. On 3 February 1999 the applicants received a letter from the Director of the CMA dated 29 October 1998, informing them that they were required to leave Latvia immediately. They were also informed that, if they complied voluntarily with the deportation order, they could thereafter be issued with a visa enabling them to stay in the country for ninety days per annum.

45. On 16 March 1999 the flat of the first applicant's parents was searched by the police in the presence of the second applicant. On the same date, at 9 a.m., a police officer issued a warrant for the second applicant's arrest on the basis of section 48-5 of the Aliens Act. The warrant stated that the second applicant had no valid document justifying her stay in Latvia, and that there were reasonable grounds to suspect that she was staying in Latvia illegally. The order was signed by the second applicant. She was immediately arrested and thereafter detained for thirty hours in a centre for illegal immigrants. She was released on 17 March 1999.

46. On 11 July 1999 the applicants moved to Russia to join Nikolay Slivenko. By that time the second applicant had completed her secondary education in Latvia. On an unspecified date in 2001 the applicants adopted Russian citizenship as former nationals of the USSR. The applicants now live in Kursk, in accommodation which was provided by the Russian defence authorities. After the applicants left Latvia, their flat in Riga was taken back by the Latvian authorities. Meanwhile, the first applicant's parents continued living in Latvia on the basis of their status as “ex-USSR citizens”.

47. According to the applicants, the first applicant's parents are seriously ill, but the applicants have not been able to go to Latvia to visit them. The deportation order of 20 August 1996 prohibited the applicants from entering Latvia for five years. That prohibition expired on 20 August 2001. Towards the end of 2001 the applicants obtained visas permitting their stay in Latvia for no more than ninety days per annum.

48. In view of the fact that Nikolay Slivenko had left Latvia voluntarily, the prohibition on entering Latvia was not extended to him. He was allowed to visit Latvia several times in the period between 1996 and 2001.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW AND PRACTICE

A. Citizenship and nationality in Latvia

49. Latvian laws use the term “citizenship” (pilsonība) to denote the nationality of a person. In the official English translations of the domestic statutes, the term “nationality” is sometimes used in brackets alongside the term “citizenship”. An official English translation of the Aliens Act (Part I) provides, for example, that “an 'alien' [is] a person having the citizenship (nationality) of another State; [a] 'stateless person' [is] a person having no citizenship (nationality)”.

B. Categories of Latvian residents

50. Latvian legislation on nationality and immigration identifies several categories of persons, each with its own status defined in a specific Act:

(a) Latvian citizens (Latvijas Republikas pilsoņi), whose legal status is governed by the Citizenship Act of 22 July 1994 (Pilsonības likums);

(b) "permanently resident non-citizens" (nepilsoņi) – that is, citizens of the former USSR who lost their Soviet citizenship following the dissolution of the USSR but have not subsequently obtained any other nationality – who are governed by the Status of Former USSR Citizens Act of 12 April 1995 (Likums "Par to bijušo PSRS pilsoņu statusu, kuriem nav Latvijas vai citas valsts pilsonības"); this group of persons may also be referred to as "ex-USSR citizens";

(c) asylum-seekers and refugees, whose status is governed by the Asylum Act of 7 March 2002 (Patvēruma likums);

(d) "stateless persons" (bezvalstnieki) within the meaning of the Stateless Persons Act of 18 February 1999 (Likums "Par bezvalstnieka statusu Latvijas Republikā"), read in conjunction with the Aliens Act and, since 1 May 2003, with the Immigration Act which replaced it;

(e) "aliens" in the broad sense of the term (ārzemnieki), including foreign nationals (ārvalstnieki) and stateless persons (bezvalstnieki) falling solely within the ambit of the Aliens and Stateless Persons (Entry and Residence) Act of 9 June 1992 (Likums "Par ārvalstnieku un bezvalstnieku ieceļošanu un uzturēšanos Latvijas Republikā" – "the Aliens Act") (before 1 May 2003), and the Immigration Act (after that date).

51. The Citizenship Act is based on two principles: the principle of jus sanguinis and the doctrine of State succession in matters of international and constitutional law. Accordingly, with certain exceptions, only those persons who had Latvian citizenship on 17 June 1940 (the date on which Latvia came under Soviet domination) and their descendants are recognised ipso jure as Latvian citizens (section 2(1)). The fact of having been born within Latvian territory or having been resident there for a long period does not in itself confer Latvian citizenship; accordingly, citizens of the former USSR who arrived in Latvia during the Soviet era (1944-91) and their descendants were not automatically granted Latvian citizenship after Latvia had regained its independence.

52. Furthermore, the Citizenship Act provides for the possibility of becoming a Latvian citizen by means of naturalisation, in accordance with the conditions and procedure laid down in Chapter II of the Act. Persons seeking naturalisation as Latvian citizens must have been lawfully resident in Latvia for at least the past five years, have a legal source of income, pass an examination testing proficiency in Latvian, be familiar with the Latvian Constitution and national anthem, have a basic knowledge of Latvian history, swear an oath of allegiance and, where appropriate, renounce their existing citizenship (section 12). Section 11(1) lists the grounds on which naturalisation may be refused; for example the provision prohibits the naturalisation of persons who

> "... after 17 June 1940 chose the Republic of Latvia as their place of residence immediately after being discharged from the USSR (Russian) armed forces, and who did not have their permanent residence in Latvia on the date of their conscription or enlistment ...".

53. In the version in force before 25 September 1998, section 1 of the Status of Former USSR Citizens Act provided:

> "(1) This Act shall apply to citizens of the former USSR who are resident in Latvia ..., were resident within Latvian territory before 1 July 1992 and are registered as being resident there, regardless of the status of their housing, provided that they are not citizens of Latvia or of any other State, and also to their children below the age of majority, if the latter are not citizens of Latvia or of any other State."

In the version in force since 25 September 1998, section 1 of the Status of Former USSR Citizens Act provides:

> "(1) The persons governed by this Act – 'non-citizens' – shall be those citizens of the former USSR, and their children, who are resident in Latvia ... and who satisfy all the following criteria:
> 1. on 1 July 1992 they were registered as being resident within the territory of Latvia, regardless of the status of their housing; or their last registered place of residence by 1 July 1992 was in the Republic of Latvia; or a court has established that before the above-mentioned date they had been resident within the territory of Latvia for not less than ten years;
> 2. they do not have Latvian citizenship; and
> 3. they are not and have not been citizens of any other State.
> (2) The legal status of persons who arrived in the Republic of Latvia after 1 July 1992 shall be determined by the Aliens and Stateless Persons Acts.
> (3) The present Act shall not apply to:
> 1. military specialists engaged in the operation and dismantling of Russian Federation military [radar equipment] installed in the territory of Latvia, and civilians sent to Latvia for that purpose;
> 2. persons who were discharged from the armed forces after 28 January 1992, if on the date of their enlistment they were not permanently resident in the territory of Latvia and if they are not close relatives of Latvian citizens;
> 3. spouses of the persons [mentioned above] and members of their families (children and other dependants) living with them, where, irrespective of the date of their arrival, they arrived in Latvia in connection with the service of a member of the Russian Federation (USSR) armed forces;
> 4. persons who have received compensation for establishing their permanent residence abroad, regardless of whether the compensation was paid by a Latvian central or local authority or by an international or foreign authority or foundation; or

5. persons who on 1 July 1992 were officially registered as being resident for an indefinite period within a member country of the Commonwealth of Independent States."

Section 2( )2 of the Act prohibits the deportation of "non-citizens", "save where deportation takes place in accordance with the law and another State has agreed to receive the deportee". Furthermore, section 5 (which became section 8 on 7 April 2000) provides:

"(1) Section 2 ... of this Act shall also [apply to] stateless persons and their descendants who are not and have never been citizens of any State and who, before 1 July 1992, were resident within the territory of Latvia and were registered as being permanently resident there ...

(2) Section 2 of this Act shall also apply to nationals of other States and their descendants who were resident within the territory of Latvia before 1 July 1992 and were registered as being permanently resident there ..., provided that they do not have Latvian citizenship ..."

Lastly, section 49 provides that international agreements on immigration "concluded by the Republic of Latvia and approved by Parliament" take precedence over national legislation.

54. The relevant provisions of the Aliens Act were worded as follows:

Section 11

"Any foreigner or stateless person shall be entitled to stay in the Republic of Latvia for more than three months [version in force from 25 May 1999: 'more than ninety days in the course of one half of a calendar year'], provided that he or she has obtained a residence permit in accordance with the provisions of this Act. ..."

Section 23

"The following may obtain a permanent residence permit:

...

(2) the spouse of a Latvian citizen, of a 'permanently resident non-citizen' of Latvia or of an alien or stateless person who has [himself or herself] been granted a permanent residence permit, in accordance [with section] ... 26 of this Act, and the spouse's minor or dependent children ..."

55. When the Aliens Act came into force, it did not contain any provision excluding serving members of the Russian armed forces who had been discharged after 28 January 1992. Regulation no. 297 of 6 August 1996, confirmed by the Act of 18 December 1996, amended section 23 as follows:

"Permanent residence permits may be obtained by aliens who, on 1 July 1992, were officially registered as being resident for an indefinite period within the Republic of Latvia if, at the time of applying for a permanent residence permit, they are officially registered as being resident within the Republic of Latvia and are entered in the register of residents.

> Citizens of the former USSR who acquired the citizenship of another State before 1 September 1996 must apply for a permanent residence permit by 31 March 1997. Citizens of the former USSR who acquired the citizenship of another State after 1 September 1996 must apply within six months of the date on which they acquired the citizenship of that State.
> This section shall not apply to:
> 1. military specialists engaged in the operation and dismantling of Russian military [radar equipment] installed in the territory of Latvia, and civilians sent to Latvia for that purpose;
> 2. persons who were discharged from active military service after 28 January 1992 if on the date of their enlistment they were not permanently resident in the territory of Latvia and if they are not close relatives of Latvian citizens; or
> 3. spouses of the persons [mentioned above] and members of their families (children and other dependants) living with them, where, irrespective of the date of their arrival, they arrived in Latvia in connection with the service of a member of the Russian Federation (USSR) armed forces."

56. Persons who are lawfully resident in Latvia are entered in the register of residents and given a personal identification number (personas kods). The functioning of the register, which is kept by the interior authorities, is laid down in the Register of Residents Act of 27 August 1998 (Iedzīvotāju reģistra likums), which replaced the previous Act of 11 December 1991 (Likums "Par iedzīvotāju reģistru").

57. According to the information provided by the respondent Government, about 900 persons – close relatives of Russian military officers required to leave Latvia under the treaty – were able to legalise their stay in Latvia because those persons were either Latvian citizens or close relatives of Latvian citizens, and had not arrived in Latvia in connection with service in the Soviet armed forces.

C. Expulsion of aliens and their detention pending deportation

58. Section 35 of the Aliens Act lists the circumstances in which a residence permit, even a temporary one, will not be issued. Section 36 of the Aliens Act lists the grounds on which a residence permit may be withdrawn. The fact of having been a serving member of the Russian armed forces after 28 January 1992 does not appear in either of these lists.

Point 1 of section 36 provides that a residence permit should be withdrawn where its holder "has knowingly submitted false information to the Department". Point 3 provides for the same consequences if the holder of a residence permit "arouses reasonable suspicion on the part of the competent authorities that he or she presents a threat to public order and safety or national security". Point 6 concerns persons who have "entered the service of a foreign State, whether in the armed forces or otherwise, except in cases provided for by international agreements". Lastly, point 14 concerns persons who have "received compensation for establishing their permanent residence abroad, regardless of whether the compensation was paid by a Latvian central or local authority or by an international or foreign authority or foundation".

59. Section 38 of the Act provides that the head of the Department of the Interior or of one of its regional offices should issue a deportation order where an alien or stateless person resides within the territory of Latvia without being in possession of a valid visa or residence permit or in any other circumstances listed in Article 36.

60. Sections 39 and 40 provide:

Section 39

"Where a deportation order is issued in respect of a person with dependent relatives in Latvia, the latter must leave with him or her. The deportation order shall not apply to members of his or her family who are Latvian citizens or non-citizens."

Section 40

"A person shall leave the territory of Latvia within seven days after the deportation order has been served on him or her, provided that no appeal is lodged against the order in the manner prescribed in this section.

Persons in respect of whom a deportation order is issued may appeal against it within seven days to the head of the Department, who shall extend the residence permit pending consideration of the appeal.

An appeal against the decision of the head of the Department shall lie to the court within whose territorial jurisdiction the Department's headquarters are situated, within seven days after the decision has been served."

61. Under section 48, where a person has not complied with a deportation order, he or she may be forcefully removed from Latvia by the police. Under section 48-4, the police have the right to arrest a person in order to execute a deportation order.

Under section 48-5, the police have the right to arrest a person where no decision to deport him or her has been taken, if:

(1) the person has illegally entered the State;

(2) the person has knowingly provided false information to the competent authorities in order to receive a visa or residence permit;

(3) the authorities have a well-founded suspicion that the person will hide, or that he or she has no permanent place of residence; or

(4) the authorities have a well-founded suspicion that the person poses a threat to public order or national security.

In such cases the police have the right to detain a person for not more than seventy-two hours, or, where a prosecutor has been notified, for not more than ten days. The police must immediately inform the immigration authorities about the arrest, with a view to their issuing an order for the deportation of the person by the use of force. The person concerned can appeal against that deportation order in accordance with the provisions of section 40 of the Act.

By section 48-6, a person in respect of whom such a deportation order has been issued may be detained until the execution of the order, and a prosecutor must be notified of the order.

Section 48-7 provides that an arrested person must be immediately informed of the reasons for his arrest, and of his right to have legal assistance.

By section 48-10, the police have the right to arrest aliens and stateless persons who reside in Latvia without a valid visa or residence permit. Such persons must be brought to the immigration authorities or to a police remand centre within three hours.

D. Action for a breach of personal rights

62. Chapter 24-A of the Code of Civil Procedure guarantees the right to appeal to a court against administrative acts breaching personal rights.

Article 239-2 § 1 states that a complaint against an action (decision) of a State authority may be submitted to a court, after a hierarchical complaint in this connection has been determined by the competent administrative authority.

Under Article 239-3 § 1 of the Code, a complaint to a court may be submitted within one month from the date of the notification of the dismissal of the hierarchical complaint, or within one month from the date of the contested act, provided that the person concerned has not received a decision.

Article 239-5 provides that the court must examine the complaint within ten days, having questioned the parties and other persons, if necessary.

Pursuant to Article 239-7, if the court considers that the act concerned violates an individual's personal rights, the court should adopt a judgment obliging the authority to remedy the violation.

E. “Registration” of the place of residence

63. Under the Soviet legislation, a citizen was issued with a “registration” (propiska) at a particular address, by way of a special seal in his passport attesting to his place of permanent residence for the purposes of domestic law. Following the restoration of Latvian independence in 1991, the “registration” system remained effective under the Latvian legislation.

III. THE LATVIAN-RUSSIAN TREATY ON THE WITHDRAWAL OF THE RUSSIAN TROOPS

64. The treaty between Latvia and Russia on the conditions and schedule for the complete withdrawal of Russian Federation military troops from the territory of the Republic of Latvia and their status pending withdrawal ("the treaty") was signed in Moscow on 30 April 1994, published in Latvijas Vēstnesis (Official Gazette) on 10 December 1994, and came into force on 27 February 1995.

In the preamble of the treaty the parties stated, inter alia, that by signing the treaty they wished to "eradicate the negative consequences of their common history".

65. The other relevant provisions of the treaty read as follows:

Article 2

"The Russian Federation's military troops shall leave the territory of the Republic of Latvia by 31 August 1994.

The withdrawal of Russian Federation military troops shall concern all members of the armed forces of the Russian Federation, members of their families and their movable property.

The closure of military bases in the territory of the Republic of Latvia and the discharge of military personnel after 28 January 1992 shall not be regarded as the withdrawal of military troops.

..."

Article 3, fifth paragraph

"The Russian Federation shall inform the Republic of Latvia about its military personnel and their families in the territory of Latvia. It shall provide regular information, at least every three months, about the withdrawal of, and quantitative changes in, each of the above-mentioned groups. ..."

Article 9

"The Republic of Latvia shall guarantee the rights and freedoms of Russian Federation military troops affected by the withdrawal, and also of their families, in accordance with the legislation of the Republic of Latvia and the principles of international law."

Article 15

"This treaty ... shall be applied on a provisional basis from the date of signature and shall come into force on the date of exchange of the instruments of ratification. ..."

66. The conditions for the implementation by Latvia of the above-mentioned treaty are laid down in Regulation no. 118 of 22 April 1995, the relevant parts of the second paragraph of which provide:

> "The Ministry of the Interior:
> 2.2. shall issue residence permits, after checking the list of military personnel ... to discharged members of the Russian armed forces who were resident within the territory of Latvia on 28 January 1992 and have been registered by the Nationality and Immigration Department ...
> 2.3. shall issue deportation orders in respect of members of the armed forces who are unlawfully resident in the Republic of Latvia, and shall supervise the execution of such orders; ..."

67. An agreement between Russia and Latvia, also signed on 30 April 1994, concerns the social protection of retired members of the Russian Federation armed forces and their families residing within the territory of the Republic of Latvia. Article 2 of the agreement, which applies principally to persons discharged from the Soviet armed forces before Latvia regained its independence, provides:

> "The persons to whom this agreement applies shall enjoy their fundamental rights within the territory of the Republic of Latvia, in accordance with the standards of international law, the provisions of this agreement and Latvian legislation.
> The persons to whom this agreement applies ... and who were permanently resident within the territory of the Republic of Latvia before 28 January 1992, including those in respect of whom the relevant formalities have not been carried out and who are on the lists verified by both parties and appended to this agreement, shall retain the right to reside without hindrance in the territory of Latvia, if they so desire. By agreement between the Parties, any persons who were permanently resident within the territory of Latvia before 28 January 1992 and, for various reasons, have not been included on the lists referred to above may be added to them. ..."

THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 OF THE CONVENTION

68. The applicants complained that their removal from Latvia had violated Article 8 of the Convention, which provides:

> "1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

A. The parties' submissions

1. The applicants

69. The applicants claimed that their removal from Latvia had violated their right to respect for their "private life", their "family life" and their "home" within the meaning of Article 8 of the Convention. They considered that their removal had not been required by Latvian law or by the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops, interpreted correctly, and that in any event the resultant interference with their above rights had pursued no legitimate aim and had not been necessary in a democratic society. The applicants also stated that, on the basis of the Latvian courts' incorrect interpretation of the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops, they had lost their legal status in Latvia and had been forced to leave the country as a result of political changes rather than of their own actions.

70. In this connection, the applicants submitted that they did in fact have the right to obtain legal status in Latvia according to Latvian law, and that the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops had no bearing on that right. In their view, they were entitled to be registered as permanent residents of Latvia under the Status of Former USSR Citizens Act. According to the applicants, the only restriction imposed by that law (section 1) and also by the Aliens Act (section 23) on the right to obtain permanent residence in Latvia concerned persons who had arrived in Latvia as a member of the family of a Soviet or Russian military officer who had not retired from service by 28 January 1992. However, the first applicant had arrived in Latvia as a member of the family of her father, who had retired from the military before 28 January 1992, and the second applicant had been born in Latvia and had lived there all her life. Accordingly, the applicants were entitled to obtain the status of "ex-USSR citizens" and permanent residence permits, and to be entered in the register of Latvian residents. The applicants concluded in this respect that their entry in the register on 3 March 1994 had been perfectly lawful.

71. The applicants further submitted that the Latvian authorities had improperly interpreted Latvian law by subsequently quashing their legal status in Latvia on the ground that they were close relatives of Nikolay Slivenko. In the applicants' view, their right to live in Latvia was not dependent on the legal status of Nikolay Slivenko. The applicants admitted that the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops had required Russian military officers to leave Latvia. But the treaty did not deal with situations such as the applicants', where members of the family of a Russian military officer had arrived in Latvia independently from him, had entered into family ties with him while already living there, and had obtained legal status in Latvia following the restoration of Latvia's independence. Thus, the treaty could not be applied in regard to the applicants "without finding out how they had arrived in Latvia and what national laws regulated their status". In the applicants' view, the Latvian authorities' decision to apply the treaty and to annul their legal status in Latvia had been unlawful.

72. The applicants also contested the respondent Government's allegation that the Latvian authorities had annulled their legal status in Latvia on the further ground that when applying for permanent residence the first applicant had submitted false information as to Nikolay Slivenko's occupation. The applicants stated that the first applicant had never lied to the authorities about her husband's status, and that the document submitted in this connection by the respondent Government was falsified (see paragraphs 19-20 above). In this respect the applicants also pointed out that during the subsequent proceedings concerning the legality of their stay in Latvia the immigration authorities had not referred to any false information submitted by them, and the Latvian courts had not established that the applicants had at any point submitted the information mentioned by the respondent Government. The applicants concluded in this respect that they ought to have been allowed to stay in Latvia, that the deportation order of 20 August 1996 had constituted an interference with their rights under Article 8 of the Convention and that that interference had not been authorised by law within the meaning of the second paragraph of that Article.

73. Furthermore, the interference had pursued no legitimate aim within the meaning of that provision, and had in any event not been necessary in a democratic society. The applicants stated that during the proceedings concerning the legality of their stay in Latvia no consideration of national security, public order or prevention of crime had been mentioned by the domestic courts; the proceedings had related solely to the legality of their stay in accordance with the domestic legislation. Therefore, no ground referred to in the second paragraph of Article 8 had been advanced by the domestic courts to justify their removal from Latvia.

74. According to the applicants, they were completely integrated into Latvian society and had developed irreplaceable personal, social and economic ties in Latvia as a result of the following circumstances.

(a) The first applicant had lived in Latvia from the age of one month and the second applicant had been born in Latvia and had always lived there.

(b) There had been no separate lists of Soviet military officers or their close relatives in the register of residents during the Soviet rule of Latvia until 1991. During that period Nikolay Slivenko and the applicants had been fully-fledged citizens of the USSR living in the territory of Latvia and having their "registration" (see paragraph 63 above) in Riga; therefore their formal residential status until 1991 had been the same as that of other Soviet citizens living in Latvia.

(c) The first applicant had been educated in Latvia, and from the age of 17 she had worked in various organisations and companies in the city of Riga. She had never worked for a Soviet or Russian military organisation.

(d) From 1991 until 1995 the first applicant had worked in certain Latvian companies, and in one of them she had worked as a secretary. In the first applicant's view, this fact attested to her proficiency in the Latvian language.

(e) The second applicant had completed her secondary education in Latvia in 1999, obtaining, inter alia, a certificate attesting to her fluency in the Latvian language.

(f) The first applicant's parents had lived in Latvia since 1959; they had obtained the status of "ex-USSR citizens" and currently lived in Latvia.

(g) Nikolay Slivenko had arrived in Latvia in 1977. Following the first applicant's marriage to him in 1980, they had lived in a flat in Riga among the civilian population, not in the Soviet army barracks or any other special or restricted area.

(h) Almost half of the Latvian population during the Soviet era and about 40% of the Latvian population today consisted of persons of Russian ethnic origin. Therefore, the applicants had had no problems leading a normal life in Latvia as a result of the fact that they were native Russian speakers. In any event, while the applicants had graduated from educational establishments teaching in Russian, they were also fully proficient in Latvian.

75. In view of the above circumstances, the applicants were completely integrated into Latvian society, and the level of their integration had not been different from that of persons having the status of permanent residents of Latvia. Following the restoration of Latvian independence in 1991, the applicants had considered that their future lay exclusively in Latvia. The applicants had had no connections, acquaintances or accommodation in any other State. After Nikolay Slivenko's move to Russia in 1996, he had obtained a flat from the local authorities in Kursk as a retired serviceman, not in compensation for his removal from Latvia. The applicants submitted that the Latvian authorities had separated them by force from Nikolay Slivenko, who had not been joined in Russia by the applicants until 1999. In addition, in forcing the applicants out of Latvia, the authorities had also separated them from the first applicant's elderly parents. The prohibition on the applicants' entering Latvia as visitors until 20 August 2001 had aggravated that situation. Against this background, the right to respect for the applicants' private life, family life and home had been violated as a result of their removal from Latvia.

2. The respondent Government

76. The respondent Government submitted that the issue of the applicants' removal from Latvia ought to be examined in the context of the eradication of the consequences of the illegal occupation of Latvia by the Soviet Union, which had been completed by the withdrawal of the Russian troops from the territory of Latvia.

77. The respondent Government further submitted that there had been no interference with the applicants' rights under Article 8 of the Convention. In any event, even assuming that their removal had constituted an interference with their rights under Article 8, it had been compatible with Latvian law and the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops. Furthermore, the interference had pursued the legitimate aims of the protection of national security and the prevention of disorder and crime and it had been necessary in a democratic society in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 8 of the Convention.

78. The respondent Government stated that, pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 2 of the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops, all those who had been active servicemen in the Russian army on 28 January 1992, including those discharged thereafter, had been required to leave Latvia. Therefore, the treaty had been duly applied in regard to Nikolay Slivenko and the applicants as members of his family, and the applicants' removal had been compatible with the treaty and Latvian law.

79. According to the respondent Government, prior to the withdrawal of the Russian armed forces from Latvia, all Russian military personnel stationed in Latvia had been required to obtain temporary residence permits. It was in this context that on 31 March 1994 the Russian authorities had submitted a list indicating the names of Russian military officers, including Nikolay Slivenko and the applicants as members of his family, in order for such temporary residence permits to be issued. The respondent Government stated that the list had attested that the applicants were “related to [members of the] Russian armed forces, [had no] right to be entered in the register of Latvian residents, and thus would leave Latvia during the forthcoming withdrawal of the Russian troops” (see also paragraphs 23-24 above).

80. The lists of 10 December 1994 and 16 October 1995 bearing the name of Nikolay Slivenko had been submitted by the Russian embassy in Latvia pursuant to the fifth paragraph of Article 3 of the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops. The list of 10 December 1994 had been submitted to the Latvian authorities by the head of the Social Maintenance Section of the Russian embassy in Riga, indicating the names of the Russian military personnel, including Nikolay Slivenko, who had been discharged from the Russian armed forces after 28 January 1992 (see also paragraph 27 above). The list of 16 October 1995 had been submitted by the same Russian authority as an update of the list of 10 December 1994, indicating the Russian military personnel who had left Latvia or had remained in Latvia, mostly for technical reasons, and persons who had requested permanent residence in Latvia despite the fact that they had been discharged from the Russian armed forces after 28 January 1992 (see also paragraph 28 above).

81. The respondent Government stated that the submission by the Russian authorities of the above lists, together with the fact that Nikolay Slivenko had been granted accommodation in Russia, had constituted notification by Russia that Nikolay Slivenko and the applicants, as members of his family, were subject to the provisions of the treaty.

82. The respondent Government further stated that the treaty had made no distinction between close relatives of a Russian military officer who had arrived in Latvia in connection with that officer's duties, and those persons who had lived in Latvia prior to joining the family of a military officer required to leave Latvia under the treaty. Therefore, the fact that the first applicant had arrived in Latvia as a relative of her father (who had not been required to leave Latvia under the treaty), and not as a relative of Nikolay Slivenko, had no bearing on the applicants' obligation under the treaty to leave Latvia together with Nikolay Slivenko.

83. With reference to the interpretation by the Latvian courts of the provisions concerning the register of residents (see paragraph 56 above), the respondent Government stated that domestic law (considered separately from the treaty) provided for specific legal treatment of persons who were close relatives of a Russian military officer required to leave the country under the treaty, and who had not arrived in Latvia in connection with the service of any of their relatives in the Soviet armed forces. Such persons could obtain permanent residence in Latvia, provided that they had grounds recognised in Latvian law for doing so. By contrast, no right to residence could be afforded to persons such as the applicants, who were close relatives of a Russian military officer required to leave Latvia under the treaty, and who had arrived in Latvia in connection with the service of another relative in the Soviet armed forces, even if that relative had been entitled to remain in Latvia. The respondent Government concluded in this connection that the applicants had been unable to claim permanent residence in Latvia under the domestic law, not only because they belonged to Nikolay Slivenko's family, but also because the first applicant had arrived in Latvia as a member of the family of another Soviet military officer, her father.

84. The respondent Government stated that they had no statistics as to how many persons had been in a legal situation similar to that of the applicants – that is, being members of the family of a Russian military officer required to leave Latvia under the treaty and, at the same time, belonging to the group of persons who had arrived in Latvia in connection with the service of other relatives in the Soviet armed forces.

85. The respondent Government could, however, confirm that about 900 persons – relatives of Russian military officers required to leave Latvia under the treaty – had been able to legalise their stay in Latvia because those persons had not arrived in Latvia in connection with their relatives' service in the Soviet armed forces, and had been either Latvian citizens or relatives of Latvian citizens. However, the applicants did not belong to any of those categories.

86. The respondent Government further submitted that the Latvian authorities had also annulled the applicants' legal status in Latvia on the ground that the first applicant had submitted false information as to Nikolay Slivenko's occupation. The respondent Government stated that the document submitted by them as confirmation of the false statements by the first applicant had been genuine, that it had been included in the case file during the domestic proceedings, and that it had been used as evidence and referred to before the Latvian courts (see paragraphs 19-20 above).

87. The respondent Government also stated that the applicants had not been prevented from visiting Latvia following their move to Russia. Furthermore, the applicants had been informed that they could obtain an entry visa to Latvia if they complied voluntarily with the deportation order. The applicants' statement that they had therefore been prevented from taking care of the first applicant's parents was thus unjustified.

88. According to the respondent Government, the applicants, while living in the territory of Latvia, had never been integrated into Latvian society in view of the following circumstances.

(a) The applicants had not chosen Latvia as their place of residence but had arrived there in connection with the military service of members of their family.

(b) Soviet military servicemen had not had the same residence status in the former Soviet Union as other Soviet citizens; upon commencing their service, all military servicemen had been required to hand over their passport to the military authorities, to be replaced by a conscription document serving as their only piece of identification.

(c) In their everyday life the military personnel of the USSR stationed in the territory of Latvia had not been required to deal with the local inhabitants or authorities as the majority of services, such as medical care and accommodation, had been provided by the military authorities.

(d) The applicants were not proficient in the Latvian language; in particular, the certificate awarded to the second applicant on leaving secondary school attested to the lowest degree of proficiency in the Latvian language.

(e) According to the respondent Government, the facts that the applicants were Russian-speaking, held Russian citizens' passports and had accommodation in Russia also served as evidence that they had integrated into Russian, not Latvian, society. The respondent Government also stated that the first applicant's parents had lived separately from the applicants, and that there was no evidence that they had been in regular need of help from them for medical or any other care.

89. Against this background, the respondent Government concluded that the applicants' removal had been compatible with Article 8 of the Convention, given in particular that the Convention could not be interpreted as creating rights for military servicemen of a foreign State or members of their family to claim permanent residence in the country in which they are posted.

B. The third party's comments

90. According to the Russian Government, the removal of the applicants had not been required by the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops as Nikolay Slivenko had already been discharged from the Russian armed forces on 2 March 1994. The treaty had not concerned persons who had been discharged from the armed forces before its signature and entry into force. The Russian authorities had not indicated to the Latvian authorities that Nikolay Slivenko and his family should be removed under the fifth paragraph of Article 3 of the treaty. The interpretation by the respondent Government that they had had to be removed from Latvia as part of the treaty-based withdrawal was therefore wrong.

91. The applicants had completely integrated into Latvian society as they had been nationals of the Latvian Soviet Socialist Republic. There had been no formal or other differences in the applicants' status compared with that of other USSR citizens living in Latvia at the material time. Any distinction of the applicants' legal status in Latvia as a result of the political changes in 1991 had therefore been completely unjustified.

92. In any event, the interference with the applicants' rights as a result of their removal had pursued no legitimate aim within the meaning of Article 8 § 2 of the Convention, and had not been necessary in a democratic society as there was no evidence showing that Nikolay Slivenko or the applicants could have caused any damage to the interests of security, safety, public order or the economic well-being of Latvia. Furthermore, the Latvian authorities had taken no account of the fact that the applicants had lived in Latvia almost all their lives and had been completely integrated into Latvian society. The third party concluded that the applicants had been arbitrarily excluded from their homeland in breach of Article 8 of the Convention.

C. The Court's assessment

1. Interference with the applicants' rights under Article 8 § 1 of the Convention

93. The applicants complained that their removal from Latvia had violated their rights guaranteed by Article 8 of the Convention in that the measures taken against them in that connection had not respected their private life, their family life and their home in Latvia. They claimed that those measures had not been in accordance with the law, had not pursued any legitimate aim and could not be regarded as necessary in a democratic society within the meaning of Article 8 § 2. The Court must first determine whether the applicants are entitled to claim that they had a "private life", "family life" or "home" in Latvia within the meaning of Article 8 § 1, and, if so, whether their removal from Latvia amounted to an interference with their right to respect for them.

94. In the Convention case-law relating to expulsion and extradition measures, the main emphasis has consistently been placed on the "family life" aspect, which has been interpreted as encompassing the effective "family life" established in the territory of a Contracting State by aliens lawfully resident there, it being understood that "family life" in this sense is normally limited to the core family (see, mutatis mutandis, Marckx v. Belgium, judgment of 13 June 1979, Series A no. 31, p. 21, § 45; see also, X v. Germany, no. 3110/67, Commission decision of 19 July 1968, Collection of decisions 27, pp. 77-96). The Court has, however, also held that the Convention includes no right, as such, to establish one's family life in a particular country (see, inter alia, Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 28 May 1985, Series A no. 94, p. 34, § 68; Gül v. Switzerland, judgment of 19 February 1996, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1996-I, pp. 174-75, § 38; and Boultif v. Switzerland, no. 54273/00, § 39, ECHR 2001-IX).

95. The Court further observes that the case-law has consistently treated the expulsion of long-term residents under the head of "private life" as well as that of "family life", some importance being attached in this context to the degree of social integration of the persons concerned (see, for example, Dalia v. France, judgment of 19 February 1998, Reports 1998-I, pp. 88-89, §§ 42-45). Moreover, the Court has recognised that Article 8 applies to the exclusion of displaced persons from their homes (see Cyprus v. Turkey [GC], no. 25781/94, § 175, ECHR 2001-IV).

96. As regards the facts of the present case, the first applicant arrived in Latvia in 1959, when she was only one month old. Until 1999, by which time she was 40 years of age, she continued to live in Latvia. She attended school there, found employment and married. Her daughter, the second applicant, was born in Latvia in 1981 and lived there until the age of 18, when she was compelled to leave the country together with her mother, having just completed her secondary education (see paragraphs 16 and 46 above). It is undisputed that the applicants left Latvia against their own will, as a result of the unsuccessful outcome of the proceedings concerning the legality of their stay in Latvia. They were thus removed from the country where they had developed, uninterruptedly since birth, the network of personal, social and economic relations that make up the private life of every human being. Furthermore, as a result of the removal, the applicants lost the flat in which they had lived in Riga (see paragraphs 32 and 46 above). In these circumstances, the Court cannot but find that the applicants' removal from Latvia constituted an interference with their “private life” and their “home” within the meaning of Article 8 § 1 of the Convention.

97. In contrast, even though the applicants evidently had an established “family life” in Latvia, the impugned measures of removal from the country were not aimed at breaking up the family, nor did they have such an effect, given that the Latvian authorities deported the family, namely Nikolay, Tatjana and Karina Slivenko, in implementation of the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of Russian troops. In the light of the Court's above-mentioned case-law, it is clear that under the Convention the applicants were not entitled to choose in which of the two countries – Latvia or Russia – to continue or re-establish an effective family life. Furthermore, the existence of “family life” could not be relied on by the applicants in relation to the first applicant's elderly parents, adults who did not belong to the core family and who have not been shown to have been dependent members of the applicants' family, the applicants' arguments in this respect not having been sufficiently substantiated. Nonetheless, the impact of the impugned measures on the applicants' family life – notably their ultimate enforced migration as a family unit to the Russian Federation – is a relevant factor for the Court's assessment of the case under Article 8 of the Convention. The Court will also take into account the applicants' link with the first applicant's parents (the second applicant's grandparents) under the head of the applicants' “private life” within the meaning of Article 8 § 1 of the Convention.

98. The Court will accordingly concentrate its further examination on the question whether the interference with the applicants' right to respect for their “private life” and their “home” was justified or not.

2. Justification of the interference

99. Such interference will be in breach of Article 8 of the Convention unless it can be justified under paragraph 2 of Article 8 as being “in accordance with the law”, as pursuing one or more of the legitimate aims listed therein, and as being “necessary in a democratic society” in order to achieve the aim or aims concerned.

(a) “In accordance with the law”

100. According to the established case-law of the Court, the expression “in accordance with the law” requires that the impugned measure should have some basis in domestic law, and it also refers to the quality of the law in question, requiring that it should be accessible to the person concerned and foreseeable as to its effects (see Amann v. Switzerland [GC], no. 27798/95, § 50, ECHR 2000-II).

101. In the present case, the respondent Government relied on two different grounds as the legal basis for the deportation order issued in respect of the applicants: in the first place, they relied on the decisions of the Latvian courts, according to which the applicants were required to leave the country under the provisions of the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops; secondly, they alleged, as an additional reason justifying the deportation of the applicants, that the first applicant, when requesting her entry in the register of Latvian residents, had submitted false information concerning her husband's occupation.

102. The Court considers it appropriate to deal first with the second, subsidiary ground relied on by the respondent Government. In this context, it notes that the applicants and the third party disputed that false information had been submitted and claimed that the document relied on by the respondent Government in this connection was a forgery. Indeed, the third party submitted an expert report by a forensic institute in Moscow which, they claimed, proved that the document had been falsified. They further asked the Court to order an independent expert opinion with a view to corroborating the Moscow institute's findings. However, in a decision of 12 July 2002 the Court rejected that request (see paragraph 12 above).

103. The Court points out that the basis for its examination must always be the impugned decisions of the domestic authorities and the legal grounds on which they relied. It cannot take into account any alternative legal grounds suggested by the respondent Government in order to justify the measure in question if those grounds are not reflected or inherent in the decisions of the competent domestic authorities. In the present case, it has not been shown that any of the decisions of the Latvian authorities, either in the proceedings brought by the first applicant's husband prior to the issuing of the deportation order (see paragraphs 25-26 and 29-30 above) or in those subsequently brought by the applicants themselves with a view to challenging that order (see paragraphs 34-39 above), relied on the submission of false information as a ground for justifying the removal of any of the members of the Slivenko family from Latvian territory. Under these circumstances, the respondent Government's submissions on this point must be disregarded and the applicants' and the third party's request for an expert opinion no longer has any purpose.

104. There remains the first and principal ground relied on by the respondent Government, the argument that the applicants' removal from Latvia was required by the bilateral treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops. In this connection, the applicants and the third party argued that the Latvian courts had incorrectly interpreted the treaty, that according to a correct interpretation of the treaty the first applicant's husband and indeed the applicants themselves could not have been ordered to leave Latvia, and that the Russian authorities had never requested the removal of the applicants' family from Latvia. The Court notes that here, too, the parties disagreed on certain factual matters, namely the date of the retirement of the first applicant's husband and the nature and authenticity of the lists of 31 March 1994, 10 December 1994 and 16 October 1995.

105. The Court reiterates that it is primarily for the national authorities, notably the courts, to interpret and apply domestic law (see Amann, cited above, § 52). This also applies where international treaties are concerned; it is for the implementing party to interpret the treaty, and in this respect it is not the Court's task to substitute its own judgment for that of the domestic authorities, even less to settle a dispute between the parties to the treaty as to its correct interpretation. Nor is it the task of the Court to re-examine the facts as found by the domestic authorities as the basis for their legal assessment. The Court's function is to review, from the point of view of the Convention, the reasoning in the decisions of the domestic courts rather than to re-examine their findings as to the particular circumstances of the case or the legal classification of those circumstances under domestic law.

106. In the present case, the Latvian courts stated that the ground for the applicants' removal had been the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops. In this context they also interpreted certain provisions of Latvian domestic legislation in the light of the treaty, in particular by concluding that neither the Russian military officers required to leave the country nor the members of their families qualified for residential status in Latvia as "ex-USSR citizens" (Article 2, second paragraph, of the treaty). Admittedly, at the time when the applicants first applied for their entry in the register of residents as "ex-USSR citizens", the treaty was not yet in force and, accordingly, only the relevant provisions of the domestic legislation applied. However, later on, the relevant domestic provisions could legitimately be interpreted and applied in the light of the treaty, a legal instrument which was clearly accessible to the applicants at the relevant time.

107. As to the foreseeability of the combined application of the treaty provisions and domestic law in the applicants' case, the Court is also satisfied that the requirements of the Convention were met. The applicants must have been able to foresee to a reasonable degree, at least with the advice of legal experts, that they would be regarded as covered by the treaty provisions requiring the departure of relatives of Russian military officers affected by the withdrawal and that, consequently, they could not be granted permanent residential status in Latvia as provided for in the domestic legislation. Absolute certainty in this matter could not be expected.

108. In any event, the decisions of the Latvian courts do not appear arbitrary. In particular, as regards the applicability of the treaty to the applicants' situation, the Court does not find arbitrary the interpretation of the third paragraph of Article 2 of the treaty according to which the cut-off date applied for determining whether or not a military officer was required to leave was 28 January 1992, the date when the Russian Federation assumed jurisdiction over the former Soviet armed forces stationed in Latvia (see paragraph 17 above). As the first applicant's husband was discharged from the armed forces after this date, the treaty could reasonably be regarded as applying to him and his family. Also, the date of his actual discharge, whether before or after the signature of the treaty, could reasonably be regarded as irrelevant to the applicability of the treaty, notwithstanding the contrary view of the third party (see Articles 2, third paragraph, and 15 of the treaty). Furthermore, as to the legal assessment of the various lists submitted by the Russian authorities to the Latvian authorities, it could reasonably be considered that the validity and lawfulness of the deportation order itself, a measure taken under Latvian domestic law in implementation of the treaty, did not depend on the submission of a specific request by Russia.

109. The applicants' removal from Latvia can accordingly be considered to have been "in accordance with the law" within the meaning of Article 8 § 2 of the Convention.

(b) Legitimate aim

110. The respondent Government submitted that the applicants' removal from Latvia had pursued the legitimate aims of the protection of national security and the prevention of disorder and crime. They emphasised in this connection that the measure had to be seen in the context of the "eradication of the consequences of the illegal occupation of Latvia by the Soviet Union". The applicants contested those submissions, none of the above aims having been mentioned in the domestic proceedings concerning their own case, which had been limited to reviewing the lawfulness of their residential status in Latvia. The third party objected to the respondent Government's statement describing the situation of Latvia prior to 1991 as having been illegal under international law.

111. The Court considers that the aim of the particular measures taken in respect of the applicants cannot be dissociated from the wider context of the constitutional and international law arrangements made after Latvia regained its independence in 1991. In this context it is not necessary to deal with the previous situation of Latvia under international law. It is sufficient to note that after the dissolution of the USSR, former Soviet military troops remained in Latvia under Russian jurisdiction, at the time when both Latvia and Russia were independent States. The Court therefore accepts that with the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops and the measures for the implementation of this treaty, the Latvian authorities sought to protect the interest of the country's national security.

112. In short, the measures of the applicants' removal can be said to have been imposed in pursuance of the protection of national security, a legitimate aim within the meaning of Article 8 § 2 of the Convention.

(c) "Necessary in a democratic society"

113. A measure interfering with rights guaranteed by Article 8 § 1 of the Convention can be regarded as being "necessary in a democratic society" if it has been taken in order to respond to a pressing social need and if the means employed are proportionate to the aims pursued. The national authorities enjoy a certain margin of appreciation in this matter. The Court's task consists in ascertaining whether the impugned measures struck a fair balance between the relevant interests, namely the individual's rights protected by the Convention on the one hand and the community's interests on the other.

114. In the present case the applicants, who had resided in Latvia almost all their lives, but who had become stateless when Latvia regained its independence in 1991, were required to leave the country under a deportation order issued in respect of them, as members of the family of a retired Russian military officer, pursuant to the Latvian-Russian treaty on the withdrawal of the Russian troops. In connection with this measure, they were refused entry in the register of Latvian residents as "ex-USSR citizens".

115. The Court reiterates that no right of an alien to enter or reside in a particular country is as such guaranteed by the Convention. It is for the Contracting States to maintain public order, in particular by exercising their right, as a matter of well-established international law and subject to their treaty obligations, to control the entry and residence of aliens (see, among many other authorities, Dalia, cited above, p. 91, § 52).

116. In the Court's view, the withdrawal of the armed forces of one independent State from the territory of another, following the dissolution of the State to which they both formerly belonged, constitutes, from the point of view of the Convention, a legitimate means of dealing with the various political, social and economic problems arising from that dissolution. The fact that in the present case the Latvian-Russian treaty provided for the withdrawal of all military officers who after 28 January 1992 had been placed under Russian jurisdiction, including those who had been discharged from the armed forces prior to the entry into force of the treaty (which in this respect therefore had retroactive effect), and that it also obliged their families to leave the country, is not in itself objectionable from the point of view of the Convention and in particular Article 8. Indeed, it can be said that this arrangement respected the family life of the persons concerned in that it did not interfere with the family unit and obliged Russia to accept the whole family within its territory, irrespective of the origin or nationality of the individual family members.

117. In so far as the withdrawal of the Russian troops interfered with the private life and home of the persons concerned, this interference would normally not appear disproportionate, having regard to the conditions of service of military officers. This is true in particular in the case of active servicemen and their families. Their withdrawal can be treated as akin to a transfer to another place of service, which might have been ordered on other occasions in the course of their normal service. Moreover, it is evident that the continued presence of active servicemen of a foreign army, with their families, may be seen as being incompatible with the sovereignty of an independent State and as a threat to national security. The public interest in the removal of active servicemen and their families from the territory will therefore normally outweigh the individual's interest in staying. However, even in respect of such persons it is not to be excluded that the specific circumstances of their case might render the removal measures unjustified from the point of view of the Convention.

118. The justification of removal measures does not apply to the same extent to retired military officers and their families. After their discharge from the armed forces a requirement to move for reasons of service will normally no longer apply to them. While their inclusion in the treaty does not as such appear objectionable (see paragraph 116 above), the interests of national security will in the Court's view carry less weight in respect of this category of persons, while more importance must be attached to their legitimate private interests.

119. In the present case, the first applicant's husband retired from the military after 28 January 1992, the deadline established by the third paragraph of Article 2 of the treaty, and was thus regarded by the Latvian authorities as being concerned by the withdrawal of troops, together with active servicemen. Regardless of the actual date of his retirement, which is disputed by the parties, the fact remains that from mid-1994 onwards, and during the proceedings concerning the legality of the applicants' stay in Latvia, the first applicant's husband was already retired. Yet that fact made no difference to the determination of the applicants' status in Latvia.

120. The Court further takes account of the information provided by the respondent Government on the treatment of hardship cases. According to that information about 900 persons (Latvian citizens or close relatives of Latvian citizens) were able to legalise their stay in Latvia notwithstanding their status as relatives of Russian military officers required to leave (see paragraphs 57 and 85 above). This shows that the Latvian authorities were not of the opinion that the treaty's provisions on the withdrawal of troops had to be applied without exceptions. On the contrary, the authorities considered that they had some latitude which allowed them to ensure respect for the private and family life and the home of the persons concerned, in accordance with the requirements of Article 8 of the Convention. As regards Latvian citizens, their expulsion would moreover have contravened Article 3 of Protocol no. 4 to the Convention. In any event, the Court reiterates that the treaty cannot serve as a valid basis for depriving the Court of its power to review whether there was an interference with the applicants' rights and freedoms under the Convention, and, if so, whether such interference was justified (see the admissibility decision in the present application, § 62, ECHR 2002-II).

121. The Court notes that the derogation from the obligation to leave was not limited to persons holding Latvian citizenship, but was apparently extended to other residents, the cases in question being decided on a case-by-case basis. However, it seems that in this context the authorities did not examine whether each person concerned presented a specific danger to national security or public order. Nor has any allegation been made in this particular case that the applicants presented such a danger. The public interest instead seems to have been perceived in abstract terms underlying the legal distinctions made in domestic law.

122. The Court considers that schemes such as the present one for the withdrawal of foreign troops and their families, based on a general finding that their removal is necessary for national security, cannot as such be deemed to be contrary to Article 8 of the Convention. However, application of such a scheme without any possibility of taking into account the individual circumstances of persons not exempted by the domestic law from removal is in the Court's view not compatible with the requirements of that Article. In order to strike a fair balance between the competing interests of the individual and the community, the removal of a person should not be enforced where such measure is disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. In the present case the question is whether the applicants' specific situation was such as to outweigh any danger to national security based on their family ties with former foreign military officers.

123. The respondent Government argued that the applicants had not been sufficiently integrated into Latvian society (see paragraph 88 above). In this connection the Court observes that the applicants have spent virtually all their lives in Latvia (see paragraph 96 above). It is true that the applicants are not of Latvian origin, and that they arrived and lived in Latvia – then part of the USSR – in connection with the service of members of their family (the first applicant's father and her husband) in the Soviet armed forces. However, the applicants also developed personal, social and economic ties in Latvia unrelated to their status as relatives of Soviet (and later Russian) military officers. This is shown by the fact that the applicants did not live in army barracks or any other restricted area, but in a block of flats in which there were also civilians. Nor did they study or work in a military institution. The first applicant was able to find employment in Latvian companies after Latvia regained its independence in 1991.

124. As regards the respondent Government's argument about the level of the applicants' proficiency in Latvian, the Court observes that, in so far as this is a relevant consideration, it has not been shown that the degree of the applicants' fluency in the language – although the precise level is in dispute – was insufficient for them to lead a normal everyday life in Latvia. In particular, there is no evidence that the level of the applicants' knowledge of Latvian was in any way different from that of other native Russian speakers living in Latvia, including those who were able to obtain the status of “ex-USSR citizens” in order to remain in Latvia on a permanent basis.

125. Although in 1999 the applicants moved to Russia to join Nikolay Slivenko and eventually obtained Russian citizenship, by that time they had apparently not developed personal, social or economic ties in Russia similar to those they had established in Latvia. In short, the Court finds that at the relevant time the applicants were sufficiently integrated into Latvian society.

126. Finally, the Court notes the respondent Government's statement (see paragraph 83 above) that the reason for the different treatment of the applicants' case was the fact that the first applicant had arrived in the country in 1959 as a member of the family of a Soviet military officer – her father and the second applicant's grandfather. The decisive element was therefore not the applicants' current family situation – that is, their being, respectively, the wife and daughter of Nikolay Slivenko, a retired Russian military officer who had left Latvia more than two years before the measures were enforced against the applicants – but their family history, that is, the fact of their being, respectively, the daughter and granddaughter of a former Soviet military officer.

127. However, the first applicant's father and the second applicant's grandfather had retired from the military as long ago as 1986. As this was long before the cut-off date provided for in the third paragraph of Article 2 of the treaty, he was not himself subject to the obligation to leave pursuant to the treaty, and there were no formal obstacles to prevent him and his wife from becoming permanent residents of Latvia as “ex-USSR citizens”. In fact, they remained in the country even after the applicants' removal. The Court is unable to accept that the applicants could be regarded as endangering the national security of Latvia by reason of belonging to the family of the first applicant's father, a former Soviet military officer who was not himself deemed to present any such danger.

128. Having regard to all the circumstances, the Court considers that the Latvian authorities overstepped the margin of appreciation enjoyed by the Contracting Parties in such a matter, and that they failed to strike a fair balance between the legitimate aim of the protection of national security and the interest of the protection of the applicants' rights under Article 8. Therefore, the applicants' removal from the territory of Latvia cannot be regarded as having been “necessary in a democratic society”.

129. Accordingly, there has been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention.

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 14 OF THE CONVENTION TAKEN IN CONJUNCTION WITH ARTICLE 8

130. The applicants also alleged a violation of Article 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with Article 8 on account of the difference in the statutory treatment of members of families of Russian military officers who were required to leave Latvia, and that of other Russian-speaking residents of Latvia who as former Soviet citizens could obtain residence in the country.

Article 14 provides:

> "The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in [the] Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status."

A. The parties' submissions

1. The applicants

131. The applicants contended, relying on Article 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with Article 8, that they had been removed from Latvia as members of the Russian-speaking ethnic minority and of the family of a former Russian military officer. They complained that they had thus been subjected to treatment different from that of other Latvian residents having the status of "ex-USSR citizens". In particular, they submitted that the difference in their treatment from that of persons who had been able to obtain the status of "ex-USSR citizens" could not be justified, in view of the fact that the level of their integration into Latvian society had been the same as that of other Russian speakers.

2. The respondent Government

132. The respondent Government denied that there was a difference in treatment on the ground of language or ethnic origin. They also maintained that the difference in statutory treatment regarding the Russian army officers and their families had been justified, as the removal of the foreign military forces and their families from the territory of independent Latvia had been essential for the protection of national security, and therefore justified under the Convention.

B. The third party's comments

133. The Russian Government submitted that the difference in the treatment in Latvia of former Soviet or Russian military officers and their families on the one hand, and of other Russian-speaking residents of Latvia on the other hand, was not justified by Article 14. There was no evidence to show that Nikolay Slivenko or the applicants could have caused any damage to the security, safety, public order, or economic well-being of Latvia. The applicants' removal had been the result of "ethnic cleansing" by the Latvian authorities. The third party further alleged that there was a difference in the statutory treatment of all ethnic Russians in Latvia.

C. The Court's assessment

134. In view of its finding of a violation of Article 8 of the Convention (see paragraph 129 above), the Court considers that it is not necessary to rule on the applicants' complaints under Article 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with Article 8.

III. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 5 § 1 OF THE CONVENTION

135. The applicants complained that their detention on 28-29 October 1998 and the second applicant's detention on 16-17 March 1999 had been arbitrary and unlawful, in breach of Article 5 of the Convention.

The relevant parts of Article 5 § 1 of the Convention read as follows:

> "1. Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law:
> ...
> (f) the lawful arrest or detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorised entry into the country or of a person against whom action is being taken with a view to deportation or extradition."

A. The parties' submissions

1. The applicants

136. The applicants complained that their detention on 28-29 October 1998 and the second applicant's detention on 16-17 March 1999 had breached Article 5 § 1 of the Convention.

137. In regard to both periods of detention, the applicants submitted that the detention had pursued none of the aims referred to in Article 5 § 1 of the Convention. Furthermore, the detention had been arbitrary in that the Latvian authorities had had no reason to suspect that the applicants could have hidden or that they had had no place of residence. In this regard the detention had not complied with domestic law, namely the requirements set out in section 48 of the Aliens Act.

138. As regards their detention on 28-29 October 1998, the applicants submitted that their appeal against the deportation order should have suspended the validity of the order pursuant to Latvian law as from 7 October 1998, and that their detention had thus been contrary to section 40 of the Aliens Act. The applicants also stated that even the Latvian immigration authorities had themselves admitted, by way of the letter of 29 October 1998, that that period of detention had been unlawful within the meaning of domestic law (see paragraph 43 above).

139. The second applicant also complained that her detention on 16-17 March 1999 had been arbitrary and unlawful. She submitted that at the time she had been a minor, but that she had been detained without notification of her parents or other relatives. Moreover, the Latvian authorities had had no right to detain her during that period in view of the fact that minors could not be expelled from Latvia separately from their parents.

2. The respondent Government

140. The respondent Government submitted that the contested periods of detention had been compatible with the provisions of Article 5 § 1 (f) of the Convention as the unlawfulness of the applicants' stay in Latvia had been confirmed by valid decisions of the domestic courts, and there had been a valid deportation order in respect of them. According to the respondent Government, it had not been necessary for the applicants' detention to pursue any of the "legitimate aims" specified by the applicants as the fact remained that at that time deportation proceedings had been in place, thereby warranting the applicants' detention for the purpose of Article 5 § 1 (f) of the Convention.

141. The detention had not been arbitrary as the applicants had been detained in connection with the deportation proceedings based on the provisions of domestic legislation, which had been clear and accessible to them. The applicants had been arrested because the authorities had "reasonable grounds to believe that these persons [would] hide, or that these persons [had no] fixed place of residence". Moreover, the applicants had only been arrested following their repeated failure to comply with the deportation order, and following numerous warnings from the Latvian authorities in this regard.

142. The respondent Government also submitted that sections 40 and 48-5 of the Aliens Act provided that a deportation order became effective once all remedies had been exhausted, that is, once the complaint concerning the lawfulness of the issuing of the deportation order had been dismissed. According to the respondent Government, such a decision validating the deportation order had been taken by the Riga Regional Court on 6 May 1998. Thereafter, the deportation order had been effective, permitting the detention of the applicants.

143. The detention on 28-29 October 1998 and 16-17 March 1999 had been based on valid decisions by the police, taken pursuant to section 48-5 of the Aliens Act and the relevant provisions of the Police Act. The applicants had read and signed the decisions warranting the detention, and had therefore been aware of the reasons for it. The first applicant's appeal of 7 October 1998 against the deportation order had had no suspensive effect on the validity of the order within the meaning of domestic law as her appeal in this connection had already been determined by the courts. The respondent Government concluded that the detention had been compatible with the domestic law.

144. The respondent Government also stated that the applicants' release on 29 October 1998 and the second applicant's release on 17 March 1999 had merely been gestures of good will by the immigration authorities for humanitarian reasons, in view of the state of health of the first applicants' parents and the necessity for the second applicant to finish school. As a result of these considerations the immigration authorities had "suspended the execution of the deportation order".

B. The third party's comments

145. The Russian Government stated that the applicants' detention on 28-29 October 1998 and the second applicant's detention on 16-17 March 1999 had been arbitrary and unlawful in that there had been no court order authorising their detention, and no reason had been indicated by the Latvian authorities to justify the detention. In addition, the detention of the second applicant, a minor, on 16-17 March 1999 had been unlawful in that she had had no legal capacity at the material time, and should not have been expelled or detained separately from the first applicant.

C. The Court's assessment

146. The Court is satisfied that the applicants' detention on the two occasions falls to be examined under Article 5 § 1 (f) of the Convention as detention "with a view to deportation". This provision requires only that "action is being taken with a view to deportation" and it is therefore immaterial, for the purposes of its application, whether the underlying decision to expel can be justified under national or Convention law. However, any deprivation of liberty under Article 5 § 1 (f) will be justified only for as long as deportation proceedings are in progress. If such proceedings are not pursued with due diligence, the detention will cease to be permissible under Article 5 § 1 (f) of the Convention (see Chahal v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 15 November 1996, Reports 1996-V, pp. 1862-63, §§ 112-13). In the present case, it has not been disputed that the applicants' detention, which on both occasions was of very short duration (less than twenty-four hours on 28-29 October 1998 and thirty hours on 16-17 March 1999), was ordered in the context of deportation proceedings against them which were still pending on the relevant dates. Moreover, it cannot be said that these proceedings were not pursued with due diligence by the authorities.

147. There remains the question whether the detention was in each case "lawful" and "in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law". In this connection, the Convention refers essentially to the obligation of the authorities to conform to the substantive and procedural rules of national law, but it requires in addition that any deprivation of liberty should be in keeping with the purpose of Article 5, namely to protect the individual from arbitrariness (see Chahal, cited above, p. 1864, § 118).

148. The police warrants for the applicants' arrest issued on 29 October 1998 and 16 March 1999 (see paragraphs 42 and 45 above) set out both the relevant domestic legal basis for the arrest (namely, section 48-5 of the Aliens Act in each case) and the factual circumstances underlying the suspicion that the applicants were staying in Latvia illegally. The applicants countersigned the warrants, thereby confirming that they had acquainted themselves with the reasons stated therein (see Article 5 § 2 of the Convention).

149. It is true that in a letter of 29 October 1998 the immigration authority informed the police of its view that the applicants' arrest on that date was "premature" in view of the fact that on 7 October 1998 the first applicant had lodged an appeal against the expulsion order (see paragraph 43 above). However, even the existence of certain flaws in a detention order does not necessarily render the concomitant period of detention unlawful within the meaning of Article 5 § 1 (see, mutatis mutandis, Benham v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 10 June 1996, Reports 1996-III, pp. 753-54, §§ 42-47) and this will be true, in particular, if, as in the present case, the putative error is immediately detected and redressed by the release of the persons concerned.

150. Moreover, as the respondent Government have observed, the immigration authority's view may not have been based on a correct interpretation of the applicable domestic law. In fact, on the relevant dates, namely 28-29 October 1998 and 16-17 March 1999, the deportation order issued on 20 August 1996 had already become final by virtue of the Supreme Court's judgment of 29 July 1998, and it was therefore apparent that no further remedies were available to the applicants to prevent their removal from Latvia. It is significant in this regard that the "appeal" of 7 October 1998 was not acted upon by the immigration authority, which instead informed the applicants in a letter, also dated 29 October 1998, that they had to leave the country immediately (see paragraph 44 above).

151. In view of the provisions of sections 40 and 48-5 of the Aliens Act, according to which a deportation order becomes effective once all remedies have been exhausted, the Court considers that neither of the arrest warrants issued by the police against the applicants lacked a statutory basis in domestic law. Moreover, there is no evidence that the police acted in bad faith or arbitrarily when issuing those orders.

152. It follows that the applicants' detention on 28-29 October 1998 and 16-17 March 1999 was ordered "in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law" and that it was "lawful" within the meaning of Article 5 § 1 (f) of the Convention. There has thus been no violation of this provision in the present case.

IV. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 5 § 4 OF THE CONVENTION

153. The applicants further complained that they had not been able to obtain judicial review of their detention, contrary to the requirements of Article 5 § 4 of the Convention, which reads as follows:

> "Everyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful."

A. The parties' submissions

1. The applicants

154. The applicants submitted that the absence of any possibility of applying to a court in order to contest the lawfulness of their detention on 28-29 October 1998 and 16-17 March 1999 had breached Article 5 § 4 of the Convention. In their view, the general possibility of contesting any administrative act in court had not conferred on them the right set forth in Article 5 § 4.

2. The respondent Government

155. The respondent Government submitted, with reference to Fox, Campbell and Hartley v. the United Kingdom (judgment of 30 August 1990, Series A no. 182), that Article 5 § 4 of the Convention was not applicable in cases where detainees had been released before a speedy determination of the lawfulness of the detention could have taken place. In view of the very brief periods of the contested detention, the above provision of the Convention had not been applicable in the present case.

156. The respondent Government further stated that the applicants had in any case had the right to challenge their detention in court, by submitting a complaint under the Code of Civil Procedure (Chapter 24-A), which guaranteed the right to appeal to a court against any administrative act breaching personal rights (see paragraph 62 above). In sum, there had been no violation of Article 5 § 4 in this case. The respondent Government stated that they were unable to find any decision by Latvian courts in which a complaint regarding allegedly unlawful detention in the context of deportation proceedings had been examined by means of the aforementioned procedure. However, in their view, the absence of any such case-law did not disprove the existence of such a remedy in practice.

B. The third party's comments

157. The Russian Government supported the applicants' contention, claiming that Latvian law had provided no possibility for the applicants to contest the lawfulness of their detention in court.

C. The Court's assessment

158. The Court notes that both applicants were detained for a period of less than twenty-four hours on 28-29 October 1998, and the second applicant was detained for a period of thirty hours on 16-17 March 1999. On both occasions the applicants were released speedily before any judicial review of the lawfulness of their detention could have taken place. It is not for the Court to determine in abstracto whether, had this not been so, the scope of the remedies available in Latvia would have satisfied the requirements of Article 5 § 4 of the Convention. The Court observes in this context that Article 5 § 4 deals only with those remedies which must be made available during a person's detention with a view to that person obtaining speedy judicial review of the lawfulness of the detention capable of leading, where appropriate, to his or her release. The provision does not deal with other remedies which may serve to review the lawfulness of a period of detention which has already ended, including, in particular, a short-term detention such as in the present case.

159. Accordingly, the Court does not find it necessary to examine the merits of the applicants' complaints under Article 5 § 4 of the Convention (see, mutatis mutandis, Fox, Campbell and Hartley, cited above, pp. 20-21, § 45).

V. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 41 OF THE CONVENTION

160. Article 41 of the Convention provides:

> "If the Court finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. Damage

161. The applicants claimed 400,000 euros (EUR) for non-pecuniary damage as a result of their enforced removal from Latvia, which they considered their motherland. They alleged that the immigration and other authorities had treated them particularly harshly and severely, as was shown especially by their detention, and that such treatment justified the amount of compensation they claimed for non-pecuniary damage.

162. The applicants also alleged that they had suffered certain pecuniary damage, namely the loss of earning opportunities in Latvia, and that their property had been taken away by the Latvian authorities. The applicants stated that they were unable to submit any documents in support of their claim for compensation in respect of pecuniary damage as all the relevant documents had been left behind in Latvia. Therefore, the applicants specified no particular sum in regard to this claim.

163. The respondent Government considered the claims to be exorbitant.

164. The third party supported the applicants' claims.

165. The Court has established a breach of Article 8 of the Convention on account of the applicants' removal from Latvia only as regards their right to respect for their private life and their home, but not in relation to any disturbance of their family life. It has furthermore found no violation of Article 5 of the Convention.

166. As to the applicants' claim for compensation in respect of pecuniary damage, the Court notes that they have not specified the amount which they claim under this head, nor have they provided any details concerning the property allegedly lost and the loss of earnings claimed. In any event, the Court cannot discern a sufficient causal link between the alleged pecuniary damage and the breach of the Convention found above.

167. As regards the applicants' claim for compensation in respect of non-pecuniary damage, the Court considers that they have suffered certain damage as a result of the violation found. Making its assessment on an equitable basis, the Court awards each of the applicants EUR 10,000 under this head.

B. Costs and expenses

168. The Court notes that it has granted the applicants legal aid under the Court's legal-aid scheme for the presentation of the case at the hearing, the submission of the applicants' observations and additional comments, the conduct of the friendly-settlement negotiations and secretarial expenses. The applicants submitted no claim for additional legal expenses. Accordingly, the Court is not required to make an award under this head.

C. Default interest

169. The Court considers it appropriate that the default interest should be based on the marginal lending rate of the European Central Bank, to which should be added three percentage points.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Holds by eleven votes to six that there has been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention;

2. Holds by eleven votes to six that it is not necessary to deal separately with the applicants' complaints under Article 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with Article 8;

3. Holds by sixteen votes to one that there has been no violation of Article 5 § 1 of the Convention;

4. Holds unanimously that it is not required to deal with the merits of the applicants' complaint under Article 5 § 4 of the Convention;

5. Holds by eleven votes to six:
(a) that the respondent State is to pay each of the applicants, within three months, EUR 10,000 (ten thousand euros) for non-pecuniary damage, plus any tax that may be chargeable on the amount by the respondent State;
(b) that from the expiry of the above-mentioned three months until settlement simple interest shall be payable on the above amounts at a rate equal to the marginal lending rate of the European Central Bank during the default period plus three percentage points;

6. Dismisses unanimously the remainder of the applicants' claims for just satisfaction.

PARTLY CONCURRING AND PARTLY DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE KOVLER

(Translation)

1. As regards Article 8 of the Convention

Although I share the majority's opinion that there has been a violation of Article 8 § 1 of the Convention, I should nevertheless like to clarify my position on the alleged interference with the applicants' "family life", a complaint which the Court has dismissed in its reasoning.

In my humble opinion, in paragraph 97 of its judgment the Court has narrowed the concept of "family life" by taking it to cover ties within the "core family" only. In other words, the Court has opted for the traditional concept of a family based on the conjugal covenant – that is to say, a conjugal family consisting of a father, a mother and their children below the age of majority, while adult children and grandparents are excluded from the circle. That might be correct within the strict legal meaning of the term as used by European countries in their civil legislation, but the manner in which the Court has construed Article 8 § 1 in its case-law opens up other horizons by placing the emphasis on broader family ties.

In the actual text of the Marckx judgment cited in the instant case, the Court observed that " 'family life', within the meaning of Article 8, includes at least the ties between near relatives, for instance those between grandparents and grandchildren, since such relatives may play a considerable part in family life" and concluded that " 'respect' for a family life so understood implies an obligation for the State to act in a manner calculated to allow these ties to develop normally" (see Marckx v. Belgium, judgment of 13 June 1979, Series A no. 31, p. 21, § 45; see also Scozzari and Giunta v. Italy [GC], nos. 39221/98 and 41963/98, § 221, ECHR 2000-VIII). To put it another way, the Court could at least have made a more careful distinction between the "family" in the strict legal sense of the term and the broader concept of "family life" set out in Marckx.

Accordingly, the assertion in the present judgment that "the existence of 'family life' could not be relied on by the applicants in relation to the first applicant's elderly parents, adults who did not belong to the core family" departs from the case-law referred to above and does not take into account the sociological and human aspects of contemporary European families (I am deliberately leaving aside Muslim and African families since my reasoning relates solely to the geographical area within the Court's jurisdiction). Reference may be made, for example, to the Littré Dictionnaire de la langue française, which defines "famille" ("family") as "l'ensemble des individus de même sang qui vivent les uns à côté des autres" ("a group of persons related by blood who live together"). Even if that concept is not necessarily a legal one, it reflects the perception of those subject to our courts' jurisdiction.

The restrictive concept of a conjugal family (known as a “nuclear family” in legal anthropology) is becoming obsolete in the light of the obvious changes reflected in family legislation recently enacted in a number of European States. At the same time, the tradition of the “extended family”, so strong in east and southern European countries, is enshrined in those countries' basic laws. For example, the Constitution of the Russian Federation – the State of which the applicants are now nationals – provides: “Children over 18 years of age who are able to work shall provide for their parents who are unfit for work” (Article 38 § 3). There are similar provisions in the Constitutions of Ukraine (Article 51 § 2), Moldova (Article 48 § 4) and other countries. This means that in those countries the tradition of helping one's elderly parents is firmly established as a moral imperative written into the Constitution. Those were essentially the considerations guiding the applicants in their ultimately unsuccessful request to the Latvian authorities not to separate them from their elderly, sick ascendants. “Family life” was plainly inconceivable for them if they were denied the possibility of looking after those relatives. What could be more natural or more humane?

It follows, in my opinion, that the applicants' removal amounted to unjustified interference not only with their “private life” and “home” but also, and above all, with their “family life”.

2. As regards Article 5 § 1 of the Convention

I regret that I am unable to agree with the opinion of the majority that there has been no violation of Article 5 § 1 of the Convention in the present case.

I would not have had any complaints about the measures taken to extradite the two applicants, including their arrest, if the Court had not held that their removal from the territory of Latvia had not been “necessary in a democratic society” (see paragraph 128 of the judgment). In the light of the finding of a violation of Article 8 of the Convention, the deportation proceedings, which are covered by Article 5 § 1 (f), are extremely hard to justify in themselves.

While deportation proceedings will often justify depriving a person of his or her liberty on the basis of Article 5 § 1 (f), such a deprivation of liberty must comply with the principle of the “lawfulness” of detention with a view to deportation (see, among other authorities, Chahal v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 15 November 1996, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1996-V, p. 1864, § 118); in other words, the individual must be protected from arbitrariness. In my opinion, that requirement is especially pressing in the case of women, one of whom was a minor.

In general, "... under Article 5 of the Convention any deprivation of liberty must be 'lawful', which includes a requirement that it must be effected 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law'. On this point, the Convention essentially refers to national law and lays down an obligation to comply with its substantive and procedural provisions" (see Witold Litwa v. Poland, no. 26629/95, § 72, ECHR 2000-III). In the present case the representative of the national authorities stated in a letter to the immigration police that the applicants' arrest on 28 October 1998 had been "premature" (see paragraph 43 of the judgment). The Court accepted the respondent Government's comments that "the immigration authority's view may not have been based on a correct interpretation of the applicable domestic law", which in my opinion does not render the applicants' arrest entirely "lawful". The conduct of the two women, who countersigned the warrants for their arrest, proves that they had no intention of absconding or hiding. Seeing that they had a fixed place of residence until they left the country, there were no valid grounds on which the restrictions imposed on them could be justified as being necessary in a democratic society.

The detention of the second applicant (who at the material time had not reached the age of majority) in a camp outside the city on 16-17 March 1999 was even less "lawful" because the respondent Government failed to show that her arrest satisfied the requirements of section 48-5 of the Aliens Act, the likelihood of her "hiding" being more than illusory. It would be illogical to make a "gesture of good will" by releasing a detainee if there really were grounds for believing that she would attempt to hide. Accordingly, the procedure followed, which had no sound basis in the provisions of section 48-5 of the Act, was not "prescribed by law". The second applicant's arrest cannot have been anything other than an act of intimidation designed to exert psychological pressure on her and to hasten the applicants' departure. Moreover, at the time of her arrest the girl did not have the opportunity to contact a lawyer, or at least her mother, and was forcibly led away into the unknown.

Those are the considerations that have led me to conclude that there has been a violation of Article 5 § 1.

JOINT DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGES WILDHABER, RESS, Sir Nicolas BRATZA, CABRAL BARRETO, GREVE AND MARUSTE

1. We are unable to agree with the majority of the Court that the expulsion of the present applicants from Latvia gave rise to a violation of Article 8 of the Convention.

2. We fully share the view of the majority not only that the Latvian-Russian treaty of 30 April 1994 on the withdrawal of the Russian troops from Latvia served a legitimate aim in terms of Article 8 of the Convention, but also that the fact that the treaty provided for the withdrawal of all military officers who after 28 January 1992 had been placed under Russian jurisdiction, and that it further obliged their families to leave the country, was not in itself objectionable from the point of view of the Convention. We also endorse the view that, in so far as the withdrawal of the Russian troops interfered with the private life and home of the persons concerned, such interference would not normally appear disproportionate, having regard to the conditions of service of military officers; the continued presence of servicemen of a foreign army, with their families, may, as the judgment points out, be seen as incompatible with the sovereignty of an independent State and as a threat to national security ,and the public interest in their removal from the territory will normally outweigh the individual's interest in staying. All these reasons taken together justified in our view a finding of no violation.

3. Where we therefore fundamentally differ from the majority is in their conclusion that the specific circumstances of the applicants' case were such as to render the removal measures disproportionate and unjustified in terms of Article 8 of the Convention.

4. We note at the outset the specific historical context and purpose for which the treaty was signed, namely the elimination of the consequences of the Soviet rule of Latvia. In the preamble of the treaty both parties to the agreement – Latvia and Russia – accepted that the withdrawal of the Russian troops was intended “to eradicate the negative consequences of their common history” (see paragraph 64 of the judgment). The legitimacy of this purpose of the treaty is, in our view, of foremost importance in assessing the justification for an interference with the rights of individual members of the armed forces and of their families, who were subject to removal from the country under the treaty.

It is also significant to note that the treaty itself did not impose on the Latvian authorities an obligation to justify each measure taken by reference to the actual danger posed to national security by the specific individual concerned, particularly in relation to non-military family members. General schemes such as the present one for the withdrawal of foreign troops and their families do not easily accommodate procedures of individual, particularised justification on the merits of each and every case (see, mutatis mutandis, James and Others v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 21 February 1986, Series A no. 98, pp. 41-42, § 68). In our view the approach of defining in the governing instrument the broad categories of troops, and the accompanying members of their family, to be withdrawn without reference to their personal history strikes the requisite fair balance between the competing interests of the individual and the community.

5. In finding that such a balance was not struck in the present case, the majority of the Court lay emphasis on a number of features of the case. In particular, reliance is placed on the fact

(i) that the applicants were members of the family of a retired military officer and that the interests of national security should carry correspondingly less weight than in the case of serving officers;

(ii) that the evidence indicated that 900 persons were able to legalise their stay in Latvia, notwithstanding their status as relatives of Russian military officers required to leave, thus showing that the Latvian authorities were not of the opinion that the treaty's provisions had to be applied without exceptions;

(iii) that no allegation had been made in the present case that the applicants presented a specific danger to national security or public order, the public interest being perceived in abstract terms underlying the legal distinctions made in domestic law;

(iv) that, at the time of their removal from Latvia, the applicants were sufficiently integrated into Latvian society, having developed personal, social and economic ties in the country unrelated to their status as relatives of Soviet (and later Russian) military officers;

(v) that the decisive element in the different treatment of the applicants was not their current family situation but the fact of their being the daughter and granddaughter of a former Soviet military officer, who had retired in 1986 and who remained in the country even after the applicants' removal: the applicants could not be regarded as endangering national security by reason of belonging to a family of someone who was not himself deemed to present any such danger.

6. We regret that we do not find that these factors, whether considered individually or in combination, are such as to justify the conclusion that the Latvian authorities failed to strike a fair balance in requiring the removal of the applicants from the territory.

7. As to the first of the factors relied on, the majority have already found that the retrospective character of the treaty so as to include those who had been discharged from the armed forces prior to the entry into force of that treaty was not incompatible with the requirements of the Convention, even though such persons had no active military role at the time of their removal and could be said to pose less of an individual threat to national security. The inclusion of close relatives of members of the armed forces covered by the treaty, whether still in active service or in retirement, seems to us to be equally justified in terms of the Convention, even though the vast majority of family members, taken individually, would not pose a danger to national security. Having regard to the legitimate aim pursued by the treaty – namely, the repatriation of the totality of a foreign army, including both military personnel and dependants – Article 8 cannot in our view be interpreted as requiring that the treaty be applied in such a manner that close relatives who had resided in Latvia for a considerable time, thereby establishing a home and a private life there, could only be expelled if they personally could be shown to represent a threat to the national security of Latvia. Such an interpretation would undermine the effective implementation of the treaty since, by its very nature, the condition of actual danger to territorial security will hardly ever be satisfied in relation to family members. Once the legitimacy of including family members in the programme of withdrawal has been recognised, we find it difficult to accept that more importance must be attached to the private interests of family members of recently retired officers than to those of officers still in active service.

8. The majority of the Court rely on the fact that, after their discharge from the armed forces, a requirement to move as part of the general conditions of military service will normally no longer apply to military officers and their families. While this is true, the present case is concerned not with a reposting of military officers and their families in accordance with the general conditions of service, but rather with the implementation of the terms of an international treaty, designed to secure the withdrawal of an imposed and long-standing military presence from a foreign territory. In this regard, we would note that the treaty arrangements themselves endeavoured to take account of the family life of the persons concerned, by treating the family as a unit, with the Russian Federation undertaking to accept the whole family within its territory, irrespective of the origin or nationality of the individual members of the family.

9. The fact that in some 900 cases the Latvian authorities had allowed a derogation from the obligation under the treaty to leave the country does not in our view serve to reinforce the applicants' case. The beneficiaries of these derogations were all either Latvian citizens or close relatives of Latvian citizens, and the decisions had not been based on any consideration as to whether each person concerned presented a specific danger to the national security of Latvia (see paragraphs 57 and 85 of the judgment). Furthermore, as regards Latvian citizens, a derogation of this kind was indeed required by the Convention, since their expulsion would have contravened Article 3 of Protocol No. 4 to the Convention. The applicants, in contrast, had no such connection with Latvia. The refusal to grant them permanent residential status in Latvia has been explained by the respondent Government as being due to their dual affiliation to families of military officers: the first applicant came to the country in 1959 as the daughter of a Soviet military officer then in active service; in 1980 she married another Soviet military officer who had come to Latvia on active service and who later continued to serve in the Russian armed forces stationed in Latvia after that country had regained its independence. The sole reason for the residence of the two applicants in Latvia was thus the presence there of the Soviet armed forces, which with effect from January 1992 became the armed forces of the Russian Federation. That being so, the refusal to grant them a derogation on the grounds of personal hardship was in accordance with the underlying logic of the treaty, which the Court has found to strike a fair balance.

10. It is correctly pointed out in the judgment that the applicants had in the period of their residence in Latvia developed strong links with the country. However, in deciding whether these links were such as to qualify the applicants for special treatment under the treaty, we consider that the Latvian authorities were entitled also to take into account the significant personal ties which the applicants had with Russia. In this connection we would note that the applicants were of Russian national origin and Russian-speaking, attended Russian-speaking educational establishments, and eventually were able to become Russian citizens. The first applicant's husband became a Russian citizen while he was still living in Latvia, and had moved to Russia by the time of the events complained of by the applicants (see paragraphs 21 and 33 of the judgment). From late 1994 onwards, there was also accommodation available for the family in Kursk in Russia (see paragraphs 28, 37 and 46 of the judgment) and it has not been submitted that the applicants have ultimately been unable to pursue any personal, educational or employment activities in Russia. Therefore, while their personal, social and economic ties with Latvia cannot be denied, it also appears that the applicants had equally significant ties of that nature in Russia (see Dalia v. France, judgment of 19 February 1998, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1998-I, pp. 91-92, § 53; see also C. v. Belgium, judgment of 7 August 1996, Reports 1996-III, p. 924, § 34).

11. In these circumstances, we are unable to conclude that the Latvian authorities overstepped the margin of appreciation afforded to them under Article 8 of the Convention in the particular context of the withdrawal of the Russian armed forces from the territory of Latvia after almost fifty years of Soviet presence there. The Latvian authorities were in our view entitled to consider that the impugned interference with the applicants' right to respect for their private life and their home was “necessary in a democratic society”.

12. In view of this finding, it is necessary to consider the further contention of the applicants that there has been a violation of Article 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with Article 8 on account of the difference in the statutory treatment of members of families of Russian military officers who were required to leave Latvia and that of other

Russian-speaking residents of Latvia, who as former Soviet citizens could obtain residence in the country.

13. According to the Court's case-law, a difference of treatment is discriminatory for the purposes of Article 14 if it "has no objective and reasonable justification", that is if it does not pursue a "legitimate aim" or if there is not a "reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised". The Contracting States enjoy a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justify a different treatment (see, among other authorities, Van Raalte v. the Netherlands, judgment of 21 February 1997, Reports 1997-I, p.186, § 39).

14. The applicants asserted that their removal disclosed discrimination on two grounds – their belonging to the Russian-speaking minority, and their belonging to the family of a Russian military officer. We find the applicants' claim that they were discriminated against as Russian speakers to be unsubstantiated. Indeed, a number of other Russian-speaking persons were in fact able to legalise their stay in Latvia. The distinction made in regard to the applicants by the Latvian authorities was not based on their ethnic origin, but on their dual affiliation with families of military officers, one of whom was a member of the Russian armed forces subject to withdrawal under the 1994 treaty. For the reasons already given in examining the complaint under Article 8 itself, these elements could in our view reasonably be taken into account to justify the imposition of the impugned measures to remove the applicants from the territory of Latvia.

15. For the same reasons, we find that the distinction made in the present case on the basis of the applicants' status – that is, the distinction made in the relevant legal provisions and then in the application of those provisions to the applicants – had an objective and reasonable justification and thus did not amount to discrimination within the meaning of Article 14 of the Convention.

16. There has, thus, in our view, been no breach of Article 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with Article 8.

SEPARATE DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE MARUSTE

While sharing the views expressed in the joint dissenting opinion, I would like to express here some more reasons why I am unable to agree with the majority.

Firstly, I think the case is particular in its historical background. From that background flow consequences under constitutional and international law which cannot be disregarded. It is well known and recognised in international law that the Baltic States, including Latvia, lost their independence on the basis of the "Hitler-Stalin Pact" between Nazi Germany and the USSR, which actually refers to the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, or the secret protocols that were appended to the non-aggression treaty between the Soviet Union and Germany, which was signed on 23 August 1939. The result of this secret agreement was that Eastern Europe was divided into two spheres of influence, leaving the Baltic States, including Latvia, in the Soviet Union's sphere of interests. This was followed by Soviet threats of force in the form of an ultimatum addressed in 1940 to the Baltic States, including Latvia, in which the USSR demanded a change of government and the entry of Soviet armed forces (in addition to those already stationed in Soviet military bases). The actual entry of military forces and the change of government took place in June 1940.

According to Article 42 of the Hague Regulations on the Laws and Customs of War on Land, a territory is considered occupied "when it is actually placed under the authority of the hostile army". By way of comparison, the Nuremberg Military Tribunal included the ultimatum delivered by Germany to Austria in 1938 among the acts to be judged as "crimes against peace" within the meaning of the 1945 London Charter.

The above actions by the Soviet Union were not recognised by a majority of the international democratic community, including the European Parliament and the Council of Europe. The latter, for example, expressed its attitude in Resolution 189 (1960) on the situation in the Baltic States, noting, "on the twentieth anniversary of the occupation and forcible incorporation into the Soviet Union of the three European States of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania" that "this illegal annexation took place without any genuine reference to the wishes of the people".

It has been an established principle in international law which is now also enshrined in the Statute of the International Criminal Court (Article 8) that the transfer, directly or indirectly, by the occupying power of parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies is not allowed. Indeed, according to the same Article 8, it is a war crime.

According to generally recognised principles of international law, every internationally wrongful act of a State entails international responsibility and gives rise to the obligation of that State to restore the status quo ante. Consequently, the restoration of the independence of the Baltic States on the basis of legal continuity and the withdrawal of the Soviet/Russian troops has to be regarded as redress for a historical injustice. This aim was also stressed in the preamble of the Latvian-Russian treaty of 30 April 1994 on the withdrawal of troops, where it was mentioned that by signing the treaty the parties wished to "eradicate the negative consequences of their common history" (see paragraph 64 of the judgment). Thus, the treaty requirement of the withdrawal of military servicemen and their family members (second paragraph of Article 2 of the treaty) is fully in conformity with the principles of international law. Consequently, the aim pursued by the Latvian-Russian treaty of 30 April 1994 was fully legitimate for the purposes of the Convention (see paragraph 111 of the judgment). The Court rightly accepted that the withdrawal of the armed forces of one independent State from the territory of another constitutes an appropriate way of dealing with the various political, social and economic problems arising from that historical injustice.

As Latvia had regained its independence from the USSR in 1991 and the Russian Federation had assumed jurisdiction over the armed forces of the former Soviet Union with effect from 28 January 1992, the scheme established under the treaty covered all military officers together with their families who had been serving in the Russian armed forces in Latvia at that moment, even if they had been discharged prior to the entry into force of the treaty. The programme of withdrawal was not in itself such as to bring the measures ordered in respect of the two applicants outside the margin of appreciation available to the Latvian authorities for achieving the legitimate objective they pursued. It is to be noted that the treaty itself did not impose on the Latvian authorities an obligation to justify each measure taken by reference to the actual danger which the specific individual concerned posed to national security, particularly in relation to non-military family members. Moreover, the list of those to be removed, according to the terms of the treaty, was drawn up not by the Latvian, but by the Russian side. In these circumstances the responsibility for the removal belongs at least to both parties to the treaty and not only to the Latvian side. It must also be noted that, although this was contested by the applicants and the third party, it was the Latvian courts which found that the first applicant had not presented all the necessary information (in the 1995 registration form) about her husband's (military) occupation. The document was known to the applicants, but they never challenged its validity before the domestic courts. They and the third party did so only at a later stage.

Finally, from late 1994 onwards a large-scale Western financial-aid scheme was introduced to accommodate returning Soviet/Russian military personnel, under which accommodation, as decided by the Latvian Supreme Court, was made available to the Slivenko family also. Whereas I understand that for the majority the award of compensation to the applicants was the logical consequence of finding a violation, in the light of this aid scheme and taking into account the historical context, in which most of those who suffered injustices were never able to get compensation for either pecuniary or non-pecuniary damage, it is hard for me to agree with the financial compensation awarded by the Court.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

COURT (CHAMBER)

CASE OF STJERNA v. FINLAND

(Application no. 18131/91)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

25 November 1994

In the case of Stjerna v. Finland[*],

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") and the relevant provisions of Rules of Court A[], as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr R. RYSSDAL, President,
Mr F. MATSCHER,
Mr L.-E. PETTITI,
Mr B. WALSH,
Mr C. RUSSO,
Mr I. FOIGHEL,
Mr R. PEKKANEN,
Mr J.M. MORENILLA,
Mr L. WILDHABER,

and also of Mr H. PETZOLD, Acting Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 21 June and 24 October 1994,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court on 9 September 1993 by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission"), within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 para. 1 and Article 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47) of the Convention. It originated in an application (no. 18131/91) against the Republic of Finland lodged with the Commission under Article 25 (art. 25) by a Finnish national, Mr Stjerna, on 11 March 1991.

The Commission's request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) and to the declaration whereby Finland recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46). The object of the request was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Articles 8 and 14 (art. 8, art. 14) of the Convention.

[*] The case is numbered 38/1993/433/512. The first number is the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court in the relevant year (second number). The last two numbers indicate the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court since its creation and on the list of the corresponding originating applications to the Commission.

[] Rules A apply to all cases referred to the Court before the entry into force of Protocol No. 9 (P9) and thereafter only to cases concerning States not bound by that Protocol (P9). They correspond to the Rules that came into force on 1 January 1983, as amended several times subsequently.

2. In response to the enquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 para. 3 (d) of Rules of Court A, the applicant stated that he wished to take part in the proceedings and designated the lawyer who would represent him (Rule 30).

3. The Chamber to be constituted included ex officio Mr R. Pekkanen, the elected judge of Finnish nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr R. Ryssdal, the President of the Court (Rule 21 para. 3 (b)). On 24 September 1993, in the presence of the Registrar, the President drew by lot the names of the other seven members, namely Mr F. Matscher, Mr L.-E. Pettiti, Mr N. Valticos, Mr B. Walsh, Mr I. Foighel, Mr J.M. Morenilla and Mr L. Wildhaber (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 para. 4) (art. 43). Subsequently Mr C. Russo, substitute judge, replaced Mr Valticos, who was unable to take part in the further consideration of the case (Rules 22 para. 1 and 24 para. 1).

4. As President of the Chamber (Rule 21 para. 5), Mr Ryssdal, acting through the Registrar, consulted the Agent of the Government of Finland ("the Government"), the applicant's lawyer and the Delegate of the Commission on the organisation of the proceedings (Rules 37 para. 1 and 38). Pursuant to the order made in consequence, the Registrar received the applicant's and the Government's memorials on 14 March 1994. In a letter of 7 April 1994 the Secretary to the Commission indicated that the Delegate did not wish to reply in writing.

5. On 25 March 1994 the President granted a request from the applicant not to disclose his first name.

6. Between 4 and 9 May 1994 the Commission produced various documents, as requested by the Registrar on the President's instructions.

7. In accordance with the President's decision, the hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 25 May 1994. The Court had held a preparatory meeting beforehand.

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government

Mr T. GRÖNBERG, Ambassador,
Director General for Legal Affairs, Ministry for Foreign Affairs, Agent,
Mr A. KOSONEN, Legal Adviser,
Ministry for Foreign Affairs, Co-Agent,
Mr Y. MÄKELÄ, Legal Adviser,
Ministry of Justice, Adviser;

- for the Commission

Mr H. DANELIUS, Delegate;

- for the applicant

Mr M. FREDMAN, asianajaja, advokat, Counsel.

The Court heard addresses by Mr Grönberg, Mr Danelius and Mr Fredman, and also the reply to a question put by one of its members.

AS TO THE FACTS

I. PARTICULAR CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

8. Mr Stjerna is a Finnish national and lives in Helsinki.

9. On 28 March 1989 he applied to the County Administrative Board (lääninhallitus, länsstyrelsen) of Uusimaa for permission to change his surname Stjerna (pronounced "Shaerna") to "Tawaststjerna". He maintained that his ancestors had used the proposed name and that he and other members of the Stjerna family had always felt it an injustice only to bear half of the original name. Moreover, the use of his surname gave rise to practical difficulties as it was an old Swedish form, was not well known and was difficult to pronounce. This meant that it was frequently misspelt (as "Stjärna", "Säärna", "Saarna", "Seerna", "Sierna", "Tierna" and "Stjerba").

10. In an opinion of 19 April 1989 submitted to the County Administrative Board, the Advisory Committee on Names (nimilautakunta, nämnden för namnärenden) opposed the change. It had not been shown that the proposed name had been used by his ancestors because the ancestor in question, Mr Fredrik Stjerna, had been born out of wedlock. The ancestors cited were too far back to satisfy the requirements of section 10 (2) of the 1985 Surnames Act (sukunimilaki 694/85, släktnamnslagen 694/85, see paragraph 17 below).

11. In the course of an exchange of views with the Advisory Committee on Names, on 14 June 1989 the applicant stated that his name had given rise to a pejorative nickname "kirnu" in Finnish derived from the Swedish word "kärna" ("churn"). Moreover, in his view, the remoteness of the ancestors in question could not be a ground for refusing to authorise the name change. Referring to a genealogical report, he disputed the allegation that Mr Magnus Fredrik Tawaststjerna was not the father of Mr Fredrik Stjerna.

12. On 25 October 1989 the Advisory Committee on Names recommended that the applicant’s request be rejected; it considered the proposed name inappropriate. Although Mr Stjerna had cited a telling argument in support of his request - the obscure nature of his name - and was a descendant of a person named Tavaststjerna, his ancestor, who had died in 1773, was very far back and the suggested name would result in sources of inconvenience similar to his present name.

13. On 21 November 1989 the applicant told the Advisory Committee on Names that his mail was delayed as a result of his name being misspelt. In line with the spelling recommended by one of its members, he asked for his name to be changed to "Tavaststjerna" (as opposed to Tawaststjerna).

14. On 12 February 1990, on the basis of section 10 (2) of the Surnames Act, the County Administrative Board rejected the applicant’s request for permission to change his name. It was not satisfied that the proposed name had been used by his ancestors in such a way as to become "established", since the first one to bear his current name had been born out of wedlock. Since the proposed name had been used by ancestors who were very far back, it would not be appropriate to change his name to theirs.

15. The applicant appealed from the County Administrative Board's decision to the Supreme Administrative Court (korkein hallinto-oikeus, högsta förvaltningsdomstolen), which, in a judgment of 14 November 1990, upheld the Board's decision by four votes to one. It observed that it emerged from the written evidence that the applicant's ancestor, Mr Fredrik Stjerna was born in 1764 and had been the illegitimate son of Mr Magnus Fredrik Tavaststjerna. For this reason alone the proposed name could not be considered to have been the "established" name of the applicant's ancestors as required by section 10 (2) of the Surnames Act. In the light of this and the reasoning given by the Board there was no ground for altering the latter's decision.

In the opinion of the minority the name Tavaststjerna had been the "established" name of the applicant's ancestors. The fact that Fredrik Stjerna, the first of his ancestors to be called Stjerna, was born out of wedlock was irrelevant. In view of the inconvenience which the present surname was causing the applicant, the County Administrative Board's decision should be quashed and the case referred back to it.

16. According to the Government a Finnish surname guide of 1984 listed approximately 7,000 which had fallen out of use and, in addition, some 2,000 names based on common Finnish nouns and place names.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW AND COMPARATIVE LAW

A. Finnish legislation

1. Name changes

17. Section 10 of the Surnames Act provided that a surname may be changed on the condition that the person concerned could show:

> "(1) that the use of his current surname causes inconvenience because of its foreign origin, its meaning in common usage or its common occurrence or for any other reason;
> (2) that the proposed surname has previously been used by himself or in an established way (vakiintuneesti, hävdvunnen) by his ancestors and the name change may be considered appropriate; or
> (3) that a change of surname may be considered justified by changed circumstances or by any other special reasons."

18. Section 11 of the 1985 Act contained provisions on obstacles of a general character to authorising changes of surname. A new surname was not to be improper or otherwise one the use of which would be manifestly inconvenient. Save in particular circumstances, the new surname should not by virtue of its form or spelling be incompatible with domestic name practice (paragraph 1); or be a name very commonly used as a surname (paragraph 2); or be commonly used as a christian name (paragraph 3).

A surname which was well known as the name of a particular Finnish or foreign family could not, unless there were particular reasons for doing so, be approved as a new surname (section 12 (1)).

19. Pursuant to section 13 (2) (1) (which contained provisions on "particular reasons for permitting a new surname"), a new surname falling foul of the restrictions in sections 11 (2) or 12 could nevertheless be permitted if the person requesting the name change showed that the surname in question had previously and lawfully been used by him or his ancestors.

20. If the County Administrative Board, after the Advisory Committee on Names had given its opinion, found no grounds under sections 10 to 13 for refusing to authorise an application for a change of surname, the application was published in the Official Gazette (section 18).

21. A person who claimed that the granting of an application for a change of surname would be incompatible with section 12 and would infringe his or her rights could, under section 19, file an objection with the County Administrative Board within thirty days from the date of the above-mentioned publication. An objection submitted after expiry of this time-limit could be taken into account in the examination of the application unless the matter had already been decided.

22. If the County Administrative Board rejected the application, its reasons were to be stated in the decision (section 20 (2)).

A decision on an application for a change of surname was to be notified to the applicant and also to any person who has filed objections under section 19 (section 21) and could be the subject of an appeal by them (section 22) to the Supreme Administrative Court.

23. In 1991 the provisions concerning first names were included by Act 253/91 in the 1985 Surnames Act, which was then retitled the Names Act (nimilaki, namnlagen).

2. Population registration

24. Population registration was effected at national and local level.

Population registration was administered, at national level, by the Population Register Centre (chapter 3, section 8 of the 1970 Act on Population Registers - västökirjalaki 141/69, lag 141/69 om befolkningsböcker) and, at local level, by the evangelical-lutheran and orthodox parishes or, for persons who were not members of such parishes, by the local registration office (chapter 2, sections 3, 6 and 26).

25. The national register, which was updated five times a week, contained the names and personal identity numbers of the persons registered and also other information, making it possible to trace by electronic data processing a person's name and address, even if the name or identity number did not appear on the register. Only public authorities had direct access to the register (see Le système d'information de l'état civil finlandais, Journée internationale de l'état civil, published in 1992 by the Commission internationale de l'état civil - "International Commission on Civil Status").

26. The Centre established a personal identity number for every person registered, consisting of the person's date of birth, an individual number, and a control number (sections 4 and 5 of the 1970 Decree on Population Registers - väestökirja- asetus 198/70, förordning 198/70 om befolkningsböcker).

27. If the County Administrative Board or, on an appeal, the Supreme Administrative Court, authorised a change of name, it had to inform the Centre of the new name (section 8 (1) of the 1991 Names Decree (nimiasetus 254/91, namnförordning 254/91)). The authority which gave permission for the name change had to be specified in the register (section 7 (4) of the 1970 Decree).

28. As from 1 November 1993, the 1970 Act and the 1970 Decree were replaced by the 1993 Act on Population Data (väestötietolaki 507/1993, befolkningsdatalag 507/1993) and the 1993 Decree on Population Data (väestötietoasetus 886/1993, befolkningsdataförordning 886/1993).

B. Comparative law

29. Under the legislation on names in the twelve member States of the International Commission on Civil Status, all members of the Council of Europe, the possibility of a person to change his or her name is subject to certain conditions. In Belgium, Portugal and Turkey, any reason may be invoked in support of a request for a change of name. In France, Germany, Luxembourg and Switzerland the reasons must be convincing ones. In some countries specific reasons are required: for instance that the current name gives rise to pronunciation and spelling difficulties (Austria) or causes legal or social difficulties (Austria and Greece) or is contrary to decency (the Netherlands and Spain), or is ridiculous (Austria, Italy and the Netherlands) or is otherwise contrary to the dignity of the person concerned (Spain) (see the International Commission's Guide pratique international de l'état civil, Paris).

Name changes are noted in population records, at the request of the interested person (Belgium and France) or of a public authority (France), or are done so automatically (the other ten members of the International Commission).

30. Under English law a person is entitled to adopt a surname of his own choosing and to use this name without any restrictions or formalities, except in connection with the practice of some professions (Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed., vol. 35, paras. 1173-76). The new name is valid for purposes of legal identification, may be used in public documents and is entered on the electoral roll (Cossey v. the United Kingdom judgment of 27 September 1990, Series A no. 184, p. 9, para. 16). The United Kingdom has no civil status certificates or equivalent current identity documents (ibid., para. 17). The near absence in English law of formalities governing changes of name has not resulted in a large number of changes (Margaret Killerby, 'Précisions sur le droit anglais du nom', pp. 183-84, in La nouvelle loi sur le nom, Paris, 1988).

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

31. In his application of 11 March 1991 (no. 18131/91) to the Commission, Mr Stjerna complained that the refusal by the Finnish authorities to grant his request for a change of surname violated his right to respect for private life under Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention. He also relied on Article 14 (art. 14) (prohibition of discrimination).

32. On 29 June 1992 the Commission declared the application admissible. In its report of 8 July 1993 (Article 31) (art. 31), the Commission expressed the opinion that there had been no violation of either Article 8 (art. 8) (by twelve votes to nine) or Article 14 in conjunction with Article 8 (art. 14+8) (unanimously). The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the separate opinions contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to this judgment[*].

FINAL SUBMISSIONS TO THE COURT

33. At the hearing on 25 May 1994 the Government invited the Court to hold that, as contended in their memorial, there had been no violation of the Convention in the present case.

The applicant confirmed the submissions set out in his memorial to the effect that the facts of his case gave rise to violations of Article 8 (art. 8) taken alone and together with Article 14 (art. 14+8). He also reiterated his claim for compensation under Article 50 (art. 50).

AS TO THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 8 (art. 8) OF THE CONVENTION

34. The applicant alleged that the refusal by the Finnish authorities to allow him to change his surname to Tavaststjerna, constituted a breach of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention, which reads:

> "1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

35. The Government and the Commission took the contrary view.

A. Scope of the issues before the Court

36. In his application, as declared admissible by the Commission, the applicant claimed that the impugned refusal amounted to a breach of Article 8 (art. 8) under the head of "private life", on account of the fact that his current name gave rise to practical difficulties and a pejorative nickname and in view of his links to the Tavaststjerna family.

Before the Court he further submitted that he wished to change his surname in order to avoid a former colleague who had subjected him to threats and harassment. However, this argument was not raised before the Commission and is in any event unsubstantiated. Accordingly, the Court will limit its examination to the facts of his application as declared admissible by the Commission (see, for instance, the Olsson v. Sweden (no. 2) judgment of 27 November 1992, Series A no. 250, pp. 30-31, para. 75).

B. Applicability of Article 8 (art. 8)

37. The Court notes that Article 8 (art. 8) does not contain any explicit reference to names. Nonetheless, since it constitutes a means of personal identification and a link to a family, an individual’s name does concern his or her private and family life (Burghartz v. Switzerland judgment of 22 February 1994, Series A no. 280-B, p. 28, para. 24). The fact that there may exist a public interest in regulating the use of names is not sufficient to remove the question of a person’s name from the scope of private and family life, which has been construed as including, to a certain degree, the right to establish relationships with others (ibid.).

The subject-matter of the complaint thus falls within the ambit of Article 8 (art. 8).

C. Compliance with Article 8 (art. 8)

38. The refusal of the Finnish authorities to allow the applicant to adopt a specific new surname cannot, in the view of the Court, necessarily be considered an interference in the exercise of his right to respect for his private life, as would have been, for example, an obligation on him to change surname. However, as the Court has held on a number of occasions, although the essential object of Article 8 (art. 8) is to protect the individual against arbitrary interferences by the public authorities with his or her exercise of the right protected, there may in addition be positive obligations inherent in an effective "respect" for private life.

The boundaries between the State's positive and negative obligations under Article 8 (art. 8) do not lend themselves to precise definition. The applicable principles are nonetheless similar. In both contexts regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole (see, for instance, the Keegan v. Ireland judgment of 26 May 1994, Series A no. 290, p. 19, para. 49).

39. Despite the increased use of personal identity numbers in Finland and in other Contracting States, names retain a crucial role in the identification of people. Whilst therefore recognising that there may exist genuine reasons prompting an individual to wish to change his or her name, the Court accepts that legal restrictions on such a possibility may be justified in the public interest; for example in order to ensure accurate population registration or to safeguard the means of personal identification and of linking the bearers of a given name to a family.

In this connection it is to be noted that in a number of Contracting States a request to change one's name must be supported by convincing or specific reasons whereas in other States any reasons may be invoked (see paragraph 29 above) and in one State there are in principle no restrictions (see paragraph 30 above). There is little common ground between the domestic systems of the Convention countries as to the conditions on which a change of name may be legally effected. The Court deduces that in the particular sphere under consideration the Contracting States enjoy a wide margin of appreciation. The Court's task is not to substitute itself for the competent Finnish authorities in determining the most appropriate policy for regulating changes of surnames in Finland, but rather to review under the Convention the decisions that those authorities have taken in the exercise of their power of appreciation (see, for instance, the Hokkanen v. Finland judgment of 23 September 1994, Series A no. 299-A, p. 20, para. 55; and, mutatis mutandis, the Handyside v. the United Kingdom judgment of 7 December 1976, Series A no. 24, p. 23, para. 49).

40. Before the Court the applicant maintained that the use of his current surname caused him inconvenience. It was an old and uncommon Swedish name and, in any case, the Swedish-speaking people in Finland amounted to only some six per cent of the population and resided mainly in the coastal regions. Although Swedish names were not unusual in Finland, his name, starting with a combination of three consonants - "stj" - , was exceptionally difficult for a non-Swedish-speaking Finnish person to spell and pronounce. His mail was delayed as a result of his name being misspelt and the name had given rise to a pejorative nickname: "kirnu" in Finnish, derived from the Swedish word "kärna" ("churn" in English). He argued that decisive weight should be given to the fact that he himself resented these sources of inconvenience. The proposed name, Tavaststjerna, although in many ways similar to Stjerna, would not give rise to the same problems; it was more common and better known in the region in which he lived and could not easily be turned into a pejorative nickname.

Secondly, the applicant reiterated his principal contention to the Finnish authorities, namely that, in line with the Finnish tradition of choosing names, he had opted for a surname borne by a paternal ancestor. Tavaststjerna was the only surname satisfying that tradition and differing from his present surname. The strength of his relationship to the Tavaststjerna family was primarily a matter to be assessed by himself. Particular importance should therefore be attached to the fact that, in his view, the period of approximately one hundred and sixty years between the death of the last ancestor named Tavaststjerna and his own birth was not long enough to sever the bonds linking him to that family and his sense of belonging to it.

The refusal by the Finnish authorities to permit him to change his surname to Tavaststjerna was not aimed at protecting the interests of that family; in any event such considerations were irrelevant since the applicant was a direct descendant of a Tavaststjerna. Nor could the decisions of refusal be justified on the ground of population registration requirements in Finland, as identity numbers are now used for this purpose. In this connection, the applicant argued that the 1985 Act afforded excessive protection to names in use. The refusal meant that he was forced either to continue using his inconvenient surname or to take a new one that he did not like.

41. The Government and the Commission were of the view that the refusal to let him change his surname to Tavaststjerna did not constitute a lack of respect for his right to private life, mainly on the grounds that the inconvenience suffered by the applicant due to his current name was not significant enough and that his connection to the requested name Tavaststjerna was too remote.

42. As to the instances of inconvenience complained of by the applicant, the Court is not satisfied on the evidence adduced before it that the alleged difficulties in the spelling and pronunciation of the name can have been very frequent or any more significant than those experienced by a large number of people in Europe today, where movement of people between countries and language areas is becoming more and more commonplace.

In any event, in the view of the Advisory Committee on Names, the use of the name Tavaststjerna involved similar practical difficulties to those associated with Stjerna (see paragraph 12 above). In this connection the Court considers that the national authorities are in principle better placed to assess the level of inconvenience relating to the use of one name rather than another within their national society and, in the present case, no sufficient grounds have been adduced to justify the Court coming to a conclusion different from that of the Finnish authorities.

Finally, although the applicant's current name may have given rise to a pejorative nickname, this was not a specific feature of his name since many names lend themselves to distortion.

In the light of the foregoing, the Court does not find that the sources of inconvenience the applicant complained of are sufficient to raise an issue of failure to respect private life under paragraph 1 (art. 8-1).

43. As to the applicant's attachment to the proposed name, the Court observes that the last ancestor who bore that name died more than two hundred years before the applicant applied to acquire the name. Notwithstanding the applicant's own feelings about being a descendant of the ancestors in question, the latter lived so far back in time that no significant weight can be given to those links for the purposes of paragraph 1 of Article 8 (art. 8-1).

44. In addition, as pointed out by the Government, had the applicant been willing to invent a new name for himself or identify a name not already in use, he would have had a multitude of possibilities (see paragraph 16 above).

45. In view of these circumstances the Court, like the Commission and the Government, finds that the refusal by the Finnish authorities to allow the applicant to change his surname from Stjerna to Tavaststjerna did not constitute a lack of respect for his private life within the meaning of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention. Accordingly, there has been no violation of that Article (art. 8).

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 14 OF THE CONVENTION TAKEN TOGETHER WITH ARTICLE 8 (art. 14+8)

46. The applicant further alleged that the impugned refusal constituted a breach of Article 14 of the Convention taken together with Article 8 (art. 14+8). Article 14 (art. 14) provides:

> "The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in [the] Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status."

47. The Government and the Commission disagreed.

48. In view of its findings in paragraph 37 above, the Court holds that Article 14 (art. 14) applies to the present case (see, amongst many authorities, the Inze v. Austria judgment of 28 October 1987, Series A no. 126, p. 17, para. 36).

For the purposes of Article 14 (art. 14), a difference of treatment is discriminatory if it has no objective and reasonable justification, that is, if it does not pursue a legitimate aim or if there is not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. The Contracting States enjoy a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justify a different treatment in law (ibid., p.18, para. 41).

49. The applicant complained of the fact that, when rejecting his request for a change of surname, the County Administrative Board had mentioned in its reasoning that Mr Fredrik Stjerna, the first ancestor who bore the applicant’s surname, had been the illegitimate son of Mr Magnus Fredrik Tavaststjerna, the last ancestor to bear the proposed surname. This fact, which was taken from the opinion of the Advisory Committee on Names, was also invoked by the Supreme Administrative Court, as was shown by the opinion of the dissenting judge who dismissed it as irrelevant. The refusal to let him take the name Tavaststjerna was thus based on discriminatory grounds incompatible with Article 14 (art. 14), namely his "social origin, ... birth or other status".

50. According to the Government and the Commission the applicant’s allegation was unsubstantiated; the fact that the ancestor in question had been born out of wedlock had not been decisive for the impugned refusal.

51. The Court is not convinced that the applicant was subjected to discriminatory treatment. The references made in the relevant decisions to the fact that one of his ancestors was born out of wedlock explain why Fredrik Stjerna was not named Tavaststjerna but does not appear to have had any bearing on the impugned refusal. There is nothing to suggest that the Finnish authorities would have arrived at different decisions had the ancestor been a "legitimate" child who had for some other reason taken the name Stjerna.

The reason for refusing his request seems rather to have been the fact that the name Tavaststjerna had not been in use in the applicant's family for more than two hundred years and could not therefore be said to have been in "established" use in the family, a condition for acquisition of a surname under section 10 (2) of the 1985 Act (see paragraphs 15 and 17 above). It is not contended that the latter reason was discriminatory within the meaning of Article 14 (art. 14) and, on the evidence before it, the Court has no cause to hold that it was. In short, the justification advanced by the Government appears objective and reasonable.

Having regard to the above, the Court concludes that there has been no violation of Article 14 taken together with Article 8 (art. 14+8).

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY

1. Holds that Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention is applicable in the present case;

2. Holds that there has been no violation of Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention;

3. Holds that there has been no violation of Article 14 of the Convention taken together with Article 8 (art. 14+8).

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE WILDHABER

Paragraph 38 of the Court's judgment in the instant case reiterates an established but still somewhat incoherent jurisprudence. On a number of occasions the Court has stated that the "essential object" of Article 8 (art. 8) is "to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities"[1]. It has reserved the term "interference" for facts capable of infringing the State's negative obligations. Whenever it has found that an interference in this sense existed, the Court has examined whether the interference could be justified under paragraph 2 of Article 8 (art. 8-2). In addition, the Court has acknowledged that there could be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect for private and family life. The existence of such positive obligations must be evaluated having regard to "the fair balance that has to be struck between the general interest of the community and the interests of the individual"[2]. To this it has added rather vaguely that in the sphere of positive obligations "the aims mentioned in the second paragraph of Article 8 (art. 8-2) may be of a certain relevance"[3]. But the Court has in effect applied only the first paragraph (art. 8-1) in such instances. Moreover, it has stressed that Contracting States enjoy a wide margin of appreciation in the implementation of their positive obligations.

However, the dividing line between negative and positive obligations is not so clear-cut. In the Gaskin case, the refusal by the British authorities to grant a former child in care unrestricted access to child-care records could be considered as a negative interference, whereas a duty on the State to provide such access could arguably be viewed as a positive obligation. In the Cossey case the claim of the applicant, an operated transsexual, was that she should be issued with a fresh birth certificate showing her present sex rather than her sex at the date of birth. The refusal of the United Kingdom to carry out a modification of its system for recording civil status could be analysed either as a negative interference with the applicant's rights or as a violation of the State's positive obligation to adapt its legislation so as to take account of the applicant's situation. The Keegan case against Ireland concerned the placement of a child for adoption without the natural father's knowledge or consent, a measure permitted under Irish law. This state of affairs could be taken as a negative interference with the father's right to respect for his family life or as a failure by Ireland to fulfil a positive obligation to confer a right of guardianship on natural fathers. Again, in the instant case of Stjerna, the refusal by the Finnish authorities to allow the applicant freely to acquire the surname of his ancestors may be perceived as either a negative or a positive interference.

In my view, it would therefore be preferable to construe the notion of "interference" so as to cover facts capable of breaching an obligation incumbent on the State under Article 8 para. 1 (art. 8-1), whether negative or positive. Whenever a so-called positive obligation arises the Court should examine, as in the event of a so-called negative obligation, whether there has been an interference with the right to respect for private and family life under paragraph 1 of Article 8 (art. 8-1), and whether such interference was "in accordance with the law", pursued legitimate aims and was "necessary in a democratic society" within the meaning of paragraph 2 (art. 8-2).

To be sure, this approach would not lead to a different result in the instant case, nor in all likelihood in the vast majority of cases of this kind. It does, however, have the advantage of making it clear that in substance there is no negative/positive dichotomy as regards the State's obligations to ensure respect for applicable private and family life, but rather a striking similarity between the applicable principles[4].

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

COURT (CHAMBER)

CASE OF WEBER v. SWITZERLAND

(Application no. 11034/84)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

22 May 1990

In the Weber case*,

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Court, as a Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mr R. RYSSDAL, President,
Mrs D. BINDSCHEDLER-ROBERT,
Mr B. WALSH,
Mr R. MACDONALD,
Mr C. RUSSO,
Mr J. DE MEYER,
Mr I. FOIGHEL,

and also of Mr M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr H. PETZOLD, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 26 January and 25 April 1990,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") on 12 April 1989 and by the Government of the Swiss Confederation ("the Government") on 3 July 1989, within the three-month period laid down by Article 32 § 1 and Article 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47) of the Convention. It originated in an application (no. 11034/84) against Switzerland lodged with the Commission under Article 25 (art. 25) by a national of that State, Mr Franz Weber, on 15 May 1984.

The Commission's request referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art. 48) of the Convention and to the declaration whereby Switzerland recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46); the Government's application referred to Articles 45, 47 and 48 (art. 45, art. 47, art. 48). The object of the request and of the application was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the

* Note by the Registrar: The case is numbered 10/1989/170/226. The first number is the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court in the relevant year (second number). The last two numbers indicate the case's position on the list of cases referred to the Court since its creation and on the list of the corresponding originating applications to the Commission.

 Note by the Registrar: The amendments to the Rules of Court which entered into force on 1 April 1989 are applicable to this case.

respondent State of its obligations under Article 6 § 1 and Article 10 (art. 6-1, art. 10).

2. In response to the enquiry made in accordance with Rule 33 § 3 (d) of the Rules of Court, the applicant stated that he wished to take part in the proceedings and designated the lawyer who would represent him (Rule 30).

3. The Chamber to be constituted included ex officio Mrs D. Bindschedler-Robert, the elected judge of Swiss nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr R. Ryssdal, the President of the Court (Rule 21 § 3 (b)). On 29 April 1989, in the presence of the Registrar, the President drew by lot the names of the other five members, namely Mr B. Walsh, Mr R. Macdonald, Mr C. Russo, Mr J. De Meyer and Mr I. Foighel (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 § 4) (art. 43).

4. Mr Ryssdal assumed the office of President of the Chamber (Rule 21 § 5) and, through the Registrar, consulted the Agent of the Government, the Delegate of the Commission and the lawyer for the applicant on the need for a written procedure (Rule 37 § 1). In accordance with the order made in consequence on 6 July 1989, the registry received the Government's memorial, on 13 October, and the applicant's memorial, on the 16th.

In a letter he received on 13 December 1989 the Registrar was informed by the Secretary to the Commission that the Delegate would submit his observations at the hearing.

5. Having consulted, through the Registrar, those who would be appearing before the Court, the President directed on 6 July 1989 that the oral proceedings should open on 23 January 1990 (Rule 38).

6. The hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on the appointed day. The Court had held a preparatory meeting immediately beforehand.

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government
  Mr P. BOILLAT, Head of the European Law and International Affairs Section,
  Federal Office of Justice, Agent,
  Mr C. VAUTIER, former Vaud cantonal judge,
  Mr J.P. KURETH, Deputy Head of the European Law and International Affairs Section, Federal Office of Justice, Counsel;
- for the Commission
  Mr S. TRECHSEL, Delegate;
- for the applicant
  Mr R. SCHALLER, avocat, Counsel.

The Court heard addresses by Mr Boillat and Mr Vautier for the Government, by Mr Trechsel for the Commission and by Mr Schaller for the applicant, as well as their replies to its questions.

AS TO THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

7. Mr Franz Weber, a Swiss journalist, lives at Clarens, in the Canton of Vaud.

8. On 2 April 1980 the applicant and one of the associations he runs, Helvetia Nostra, lodged a complaint alleging defamation against R.M., who had written a letter published in the letters column of the newspaper L'Est vaudois under the headline "Franz Weber is fooling you". The letter contained the following passages:

> "Like all your readers, no doubt, I recently found in my letter-box another of the begging letters sent out by unscrupulous people when they want to cadge money.
> Everyone is getting really sick of it and I think Franz Weber would do better to go and knock down the factory chimneys which crowd the skyline of Basle and protect his beloved captive seals in the zoo than to pester us with his initiatives, which he lives on at our expense - in case you didn't know.
> If Mr Weber had the courage to show us his tax returns, you would be amazed. But the list of municipal taxpayers is not published and it is easy to hide behind that sort of censorship and live by devious means, sponging off decent people who still believe that these drop-outs have their uses and in so doing demonstrate their distrust of the whole country's democratically - and how democratically! - elected authorities.
> May everyone have the courage to tell Helvetia Nostra (there's a fine name to fleece you with!) that we have had enough of playing into the hands of people who sponge off us and whose behaviour borders on the criminal.

9. Interviewed by the investigating judge (juge informateur) of the Vevey-Lavaux district, R.M. acknowledged the virulence of these accusations and attributed it to a nervous breakdown he had suffered at the time. Mr Weber refused all conciliation. In order to establish the truth of his allegations, R.M. then requested Mr Weber to produce a number of documents relating to his and his associations' financial position.

10. On 4 November 1980 the investigating judge ordered disclosure of the Helvetia Nostra association's and the Franz Weber Foundation's articles and their accounts for the previous two financial years. On 22 January 1981, having still not received them, he ordered their sequestration, but on 13 April 1981 he had to renew the order, as the applicant had not complied.

In May 1981 Mr Weber forwarded Helvetia Nostra's accounts in a sealed envelope but not those of the Foundation. Two subsequent sequestration orders were not executed.

11. The applicant was dissatisfied with the way in which the investigating judge was proceeding and on 1 March 1982 he lodged a criminal complaint alleging misuse of official authority and coercion, but the investigating judge of the Canton of Vaud refused to take any action, whereupon Mr Weber challenged the Cantonal Court en bloc.

12. R.M. was charged with defamation (Article 173 of the Criminal Code) and on 1 March 1982 was committed for trial at the Vevey district police court. He appealed against the order committing him for trial, but the Indictment Division (tribunal d'accusation) dismissed the appeal on 25 May 1982.

13. On 2 March 1982 at a press conference in Lausanne the applicant informed the public that defamation proceedings had been taken against R.M., that orders had been made for the production and then for the sequestration of the associations' accounts and that these had been handed over under seal. He also stated that he had lodged a challenge and a complaint against the investigating judge. Mr Weber had already divulged the first three items of information at a press conference in Berne on 11 May 1981, during which he denounced "the plot hatched against him by the Vaud authorities in order to intimidate him".

A. The proceedings before the President of the Criminal Cassation Division of the Vaud Cantonal Court

14. On 3 March 1982 the daily newspapers Gazette de Lausanne, 24 heures and Tribune/Le Matin reported what the applicant had said.

15. Under Article 185 § 3 of the Vaud Code of Criminal Procedure, the President of the Criminal Cassation Division of the Vaud Cantonal Court commenced of his own motion a summary investigation for breach of the confidentiality of a judicial investigation. In a letter of 10 March 1982 he ordered Mr Weber to provide information within ten days about what exactly he said on 2 March 1982.

The applicant replied on 22 March 1982. He denied having given any "information about the investigation proceedings" and relied on Articles 6 and 10 (art. 6, art. 10) of the Convention.

16. On 27 April 1982 the President of the Cassation Division imposed a fine of 300 Swiss francs on him, together with a probationary period of a year for the purposes of deletion of the fine from the cantonal register. He based his decision on the following grounds:

> "II. 1. Mr Weber relied on Article 6 (art. 6) of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and impugned the procedure provided for in Article 185 § 3 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (CCP), which is the same as the one provided for in Articles 384 § 2, 386 § 2 and 336 CCP. This complaint is irrelevant, as Article 6 (art. 6) ECHR does not apply to the summary investigation proceedings provided for in respect of these breaches of procedure under cantonal law, reserved by Article 335 §

1, second sub-paragraph, of the Criminal Code (CC), because it is not a question of a 'criminal charge'.

Mr Weber also submitted that he did not disclose any confidential matters on 2 March 1982, since the matters in question had already become public knowledge as a result of his press conference of 11 May 1981.

Since no judicial investigation was commenced following the press conference of 11 May 1981 and as Mr Weber did not have any occasion to avail himself of his right to a hearing, there is no need to deal with it in the present proceedings. Furthermore, criminal proceedings will shortly be time-barred (s. 12 of the Vaud Criminal Justice Act, s. 4 of the Minor Offences Act, s. 109 CC).

It is true that as a result of the press conference of 11 May 1981 the matters dealt with at the press conference of 2 March 1982 were public knowledge, but that is of no importance as breaching the confidentiality of an investigation means 'disclosing' a matter which ought to be kept confidential. It is therefore of little importance that the matter which was to be kept confidential was known to a limited or indefinite number of people because confidentiality had already been breached by a third party or by the same person.

The actus reus of the offence punishable under Article 185 CC is therefore made out. This offence is punishable even if it has been committed inadvertently (s. 4 of the Vaud Criminal Justice Act, s. 6 of the Minor Offences Act). In the instant case it is plain that Mr Weber acted deliberately.

3. By disclosing that he had challenged the investigating judge, Mr Weber revealed that there was an investigation, but it may be doubted whether that was 'information about the investigation'.

4. Disclosing that a criminal complaint has been lodged - which may amount to a different offence - is not caught by Article 185 CC, more particularly where it has been decided to take no action on the complaint.

5. Mr Weber himself admits that the breach of the confidentiality of the investigation was intentional. His submission based on a kind of necessity is devoid of merit since it was open to him to appeal to the Indictment Division against the orders for the sequestration of the Franz Weber Foundation's and the Helvetia Nostra association's accounts, as he in fact did two days later.

B. The proceedings in the Criminal Cassation Division of the Vaud Cantonal Court

17. On 15 October 1982 an appeal that Mr Weber brought against this decision was unanimously dismissed by the Criminal Cassation Division sitting in private (under Article 431 §§ 2 and 3 of the Vaud Code of Criminal Procedure), on the following grounds:

In the instant case the disclosure that criminal complaints had been lodged - on 2 April 1980 against [R.M.] and on 1 March 1982 against the investigating judge - is not information about an investigation except in so far as it implies - and discloses - that an investigation has been commenced ..., but it may indeed amount to an offence (defamation, calumny, on the part of the complainant). Article 185 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (CCP) is therefore not applicable to the disclosure that the first complaint had been lodged, because this was punishable as defamation, or to the disclosure that the second complaint had been lodged, because no investigation was commenced. The decision is therefore well-founded on that point.

The disclosure of the challenge is not information about an investigation. The challenge is not the purpose of the investigation, and the disclosure that such a challenge has been made says nothing about the purpose of the investigation, its content or its results. It remains true, on the other hand, that the existence of such an investigation is disclosed; but such a disclosure is not punishable under Article 185 CCP, since it was punishable as defamation.

The disclosure of the orders for production and sequestration of the accounts in the file does amount to information about an investigation.

It remains to be considered whether one can talk of disclosure, given that the matters had already been made public at an earlier press conference.

Article 185 CCP, which is designed also - and even primarily - to protect the public interest in ensuring that investigations take place in the best possible conditions, prohibits parties from communicating information from the file; it is therefore sufficient that the matters should be confidential in nature, without necessarily still being confidential; communication of matters of a confidential nature to someone who knows them already as a result of an earlier indiscretion is therefore a punishable offence. Furthermore, the applicant cannot rely on common knowledge when that knowledge is due to an earlier disclosure that he himself has made.

The appellant was therefore rightly convicted.

Finally, the Criminal Cassation Division set aside of its own motion the entry of the fine in the cantonal register. It noted that under Vaud law and notwithstanding that they were convertible into days of imprisonment (arrêts), the fines for "procedural offences", such as breaching the confidentiality of a judicial investigation, were disciplinary in nature, since they were designed to ensure that the investigation proceeded normally. On this point cantonal law differed from federal law.

C. The proceedings in the Federal Court

18. Mr Weber lodged a public-law appeal with the Federal Court. He relied on Articles 10 and 6 (art. 10, art. 6) of the Convention. In his view, Article 6 (art. 6) applied because of the criminal nature of the fine, which under Article 18a of an Order of 23 January 1982 was convertible into a custodial sentence.

19. On 16 November 1983 the Federal Court dismissed the appeal. It noted in particular:

2. The applicant ... maintained that Article 185 of the Vaud Code of Criminal Procedure (Vaud CCP) violates in the abstract, and in the alternative in the specific case, freedom of expression as secured in federal constitutional law and in Article 10 (art. 10) of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). In so doing, he overlooked that it may be legitimate in the public interest to impose certain restrictions on the exercise of that fundamental right ... Article 10 § 2 (art. 10-2) in fine ECHR, moreover, provides expressly that such restrictions are permissible where they are necessary in a democratic society, in particular for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. The rule enacted in Article 185 Vaud CCP clearly conforms to these principles. A weighing of the competing interests at stake leads to the same conclusions. While it may indeed be readily appreciated that the applicant had grounds for rebelling against the sometimes unorthodox course taken by the proceedings against him, it must not be forgotten that the usual remedies were open to him; and, indeed, on a number of occasions he successfully availed himself of them. His interest in expressing his views on this matter in public and the public's interest in being informed by this means cannot outweigh the interest in ensuring that the judicial system can function as smoothly and impartially as possible. The prohibition against communicating information about an investigation until its completion and the penalties attaching to the offence are undoubtedly consistent with the proportionality principle. Consideration of whether the impugned interference was founded on sufficient reasons which rendered it necessary in a democratic society, having regard to all the public-interest aspects of the case (European Court of Human Rights, Sunday Times case, Series A no. 30, paragraphs 65-67) leads inevitably to the conclusion - particularly if the interests at stake in the Sunday Times case previously cited and in the applicant's case are compared - that there was no violation of freedom of expression.

In the instant case the appellant was liable to a fine not exceeding 500 francs (Article 185 § 1 Vaud CCP) and was fined 300 francs. Under Vaud law, such a penalty typically comes within the sphere of rules of conduct to be observed during proceedings. That is not decisive, however, according to the European institutions.

Such rules are generally directed primarily at barristers, and in that instance their disciplinary nature is not in doubt; the parties to criminal proceedings, however, may also be subject to certain disciplinary rules. Admittedly, it has to be recognised that the measure taken against the appellant could have been based on a combination of Article 184 Vaud CCP, which lays down that judicial investigations shall be confidential, and Article 293 of the Criminal Code (CC), which provides that anyone who makes public any proceedings in a judicial investigation or deliberations by an authority which are secret by law shall be punishable with imprisonment or a fine. In that event the application of the Criminal Code would have justified an application of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) ECHR. This was not the case, however, and it was on the basis of a cantonal rule of procedure that the appellant suffered a penalty whose disciplinary or criminal nature can be determined only by assessing the degree of its severity.

The appellant showed, aptly enough, that such a fine was convertible into ten days' imprisonment under Article 12 of the Vaud Order on the recovery of fines and their conversion into imprisonment. That procedure indeed leaves the authorities only a very limited discretion and at all events does not enable them to comply retrospectively with the requirements of Article 6 (art. 6) ECHR. The appellant overlooks, however, that Article 49 § 3, second sub-paragraph, of the Swiss Criminal Code (SCC) enables the judge to rule out conversion where the person convicted has proved that, through no fault of his own, he is unable to pay the fine. In view of the foregoing, the possibility of a custodial sentence could not make the penalty imposed in the instant case a criminal one.

Ultimately, while the fine imposed in the instant case was not a negligible one, it nonetheless came into the category of penalties which by their nature, duration or manner of execution are deemed not to be appreciably detrimental. The possibility of conversion into a custodial sentence makes no difference, since conversion is possible only in the event of the appellant's refusing to pay the fine out of sheer unwillingness. The safeguards provided for in Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) ECHR were therefore not applicable in the instant case."

The applicant paid the fine in January 1985.

II. THE RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW

A. The Vaud Code of Criminal Procedure

20. The confidentiality of judicial investigations is governed by Articles 184 and 185 of the Vaud Code of Criminal Procedure, which provide:

Article 184

"All judicial investigations shall remain confidential until they are finally completed.

Judges, other members of the national legal service and civil servants shall not communicate any documents or information about an investigation except to experts, other witnesses or an authority where such communication assists the investigation or is justified on administrative or judicial grounds."

Article 185

"The parties, their counsel, employees of their counsel and experts and witnesses shall be bound to maintain the confidentiality of an investigation, on pain of a fine of up to five hundred francs, unless the breach is punishable under other provisions.

The punishment provided for in the foregoing paragraph shall be ordered by the President of the Cassation Division, of his own motion or acting on an information.

He shall give his ruling after a summary investigation."

In 1983 the applicant was the sponsor of a constitutional initiative entitled "For a system of criminal justice with a human face", one of whose aims was to secure the repeal of Article 185. This was in line with the approach adopted by those who had drafted the 1977 Geneva Code of Criminal Procedure, which does not attach any penalty to the obligation to maintain the confidentiality of an investigation, an obligation from which it even completely exempts witnesses, complainants, accused persons and their lawyers. In a referendum on 20 May 1984 the people of the Canton of Vaud rejected the Weber initiative by a clear majority.

B. The Swiss Criminal Code

21. Article 293 § 1 of the Swiss Criminal Code - which was not applied in the instant case (see paragraph 19 above) - provides:

"Anyone who, without being entitled to do so, makes public all or part of the proceedings of an investigation or of the deliberations of any authority which are confidential by law or in virtue of a decision taken by such an authority acting within its powers shall be punished with imprisonment or a fine."

C. The Vaud cantonal Fines (Recovery and Conversion into Imprisonment) Order of 23 January 1942

22. The cantonal Order of 23 January 1942, which has been supplemented and amended several times since, provides, inter alia:

Article 8

"If the person convicted has neither paid nor redeemed the fine and if it appears that recovery proceedings would be fruitless, the Prefect shall convert the fine into a term of imprisonment.

...

The Prefect may, however, decide against conversion at any time if the person convicted proves that, through no fault of his own, he is unable to pay the fine."

Article 12

"The conversion rate shall be one day's imprisonment for every thirty francs of fine; fractions of less than thirty francs shall be left out of account; the length of imprisonment shall not exceed three months.

Article 14

"Within twenty-four hours of receiving them, the Department shall send to the Prefect of the district in which the court that heard the case is situated copies of any judgments and decisions entailing imposition of a fine which have been communicated to it.

It shall order the Prefect to enforce the judgment or decision."

Article 15

"If the person convicted has neither paid nor redeemed the fine and if it appears that recovery proceedings would be fruitless, the Prefect shall inform the Department accordingly with a view to converting the fine into a term of imprisonment, unless such conversion was excluded at the outset in the judgment or decision concerned."

Article 17

"The presiding judge of the court shall decide whether to convert the fine into a term of imprisonment pursuant to Article 49 of the Criminal Code and shall proceed in accordance with Articles 459 and 460 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

..."

Article 18a

"Articles 14 and 15 shall apply to fines imposed for breaches of provisions of criminal or civil procedure.

In the case of Article 15, the Department shall report the matter to the appropriate judicial officer, who shall be able to convert the fine into a term of imprisonment, wholly or in part; he shall inform the Department of his decision.

Articles 8 and 10-13 shall apply to the conversion, save that the judge with jurisdiction to determine the matter shall be:

(a) the President of the Cantonal Court in respect of fines imposed by him or by the court as such;

(b) the presidents of the various sections or divisions of the Cantonal Court in respect of fines imposed by them or by the section or division;

..."

III. SWITZERLAND'S RESERVATION IN RESPECT OF ARTICLE 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) OF THE CONVENTION

A. Wording

23. When depositing the instrument of ratification of the Convention, the Swiss Government made the following reservation:

> "The rule contained in Article 6, paragraph 1 (art. 6-1), of the Convention that hearings shall be in public shall not apply to proceedings relating to the determination ... of any criminal charge which, in accordance with cantonal legislation, are heard before an administrative authority.
> The rule that judgment must be pronounced publicly shall not affect the operation of cantonal legislation on civil or criminal procedure providing that judgment shall not be delivered in public but notified to the parties in writing."

B. The Schaller judgment

24. The Swiss courts have had occasion to give their views on the concept of an "administrative authority". In its judgment of 2 December 1983 in the Schaller case, for instance, the Federal Court stated:

> "Moreover, the expression 'administrative authority' (autorité administrative) is not to be found in the text of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) but appears in Switzerland's reservation in respect of the principle laid down in Article 6 (art. 6) of the Convention that hearings must be public and judgments pronounced publicly. It is therefore not a Convention concept which should be construed according to the principle of reasonable expectation, that is to say in the meaning which the other signatory States might and should in good faith give it, or directly under Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention of 23 May 1969, which Switzerland has not yet ratified. A reservation made when ratifying a treaty is a unilateral declaration which must in general be interpreted by reference to the domestic law of the State which has adopted it, like a provision in a statute or regulation.
> In the case of a reservation, an interpretation in accordance with the will of the declaring State makes it possible to take into account the real purpose of the reservation, whose justification lies precisely in the special features of national law ...
> That being so, regard should be had to the meaning which the Swiss Government and Parliament intended giving to the expression 'administrative authority'. While the Federal Parliament accepted the reservation without discussion or comment, the Federal Council gave the following particulars in its 1968 Communication (FF [Federal Gazette] 1968 II p. 1118/1119).

'... In Switzerland, as was pointed out above, the administrative authorities may have to determine private-law disputes and impose penalties in the way that a criminal court would. Administrative proceedings, however, are not normally public. The same is true of proceedings in the administrative courts, although they are adversarial. It is, moreover, doubtful whether the principle that proceedings must be public is generally applicable to administrative criminal proceedings.'

In its communication of 4 March 1974 (FF 1974 I, p. 1020), on the other hand, the Federal Council merely stated that proceedings before administrative authorities were not public.

It is therefore possible to confirm the precedent of R. and Others of 25 November 1982, referred to above. In the light of the 1968 Communication it is apparent that Switzerland meant to exclude application of the principle that hearings and judgments must be public not only before administrative authorities but also in the administrative courts, notwithstanding that proceedings there are adversarial. It would, moreover, be consistent with the principle of good faith to accept that the reservation applies to such-and-such an authority not because of the way the authority is organised but rather because of the functions it discharges, in the instant case administrative functions.

(cc) The respondent authority was right in considering that it could apply the reservation made in respect of Article 6 (art. 6) ECHR and in accepting that in Switzerland 'disciplinary regulations come within the domain of administrative law and the authorities which apply them exercise an administrative jurisdiction'."

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

25. Mr Weber applied to the Commission on 15 May 1984 (application no. 11034/84). He alleged a failure to comply with the requirements of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention (right to a fair, public trial with a view to the determination of a "criminal charge") in that the summary proceedings had been conducted in chambers and without any hearing of the parties or the witnesses. He also claimed that the imposition of a fine was an unjustified interference with his right to freedom of expression, as guaranteed in Article 10 (art. 10).

26. The Commission declared the application admissible on 7 July 1988. In its report of 16 March 1989 (made under Article 31) (art. 31) it expressed the opinion (by nine votes to four) that there had been no breach of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) - which, in its view, did not apply in the instant case - but (unanimously) that there had been a breach of Article 10 (art. 10).

The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the dissenting opinion contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to this judgment[*].

[*] Note by the Registrar. For practical reasons this annex will appear only with the printed version of the judgment (volume 177 of Series A of the Publications of the Court), but a copy of the Commission's report is obtainable from the registry.

FINAL SUBMISSIONS TO THE COURT BY THE GOVERNMENT

27. At the hearing the Government confirmed the submissions they had made in their memorial. The Court was asked to hold:

"As to Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention,

- that this provision is not applicable to the instant case;

- in the alternative that, having regard to Switzerland's reservation in respect of this provision, the principle that proceedings must be public was not applicable to the proceedings complained of;

As to Article 10 (art. 10) of the Convention,

- that the State interference complained of was justified under paragraph 2 (art. 10-2) of this provision."

AS TO THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 6 § 1 (art. 6-1)

28. The applicant complained that the President of the Criminal Cassation Division of the Vaud Cantonal Court and then the Cassation Division itself gave judgment without any public hearing beforehand. He claimed that there had been a breach of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention, which provides:

"1. In the determination of ... any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing ... by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice."

Having regard to the arguments of the Government and the Commission, the question whether Article 6 (art. 6) is applicable must be determined first.

A. Applicability of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1)

29. The Government submitted that the present case did not come within the ambit of this provision, because in Vaud law the proceedings taken against the applicant were not "criminal" proceedings but disciplinary ones.

A majority of the Commission agreed.

30. The Court has already had to determine a similar issue in two cases concerning military discipline (see the Engel and Others judgment of 8 June 1976, Series A no. 22) and the maintenance of order in prisons (see the Campbell and Fell judgment of 28 June 1984, Series A no. 80). While recognising the right of States to distinguish between criminal law and disciplinary law, it has reserved the power to satisfy itself that the line drawn between these does not prejudice the object and purpose of Article 6 (art. 6). In the instant case it will apply the criteria which have been consistently laid down in the matter in its earlier decisions (apart from the two judgments previously cited, see, among other authorities, the Öztürk judgment of 21 February 1984, Series A no. 73).

31. It must first be ascertained whether the provisions defining the offence in issue belong, according to the legal system of the respondent State, to criminal law, disciplinary law or both concurrently. This factor is of relative weight and serves only as a starting-point.

The legal basis of Mr Weber’s conviction was provided by Article 185 of the Vaud Code of Criminal Procedure (see paragraph 20 above) and not by Article 293 of the Swiss Criminal Code (see paragraph 21 above). In its judgment of 16 November 1983 the Federal Court recognised that the measure taken against the applicant could have been based on a combination of the two (see paragraph 19 above) but added that this had not happened in the event. The word "peine" (punishment) in Article 185 gives an indication but is not decisive.

32. The second, weightier criterion is the nature of the offence.

In the Government’s submission, the impugned sentence was designed to punish a breach of a rule intended to protect defendants and ensure that proceedings were conducted objectively by shielding the judge in charge of them from any pressure, in particular by the media. The Commission considered that Article 185 applied to a limited number of people who shared the characteristic of taking part in a judicial investigation; although these people did not belong to the staff responsible for the administration of justice, they were in a "special relationship of obligation" with the relevant authorities, which justified subjecting them to a special discipline.

33. The Court does not accept this submission. Disciplinary sanctions are generally designed to ensure that the members of particular groups comply with the specific rules governing their conduct. Furthermore, in the great majority of the Contracting States disclosure of information about an investigation still pending constitutes an act incompatible with such rules and punishable under a variety of provisions. As persons who above all others are bound by the confidentiality of an investigation, judges, lawyers and all those closely associated with the functioning of the courts are liable in such an event, independently of any criminal sanctions, to disciplinary measures on account of their profession. The parties, on the other hand, only take part in the proceedings as people subject to the jurisdiction of the courts, and they therefore do not come within the disciplinary sphere of the judicial system. As Article 185, however, potentially affects the whole population, the offence it defines, and to which it attaches a punitive sanction, is a "criminal" one for the purposes of the second criterion.

34. As regards the third criterion - the nature and the degree of severity of the penalty incurred - the Court notes that the fine could amount to 500 Swiss francs (see paragraph 20 above) and be converted into a term of imprisonment in certain circumstances (see paragraph 22 above). What was at stake was thus sufficiently important to warrant classifying the offence with which the applicant was charged as a criminal one under the Convention.

35. In conclusion, Article 6 (art. 6) applied to the instant case.

B. Validity of Switzerland's reservation in respect of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1)

36. The Government submitted in the alternative that Switzerland's reservation in respect of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) (see paragraph 23 above) would in any case prevent Mr Weber from relying on non-compliance with the principle that proceedings before cantonal courts and judges should be public; the reservation was separate from the interpretative declaration which the Court had had to deal with in the Belilos case (see the judgment of 29 April 1988, Series A no. 132) and was designed to withdraw from the ambit of that principle "proceedings relating to the determination of ... any criminal charge which, in accordance with cantonal legislation, are heard before an administrative authority". The concepts in a reservation should be understood with reference to the domestic law of the State which made it. In Swiss law, including the settled case-law of the Federal Court, the concept of "administrative authority" also included judicial authorities where these exercised administrative powers, as when the President of the Criminal Cassation Division and the Cassation Division itself determined disciplinary matters.

The Commission did not discuss the matter in its report since it concluded that Article 6 (art. 6) was not applicable. Before the Court its Delegate argued, however, that if the Court did not take the same view of that question, it would be bound to find that there had been a breach of the Article (art. 6), notwithstanding the reservation and irrespective of whether the relevant cantonal authorities had performed judicial functions or administrative duties, since in the first case there would have been a clear failure to comply with the requirement that proceedings should be public, while in the second eventuality an administrative body would have determined the merits of a criminal case.

37. The Court must ascertain whether the reservation under consideration satisfies the requirements of Article 64 (art. 64).

38. Clearly it does not fulfil one of them, as the Swiss Government did not append "a brief statement of the law [or laws] concerned" to it. The requirement of paragraph 2 of Article 64 (art. 64-2), however, "both constitutes an evidential factor and contributes to legal certainty"; its purpose is to "provide a guarantee - in particular for the other Contracting Parties and the Convention institutions - that a reservation does not go beyond the provisions expressly excluded by the State concerned" (see the Belilos judgment previously cited, Series A no. 132, pp. 27-28, § 59). Disregarding it is a breach not of "a purely formal requirement" but of "a condition of substance" (ibid.). The material reservation by Switzerland must accordingly be regarded as invalid.

That being so, it is unnecessary to determine whether the reservation was of "a general character" contrary to Article 64 § 1 (art. 64-1).

C. Compliance with Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1)

39. The applicant was consequently entitled in principle to a public hearing in the determination of the "criminal charge" against him. The President of the Criminal Cassation Division, however, did not hold a hearing at all but gave his decision after a summary investigation entirely in written form, as provided for in Article 185 of the Vaud Code of Criminal Procedure (see paragraph 20 above). The Criminal Cassation Division too dismissed the applicant’s appeal without hearing argument, as it was empowered to do by Article 431 §§ 2 and 3 of the same Code (see paragraph 17 above). The fact that the proceedings in the Federal Court were public did not suffice to cure the two defects just noted. Having before it a public-law appeal, the Federal Court could only satisfy itself that there had been no arbitrariness and not determine all the disputed questions of fact and law (see, mutatis mutandis, the Belilos judgment previously cited, Series A no. 132, pp. 31-32, §§ 71-72). Furthermore, the Government did not claim that Mr Weber had waived his right to hearings; and the case did not come within any of the exceptions listed in the second sentence of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1).

40. There has therefore been a breach of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1).

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 10 (art. 10)

41. In the applicant’s submission, his conviction and sentence to a fine violated Article 10 (art. 10) of the Convention, which provides:

"1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article (art. 10) shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.

2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary."

The Government disputed that submission, whereas the Commission accepted it.

42. There was unquestionably an interference by public authority with the exercise of the right guaranteed in Article 10 (art. 10). It arose from the decision of 27 April 1982 by the President of the Criminal Cassation Division, which was upheld by the Cassation Division on 15 October 1982. Such an interference is not contrary to the Convention, however, if the requirements of paragraph 2 of Article 10 (art. 10-2) are satisfied.

43. The penalty was certainly "prescribed by law", because it was based on Article 185 of the Vaud Code of Criminal Procedure; and this indeed was common ground.

The Commission, the Government and the applicant concentrated their submissions on whether the aim pursued by the impugned measure was a legitimate one and whether it was "necessary in a democratic society".

A. Legitimacy of the aim pursued

44. The Government contended that the interference complained of was necessary "for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary", arising as it did from the confidentiality of the investigation and being designed to protect the defendant and ensure the smooth administration of justice.

In the Commission’s view, Article 185 was clearly intended to maintain the authority of the judiciary; there was nothing to suggest that it had been used for any other purpose in this instance.

Mr Weber, on the other hand, submitted that the cantonal judicial authorities’ real but unavowed purpose had been to intervene in a political controversy in order to "nip in the bud" any criticism of the functioning of the Canton of Vaud’s system of justice. This aim of intimidation and censorship was inconsistent with the pluralism and tolerance characteristic of democratic society.

45. Having regard to the particular circumstances of the case and the actual terms of the judgments of the relevant judicial authorities, the Court considers that the application of the Article in question to the applicant was intended to ensure the proper conduct of the investigation and was therefore designed to protect the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.

B. Necessity "in a democratic society"

46. The applicant cited his role as an ecologist and the political and social background to his activities. The effectiveness of these, he claimed, was dependent on the public's trust in him, particularly as regards the management of money donated to the associations he had set up; the way he was treated by the judicial system consequently amounted to an attack on the causes he championed. His many successes annoyed his political opponents, who, supported by "part of the Vaud judicial apparatus", were attempting to damage his reputation. The fine complained of, which was sheer "pestering of a relentless opponent", was part of a campaign of harassment against him, especially as it was a penalty for disclosing not the content or outcome of the investigation but merely a stage or a step in the investigation.

The Commission considered that the interference complained of by Mr Weber was not "necessary in a democratic society". In its view, Mr Weber had a "legitimate interest in expressing his views on judicial proceedings which chiefly concern[ed] him", an interest which "coincid[ed] with the public's interest in being informed". Furthermore, imposing a penalty "for revealing information already made public" could not be said to be answering a "pressing social need".

The Government did not overlook the fact that there was a genuine public interest, but they condemned the defendant's "partisan" exploitation of it. They criticised Mr Weber for having attempted to bring the discussion out into the open in order to secure a trial which conformed to his own ideas of fairness.

47. According to the Court's settled case-law, the States have a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent an interference is necessary, but this margin goes hand in hand with European supervision covering both the legislation and the decisions applying it, even where the latter have been taken by an independent court (see, among other authorities, the Groppera Radio AG and Others judgment of 28 March 1990, Series A no. 173, p. 28, § 72). The Court therefore has jurisdiction to ascertain whether, having regard to the facts and circumstances of the case, a "penalty" is compatible with freedom of expression. The necessity for a restriction pursuant to one of the aims listed in Article 10 § 2 (art. 10-2) must be convincingly established (see the Barthold judgment of 25 March 1985, Series A no. 90, p. 26, § 58).

48. The Court notes - without attaching any decisive importance to the fact - that the applicant was well known for his commitment to nature conservation. The energetic action he had taken both nationally and internationally had given rise to lively public debate, which had been widely reported by the press. Consequently, a trial concerning him the conduct of which had in some respects proved to be "unorthodox", in the words of the Federal Court (see paragraph 19 above), was bound to arouse the interest of all who had taken a close interest in his activities.

49. It should be pointed out especially that at his press conference in Lausanne on 2 March 1982 Mr Weber essentially repeated what he had said on 11 May 1981. He added only two new pieces of information: that he had challenged the investigating judge and that he had lodged a complaint against him alleging misuse of official authority and coercion (see paragraph 11 above). The President of the Criminal Cassation Division himself accepted, in his decision of 27 April 1982 (see paragraph 16 above), that the three other circumstances that were disclosed - namely the defamation proceedings against R.M., the orders for the production and sequestration of accounts and the handing over of the accounts under seal (see paragraph 13 above) - were "public knowledge". In its judgment of 15 October 1982, however, the Criminal Cassation Division held that only the disclosure of the orders for production and sequestration of accounts was caught by Article 185 (see paragraph 17 above). Since the applicant had already given this information to the public in Berne on 11 May 1981, it had by that very fact ceased to be confidential.

50. In the Government’s submission this finding was not decisive, because of the formal nature of the confidentiality referred to in Articles 184 and 185 of the Code. According to the relevant Swiss case-law and legal literature, the mere fact of communicating a piece of information in a judicial investigation was sufficient for commission of the offence; whether it was common knowledge beforehand and its importance or degree of confidentiality were relevant only in determining the amount of the fine.

51. The Court finds this submission unpersuasive. For the purposes of the Convention, the interest in maintaining the confidentiality of the aforementioned facts no longer existed on 2 March 1982. On that date, therefore, the penalty imposed on the applicant no longer appeared necessary in order to achieve the legitimate aim pursued. The situation might perhaps have been different at the first press conference, but as the Vaud authorities did not bring proceedings at the time, the Court does not have to examine the question.

As to the submission that the impugned statements by Mr Weber on 2 March 1982 could be interpreted as an attempt to bring pressure to bear on the investigating judge and could therefore have been prejudicial to the proper conduct of the investigation, the Court notes that by that time the investigation was practically complete, because on the previous day the judge had committed R.M. for trial (see paragraph 12 above), and that from then on any attempt of that kind would have been belated and thus devoid of effect. Admittedly R.M. appealed against his committal for trial, but even though his appeal meant that the order committing him for trial did not become final, the investigation nonetheless remained suspended (see paragraph 12 above). It was accordingly not necessary to impose a penalty on the applicant from this point of view either.

52. Having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, the Court concludes that in being convicted and sentenced to a fine Mr Weber was subjected to an interference with the exercise of his right to freedom of expression, which was not "necessary in a democratic society" for achieving the legitimate aim pursued.

III. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 50 (art. 50)

53. By Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention,

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the ... Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

The applicant's claims under this provision included both the award of financial compensation and reimbursement of costs and expenses.

54. In respect of non-pecuniary damage Mr Weber sought compensation in the amount of 5,000 Swiss francs. The Court considers, however, that the finding of a violation of Articles 6 and 10 (art. 6, art. 10) constitutes sufficient just satisfaction in this regard.

55. In respect of costs and expenses relating to the proceedings in Switzerland and before the Convention institutions the applicant claimed the sum of 8,482.50 Swiss francs, of which he gave a breakdown.

The Government thought this amount reasonable and said they were willing to pay it if the Court held that there had been a violation of the Convention. The Delegate of the Commission regarded this sum as modest and wholly justified.

The Court agrees and will therefore allow this claim.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Holds by six votes to one that Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention applied in the instant case and that there has been a breach of it;

2. Holds unanimously that there has been a breach of Article 10 (art. 10);

3. Holds unanimously that the respondent State is to pay the applicant costs and expenses in the sum of 8,482.50 Swiss francs (eight thousand four hundred and eighty-two francs, fifty centimes);

4. Dismisses unanimously the remainder of the claim for just satisfaction.

Done in English and in French and delivered at a public hearing in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 22 May 1990.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE BINDSCHEDLER-ROBERT

(Translation)

For the reasons which follow, I voted in support of the view that Article 6 (art. 6) was not applicable in this case.

In the cases of Engel and Others (Series A no. 22, § 81) and Öztürk (Series A no. 73, §§ 48 et seq.) the Court accepted that the Convention allowed the State to make a distinction between, on the one hand, criminal cases and, on the other, disciplinary cases or administrative offences and that only the former automatically came within the ambit of Article 6 (art. 6) of the Convention; but it added that it did not follow that the classification thus adopted by the State was decisive for the purposes of the Convention and that Article 6 (art. 6) could apply to an offence deemed in the State's legislation not to be a criminal one if the nature of the offence and/or the severity of the penalty warranted it.

In the instant case the majority have accepted that the offence in question was a criminal one on the ground that since the relevant Article of the Vaud Code of Criminal Procedure applied to practically the whole population, the offence did not come within the disciplinary sphere.

Having regard to the judgment in the case of Engel and Others, in which the Court accepted that the case was a disciplinary one because it concerned legal rules "governing the operation of the ... armed forces", one might consider that in the present case too, in which the applicable provision was designed to ensure the proper functioning of another public service, the judicial system, the offence in question could legitimately be classified as a disciplinary one. Even if this conception of disciplinary law is deemed to be too broad, it does not necessarily follow that the offence was a criminal one within the meaning of the Convention.

If it is noted that the behaviour which Article 185 is intended to punish lies within a well-defined sphere - ensuring the proper conduct of judicial proceedings - and that by applying to it not the provisions of the Swiss Criminal Code but a provision of the Vaud Code of Criminal Procedure, the prosecuting authority itself classified the offence as being of minor importance, it can be accepted that the offence was an administrative one contravening merely a provision for the maintenance of order. As to the penalty incurred, it is not of such seriousness that it would entail the applicability of Article 6 (art. 6). This is no doubt a matter of opinion, but it appears to me that the Court has not had sufficient regard to the circumstances in which a fine may be converted into a term of imprisonment, namely where there is a deliberate intention not to pay it, and not merely where the person concerned finds himself unable to do so through no fault of his own. In the applicant's case, failure to pay would have been deliberate and the conversion into imprisonment actively desired. There is therefore no occasion to take into account, as the majority have done, the possibility of conversion in order to assess the seriousness of the penalty incurred. Furthermore, as is apparent from the case of Engel and Others, not all penalties consisting in deprivation of liberty are necessarily criminal ones within the meaning of Article 6 (art. 6) where they cannot be appreciably detrimental either by their nature or by their duration or by their manner of execution. Furthermore, the maximum amount of the fine (CHF 500) - and the fine imposed in the instant case amounted to CHF 300 - does not appear substantial in the Swiss context or likely to cause appreciable detriment. From this point of view too, therefore, I consider it unjustified to classify the offence as a criminal one within the meaning of the Convention.

I will add that the punitive, deterrent nature of the penalty incurred does not seem to me to be such as to affect that view, since it is inherent in any penalty and since any offence necessarily calls for a penalty.

The foregoing considerations accordingly prompt me to say that in my humble opinion Article 6 (art. 6) was not applicable in the instant case and that consequently there cannot have been a violation of it. I will add that if I had reached a different conclusion as to applicability, I would have held, like my colleagues, that there had been a breach of that provision.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DE MEYER

As regards Switzerland's reservation in respect of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention[1], I confirm, if need be, the observations I made in 1988 with regard to the Belilos case[2].

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

CASE OF WILLE v. LIECHTENSTEIN

(Application no. 28396/95)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

28 October 1999

In the case of Wille v. Liechtenstein,

The European Court of Human Rights, sitting, in accordance with Article 27 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention"), as amended by Protocol No. 11[1], and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Court[2], as a Grand Chamber composed of the following judges:

Mrs E. PALM, President,
Mr C.L. ROZAKIS,
Mr L. FERRARI BRAVO,
Mr G. RESS,
Mr L. CAFLISCH,
Mr I. CABRAL BARRETO,
Mr J.-P. COSTA,
Mr W. FUHRMANN,
Mr K. JUNGWIERT,
Mr B. ZUPANCIC,
Mrs N. VAJIC,
Mr J. HEDIGAN,
Mrs W. THOMASSEN,
Mrs M. TSATSA-NIKOLOVSKA,
Mr T. PANTÎRU,
Mr E. LEVITS,
Mr K. TRAJA,

and also of Mrs M. DE BOER-BUQUICCHIO, Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 2 June and 13 October 1999,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case was referred to the Court, as established under former Article 19 of the Convention[3], by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") and by the Liechtenstein Government ("the Government") on 24 and 27 October 1998 respectively, within the three-month period laid down by former Articles 32 § 1 and 47 of the Convention. It originated in an application (no. 28396/95) against the Principality of Liechtenstein lodged with the Commission under former Article 25 by a Liechtenstein citizen, Mr Herbert Wille, on 25 August 1995.

Notes by the Registry

1-2. Protocol No. 11 and the Rules of Court came into force on 1 November 1998.

3. Since the entry into force of Protocol No. 11, which amended Article 19, the Court has functioned on a permanent basis.

The Commission's request referred to former Articles 44 and 48 and to the declaration whereby Liechtenstein recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (former Article 46); the Government's application referred to former Article 48. The object of the request and of the application was to obtain a decision as to whether the facts of the case disclosed a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under Articles 10 and 13 of the Convention.

2. After the entry into force of Protocol No. 11 on 1 November 1998 and in accordance with the provisions of Article 5 § 5 thereof, the case was referred to the Grand Chamber of the Court. The Grand Chamber included ex officio Mr L. Caflisch, the judge elected in respect of Liechtenstein (Article 27 § 2 of the Convention and Rule 24 § 4 of the Rules of Court), Mrs E. Palm and Mr C.L. Rozakis, the Vice-Presidents of the Court, and Mr J.-P. Costa and Mr G. Ress, Vice-Presidents of Sections (Article 27 § 3 of the Convention and Rule 24 §§ 3 and 5 (a)). The other members appointed to complete the Grand Chamber were Mr L. Ferrari Bravo, Mr I. Cabral Barreto, Mr W. Fuhrmann, Mr K. Jungwiert, Mr B. Zupancic, Mrs N. Vajic, Mr J. Hedigan, Mrs W. Thomassen, Mrs M. Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T. Pantîru, Mr E. Levits and Mr K. Traja (Rule 24 § 3 and Rule 100 § 4).

3. The applicant designated the lawyers who would represent him (Rule 36). The lawyers were given leave by the President of the Grand Chamber, Mrs Palm, to use the German language (Rule 34 § 3).

4. As President of the Grand Chamber, Mrs Palm, acting through the Deputy Registrar, consulted the Agent of the Government, the applicant's lawyers and the Delegate of the Commission on the organisation of the written procedure. Pursuant to the order made in consequence, the Registrar received the applicant's memorial on 25 February 1999 and the Government's memorial on 30 March 1999.

5. In accordance with the decision of the President of the Grand Chamber, a hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 2 June 1999.

There appeared before the Court:

(a) for the Government
Mr H. GOLSONG, Attorney, Co-Agent,
Mr N. MARXER,
Mr T. STEIN,
Mr M. WALKER, Counsel;

(b) for the applicant
Mr W.E. SEEGER, Rechtsanwalt,
Mr A. KLEY, Rechtsanwalt, Counsel.

Mr Wille was also present.

The Court heard addresses by Mr Seeger, Mr Kley, Mr Golsong and Mr Stein.

THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

6. In 1992 a controversy arose between His Serene Highness Prince Hans-Adam II of Liechtenstein ("the Prince") and the Liechtenstein government on political competences in connection with the plebiscite on the question of Liechtenstein's accession to the European Economic Area. At the relevant time, the applicant was a member of the Liechtenstein government. Following an argument between the Prince and members of the government at a meeting on 28 October 1992, the matter was settled on the basis of a common declaration by the Prince, the Diet (Landtag) and the government.

7. Following elections and the constitution of the new Diet in May 1993, discussions on various constitutional issues took place between the Prince and the government, when the applicant no longer held a government office. The applicant had not stood for re-election in May 1993, and he was appointed President of the Liechtenstein Administrative Court (Verwaltungsbeschwerdeinstanz) in December 1993 for a fixed term of office (see paragraph 26 below).

8. On 16 February 1995, in the context of a series of lectures on questions of constitutional jurisdiction and fundamental rights, the applicant gave a public lecture at the Liechtenstein-Institut, a research institute, on the "Nature and Functions of the Liechtenstein Constitutional Court" ("Wesen und Aufgaben des Staatsgerichtshofes"). In the course of the lecture, the applicant expressed the view that the Constitutional Court was competent to decide on the "interpretation of the Constitution in case of disagreement between the Prince (government) and the Diet" ("Entscheidung über die Auslegung der Verfassung bei einem Auslegungsstreit zwischen Fürst (Regierung) und Landtag").

9. On 17 February 1995 the newspaper Liechtensteiner Volksblatt published an article on the lecture given by the applicant, mentioning, inter alia, his views on the competences of the Constitutional Court.

10. On 27 February 1995 the Prince addressed a letter to the applicant concerning the above lecture, as summarised in the article published in the Liechtensteiner Volksblatt.

11. The letter, written on heraldic letter paper, read as follows:

"Vaduz Castle, 27 February 1995

Dr Herbert Wille
President of the Liechtenstein Administrative Court
[applicant's private address]

Sir,

I was astonished to read the report in the 17 February issue of the Liechtensteiner Volksblatt on your lecture on the theme of the 'Nature and Functions of the Liechtenstein Constitutional Court'. I assume that the statements you made on the Court's areas of responsibility have been correctly reproduced in this report, in particular the comment that the Constitutional Court can, as a court that interprets the law, be appealed to in the event of a disagreement between the Prince and the people.

You will doubtless remember the discussion between the government and me in the period before 28 October 1992, at which you were present as deputy head of government. I drew the government's attention during this exchange of views at Vaduz Castle to the fact that it was not abiding by the Constitution and read out the relevant Articles thereof. You replied that you did not agree (or words to that effect) with these parts of the Constitution in any case and that you therefore did not consider yourself bound by it. Since the other members of the government did not contradict you, I was forced to assume that the entire government was of the opinion that the two bodies that hold supreme power, the people and the Prince, must observe the Constitution and the ordinary laws but not the members of the government, who have sworn an oath of allegiance to the Constitution.

I considered your statement at that time and the government's attitude to be incredibly arrogant and therefore informed the government in no uncertain terms that it had lost my confidence. Following the compromise that was fortunately reached a little later between the government and the Diet, on the one hand, and myself, on the other, I declared that I once again had confidence in the government, doing so in the hope that individual members had realised that they had taken up an inexcusable position in relation to our Constitution and now recognised that they were bound by it. Just as I would have appointed Mr Brunhart head of government, had his party won the election, I appointed you President of the Administrative Court on the Diet's recommendation.

Unfortunately, I had to realise following the publication of the report in the Liechtensteiner Volksblatt that you still do not consider yourself bound by the Constitution and hold views that are clearly in violation of both the spirit and the letter thereof. Anyone reading the relevant Articles of the Constitution will be able to establish that the Constitutional Court has no competence to decide as a court of interpretation in the event of a disagreement between the Prince and the people (the Diet). In my eyes your attitude, Dr Wille, makes you unsuitable for public office. I do not intend to get involved in a long public or private debate with you, but I should like to inform you in good time that I shall not appoint you again to a public office should you be proposed by the Diet or any other body. I only hope that in your judgments as President of the Administrative Court you will abide by the Constitution and the ordinary laws for the rest of your term of office.

Yours sincerely,

Hans-Adam II
Prince of Liechtenstein"

"Schloss Vaduz, 27. Februar 1995

Herrn Dr. Herbert Wille
Präsident der Fürstlich Liecht.
Verwaltungsbeschwerdeinstanz
...

Sehr geehrter Herr Präsident

Mit Erstaunen habe ich im Liechtensteiner Volksblatt vom 17. Februar den Bericht über Ihren Vortrag am Liechtenstein Institut zum Thema 'Wesen und Aufgaben des Staatsgerichtshofes' gelesen. Ich nehme an, dass Ihre Aussagen über die Zuständigkeitsbereiche des Staatsgerichtshofes in diesem Bericht korrekt wiedergegeben wurden, insbesondere jene, in der Sie feststellen, dass der Staatsgerichtshof als Interpretations-gerichtshof bei unterschiedlichen Auffassungen zwischen Fürst und Volk angerufen werden könne.

Sie werden sich bestimmt noch an die Auseinandersetzung zwischen der Regierung und mir vor dem 28. Oktober 1992 erinnern, bei der Sie als stellvertretender Regierungschef anwesend waren. Ich habe damals bei der Aussprache auf Schloss Vaduz die Regierung darauf aufmerksam gemacht, dass sie sich nicht an die Verfassung hält, und die entsprechenden Artikel aus der Verfassung der Regierung vorgelesen. Sie haben dazumal sinngemäss geantwortet, dass Sie mit diesen Teilen der Verfassung sowieso nicht einverstanden seien, und sich deshalb auch nicht an die Verfassung gebunden fühlten. Nachdem die anderen Regierungsmitglieder Ihrer Aussage nicht widersprochen haben, musste ich davon ausgehen, dass die gesamte Regierung der Auffassung ist, dass sich zwar die beiden Souveräne, Volk und Fürst, an Verfassung und Gesetze zu halten haben, nicht aber die Regierungsmitglieder, welche einen Eid auf die Verfassung abgelegt haben.

Ich habe Ihre damalige Aussage sowie die Haltung der Regierung als unglaubliche Arroganz empfunden, und deshalb habe ich der Regierung in sehr klaren Worten mitgeteilt, dass sie mein Vertrauen verloren hat. Beim Kompromiss, der glücklicherweise etwas später zwischen Regierung und Landtag auf der einen Seite und mir auf der anderen Seite erzielt wurde, habe ich der Regierung wieder mein Vertrauen ausgesprochen. Ich habe dies auch in der Hoffnung getan, dass die einzelnen Regierungsmitglieder ihre unentschuldbare Haltung gegenüber unserer Verfassung eingesehen haben und die Verfassung für sie wieder als bindend anerkennen. Ebenso wie ich Herrn Brunhart bei einem Sieg seiner Partei wiederum zum Regierungschef ernannt hätte, so habe ich Sie über Vorschlag des Landtages zum Präsidenten der Verwaltungs-beschwerdeinstanz ernannt.

Leider muss ich aufgrund des Berichtes im Liechtensteiner Volksblatt nun feststellen, dass Sie sich nach wie vor nicht an die Verfassung gebunden fühlen und Auffassungen vertreten, die eindeutig gegen Sinn und Wortlaut der Verfassung verstossen. Jeder wird beim Lesen der einschlägigen Verfassungsartikel feststellen können, dass der Staatsgerichtshof eben nicht Interpretationsgerichtshof bei unterschiedlichen Auffassungen zwischen Fürst und Volk (Landtag) ist. In meinen Augen sind Sie, Herr Dr. Wille, aufgrund Ihrer Haltung gegenüber der Verfassung ungeeignet für ein öffentliches Amt. Ich habe nicht die Absicht, mich mit Ihnen öffentlich oder privat in eine lange Auseinandersetzung einzulassen, aber ich möchte Ihnen rechtzeitig mitteilen, dass ich Sie nicht mehr für ein öffentliches Amt ernennen werde, sollten Sie mir vom Landtag oder sonst irgendeinem Gremium vorgeschlagen werden. Es verbleibt mir die Hoffnung, dass Sie sich während des Restes Ihrer Amtszeit als Präsident der Verwaltungsbeschwerdeinstanz in Ihren Urteilen an Verfassung und Gesetze halten.

Mit vorzüglicher Hochachtung

Hans-Adam II.
Fürst von Liechtenstein"

12. By letter of 9 March 1995 the applicant informed the President of the Diet about the letter of 27 February 1995. He denied having ever made a statement to the effect that he did not consider himself bound by the Constitution or parts thereof. He further explained his research on the competences of the Constitutional Court in constitutional matters. According to him, the expression of an opinion not shared by the Prince could not be regarded as a failure to comply with the Constitution. However, taking into account the conclusions drawn by the Prince in the said letter, his office as President of the Administrative Court was called into question. The President of the Diet subsequently informed the applicant that the Diet had discussed the matter in camera and had come to the unanimous conclusion that the applicant's office was not called into question on account of his legal opinions as stated in the context of his lecture.

13. On 20 March 1995 the applicant replied to the letter sent by the Prince on 27 February 1995, and enclosed a copy of his letter to the President of the Diet. He explained in particular that it was his conviction as a lawyer that his statements on the occasion of the lecture of 16 February 1995, namely that the Constitutional Court was competent to decide on the interpretation of the Constitution in case of a dispute between the Prince and the people (Diet), were correct and did not infringe the Constitution. The applicant concluded that the declaration made by the Prince that he did not intend to appoint the applicant to a public office, amounted to an interference with his rights to freedom of opinion and to freedom of thought, as guaranteed under the Constitution and the European Convention on Human Rights. It further called into question the constitutional right to equal access to public office and constituted an attempt to interfere with judicial independence.

14. In his letter in reply dated 4 April 1995, the Prince noted that Mr Wille had distributed the letter of 27 February 1995 to a large group of persons. The Prince stated that it had been his intention to avoid a public discussion in informing Mr Wille, in a personal letter, about his decision as early as possible. He considered that a long debate between them on the question of Mr Wille's qualification for the office of judge was inappropriate, as Mr Wille had remained in office and the Prince's criticism had not been directed at the decisions of the Administrative Court, but at Mr Wille's general attitude towards the Constitution.

15. The Prince added that it was left to his discretion whether or not to appoint a candidate for public office and that he was not obliged to give any reasons for such a decision. However, as he had known Mr Wille for many years, he had considered it appropriate to state the reasons for his decision regarding him. Moreover, the decision no longer to appoint him to the office of President of one of the highest courts, on account of his attitude in the past as well as the opinions expressed by him, did not amount to an interference with Mr Wille's rights to freedom of expression and to freedom of thought. All citizens were free to propose and to plead for amendments to constitutional or other legal provisions. However, Mr Wille, during his term of office as a member of the government and in his lecture, had not availed himself of such constitutional and democratic means, but had simply ignored those parts of the Constitution with which he disagreed.

16. The Prince further explained that the relevant provision, namely Article 112 of the Constitution, concerned the competence of the Constitutional Court to decide on the interpretation of the Constitution in case of a dispute between the government and the Diet. Confusing the terms "Government" and "Diet" with "Prince" or "people", as Mr Wille had done, would undermine the rule of law. As head of State, he was obliged to safeguard the constitutional order and the democratic rights of the people. He would be failing in his duties if he were to appoint to one of the highest judicial offices a person whom, owing to his attitude and the statements he had made, he could not regard as being committed to upholding the Constitution.

17. On 2 June 1995 the Prince sent to the applicant, President of the Administrative Court, an open letter which was published in Liechtenstein newspapers. The Prince noted that Mr Wille had made public at least part of the Prince's letter of 27 February 1995. As this had given rise to various comments, the Prince considered it necessary to explain his point of view in an open letter.

18. In his opinion, in a democratic State based on the rule of law (demokratischer Rechtsstaat), a distinction had to be drawn between freedom of expression and the means used by an individual for imposing his views in such a society. In that connection, the individual should respect the rules defined in the Constitution and other statutory provisions. The Prince further stated that it was the right of Mr Wille, in his position as a judge, to express the opinion that the monarchy was no longer opportune; that Article 7 of the Constitution should be amended; that the Prince should be subject to the jurisdiction of the Liechtenstein judiciary; and that the Liechtenstein Constitutional Court should be given supplementary competences. However, Mr Wille was not entitled to place himself above the existing Constitution or incite the Constitutional Court to lay claim to competences which were not vested in it by virtue of the Constitution. The Prince considered that Mr Wille, having regard to his education and professional experience, knew that the terms "people" ("Volk"), "Diet" ("Landtag"), "Government" ("Regierung") and "Prince" ("Fürst") and their respective rights and obligations were clearly defined in the Constitution. The applicant's contention that these terms were interchangeable would jeopardise the Constitution and the constitutional State as a whole.

19. The Prince also made reference to the political events in the autumn of 1992 and, lastly, he stated that, on the basis of the article in a Liechtenstein newspaper of 17 February 1995, he was forced to conclude that Mr Wille continued to have the intention of placing himself above the Liechtenstein Constitution. He explained that he had therefore intended to inform Mr Wille, in a personal letter and as early as possible, about his decision not to appoint him to public office in future.

20. In spring 1997 the applicant's term of office as President of the Administrative Court expired. On 14 April 1997 the Liechtenstein Diet decided to propose the applicant again as President of the Administrative Court.

21. In a letter of 17 April 1997 to the President of the Diet the Prince refused to accept the proposed appointment. He explained that, considering his experiences with Mr Wille, he had become convinced that Mr Wille did not feel bound by the Liechtenstein Constitution. In these circumstances, he would be failing in his duties as head of State if he were to appoint Mr Wille as President of the Administrative Court. The Prince further stated that Mr Wille, on account of his other professional qualifications, had made important contributions as a judge of the Administrative Court and that he (the Prince) could therefore understand the proposal made to a certain extent. If the Diet did not share his doubts regarding Mr Wille, it could elect him as associate judge of the Administrative Court.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW

23. The Principality of Liechtenstein is a constitutional, hereditary monarchy on a democratic and parliamentary basis; the power of the State is inherent in and emanates from the Prince and the people and shall be exercised by both of them in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution (Article 2 of the Constitution of 24 October 1921).

24. Chapter II of the Constitution is entitled "The Prince". In its Article 7, it stipulates that the Prince is the head of the State and exercises his sovereign authority in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution and of the other laws; and that his person is sacred and inviolable. Further competences are laid down in Articles 8 to 13. According to Article 11, the Prince appoints the State officials, in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution (see Article 79 concerning the head of the government, the government councillors and their substitutes; Article 97 concerning the president of the Administrative Court and his deputy; Article 99, in conjunction with the Court Organisation Act, concerning the first-instance judges; Article 102 § 3 concerning the members of the High Court (Obergericht) and the Supreme Court of Justice (Oberster Gerichtshof)). By letter of 28 April 1997, the Prince informed the Liechtenstein government that he instructed it to proceed, within its competence, with the appointment in 1997 of State officials who, pursuant to Article 11 of the Constitution, were to be appointed by the Prince.

25. Chapter IV of the Constitution contains the general rights and obligations of citizens of the Principality. Article 31 stipulates the equality of all citizens before the law, and also provides that the public offices are equally open to them, subject to observance of the legal regulations.

26. According to Article 97 of the Constitution, all decisions or orders by the government are subject to appeal before the Administrative Court. The Administrative Court consists of a president trained in the law and of his deputy, who are appointed by the Prince on the proposal of the Diet, and of four appeal judges and their substitutes, who are elected by the Diet. The president and his deputy must be Liechtenstein nationals. Their term of office coincides with that of the Diet, and ends at such time as they are replaced.

27. According to Article 104 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court is, inter alia, competent to protect rights accorded by the Constitution. Section 23 of the Constitutional Court Act (Staatsgerichtshofgesetz) provides that decisions of a court or of an administrative authority may be challenged before the Constitutional Court, by alleging that there has been an infringement of constitutional rights or of rights guaranteed under the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

28. Pursuant to Article 105 of the Constitution, in conjunction with section 4 of the Constitutional Court Act, the judges of the Constitutional Court are elected by the Diet; the election of the president and the deputy president are subject to confirmation by the Prince.

29. Article 112 of the Constitution reads as follows:

> "If doubts arise as to the interpretation of specific provisions of the Constitution and cannot be dispelled on the basis of an agreement between the Government and the Diet, the Constitutional Court is called upon to decide on the matter."

"Wenn über die Auslegung einzelner Bestimmungen der Verfassung Zweifel entstehen und nicht durch Übereinkunft zwischen der Regierung und dem Landtage beseitigt werden können, so hat hierüber der Staatsgerichtshof zu entscheiden."

30. In 1991 the Liechtenstein government introduced a bill in Parliament with the object of amending the Constitutional Court Act of 1925. In its comments on the provision regarding the Constitutional Court's competence to decide on the interpretation of specific provisions of the Constitution, the government explained, inter alia, its views on the wording and purpose of Article 112 of the Constitution and in particular on the term "Government" which should be understood as referring to the Prince. At the preparatory stage, the Prince, in a letter addressed to the applicant, who at the time held the office of deputy head of the Liechtenstein government, had stated his disagreement with the proposed interpretation. The applicant explained the bill in Parliament when it received its first reading in April 1992. In the course of the discussions, the President of the Parliament questioned the interpretation of Article 112 of the Constitution, as contained in the government's comments. The bill was passed by the Diet on 11 November 1992; however, the Prince failed to sign it so that it did not enter into force.

31. Under section 20 of the Liechtenstein Court Organisation Act (Gerichtsorganisationsgesetz, LGBl 1922 Nr. 16), judges are required to swear an oath, including the duties of loyalty to the Prince and of obedience to the laws and the Constitution.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

32. Mr Herbert Wille applied to the Commission on 25 August 1995. He alleged that following a public lecture he had given on issues of constitutional law the monarch of Liechtenstein, His Serene Highness Prince Hans-Adam II, as announced in a letter, decided not to appoint the applicant to public office in the future. This measure constituted a violation of his rights under Articles 6, 10, 13 and 14 of the Convention.

33. The Commission declared the application (no. 28396/95) admissible on 27 May 1997. In its report of 17 September 1998 (former Article 31 of the Convention), it expressed the opinion that there had been a violation of Article 10 (fifteen votes to four); that it was not necessary to determine whether there had been a violation of Article 6 (seventeen votes to two); that there had been a violation of Article 13 taken in conjunction with Article 10 (sixteen votes to three); and that no separate issue arose under Article 14 taken in conjunction with Article 10 (seventeen votes to two).

The full text of the Commission's opinion and of the three dissenting opinions contained in the report is reproduced as an annex to this judgment[1].

FINAL SUBMISSIONS TO THE COURT

34. In his memorial, the applicant requested the Court to find the respondent State in breach of its obligations under Articles 10 and 13 of the Convention and to award him just satisfaction under Article 41.

The Government, for their part, invited the Court to dismiss the applicant's complaints under Articles 10 and 13 of the Convention.

THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 10 OF THE CONVENTION

35. The applicant complained that, on account of the views expressed by him in the course of a public lecture on constitutional law at the Liechtenstein-Institut on 16 February 1995, the monarch of Liechtenstein, His Serene Highness Prince Hans-Adam II, in a letter addressed to him, announced his intention not to appoint the applicant to a public office again. He considered that this constituted a breach of his right to freedom of expression as guaranteed by Article 10 of the Convention, which reads:

> "1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.
> 2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary."

1. Note by the Registry. For practical reasons this annex will appear only with the final printed version of the judgment (in the official reports of selected judgments and decisions of the Court), but a copy of the Commission's report is obtainable from the Registry.

A. As to the applicability of Article 10 and the existence of an interference

36. The applicant submitted that the Prince's decision not to appoint him to a public office in the future should he be proposed by the Diet or any other body as expressed in the Prince's letter of 27 February 1995 constituted an immediate reaction to his academic speech delivered a few days before and could not be considered anything else but a sanction for the expression of his legal opinion. Although the Convention did not guarantee a right of access to the civil service, civil servants nevertheless enjoyed the protection of Article 10.

37. The Government submitted that the applicant's speech and the Prince's reaction thereto expressed in his letter of 27 February 1995 should be considered against the background of an ongoing political debate in Liechtenstein regarding the Prince's authority and should not be seen in isolation. In 1992 there was a controversy between the Prince and the government over the date of a referendum for accession to the European Economic Area. The applicant was then a member of the Liechtenstein government, deputy head of the government and in charge of the justice portfolio. In the course of that controversy the applicant had expressed the view that, under Article 112 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court had the power to decide on the interpretation of the Constitution in case of a disagreement between the Prince and the Diet. At the same time the Diet was considering a draft amendment to the Constitutional Court Act. In the explanatory report thereon the applicant had expressed the same opinion. In both cases the Prince had directly contradicted the applicant. Nevertheless, in December 1993, he had appointed the applicant President of the Administrative Court. Thus the Prince's letter essentially expressed the Prince's disappointment and surprise that the applicant, despite a previous compromise on the controversy regarding the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, had given a public speech on this issue although he must have known that the Prince could not have been in agreement with the opinion expressed.

38. The Prince's letter to the applicant of 27 February 1995 was a personal letter not intended for the general public and sent to the applicant's private address. It did not constitute an act of State but was rather the notice of an intent to make a decision at a later time. The letter did not have a direct impact on the applicant's legal status. He was not dismissed from office nor was his professional activity as President of the Administrative Court obstructed in any other way. But even if the Prince's letter could be construed as an act of State, the Convention would not be applicable to the case. As the sanction was the refusal to appoint the applicant to a specific public office, it did not affect the applicant in any of his rights, as there was no right, either under Liechtenstein law or under the Convention, to be appointed to such office. Article 10 did not apply when the central issue was a question of access to public office.

39. The Commission essentially agreed with the applicant. It found that the Prince's decision, as expressed in his letter of 27 February 1995, not to appoint the applicant in the future to public office was an interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression as secured in Article 10 of the Convention.

40. The Court will first deal with the Government's argument that the case essentially concerns access to the civil service, a right not guaranteed by the Convention.

41. In this connection the Court points out that the right of recruitment to the civil service was deliberately omitted from the Convention. Consequently, the refusal to appoint a person as a civil servant cannot as such provide the basis for a complaint under the Convention. This does not mean, however, that a person who has been appointed as a civil servant cannot complain of being dismissed if that dismissal violates one of his or her rights under the Convention. Civil servants do not fall outside the scope of the Convention. In Articles 1 and 14, the Convention stipulates that "everyone within [the] jurisdiction" of the Contracting States must enjoy the rights and freedoms in Section I "without discrimination on any ground". Moreover, Article 11 § 2 in fine, which allows States to impose special restrictions on the exercise of the freedoms of assembly and association by "members of the armed forces, of the police or of the administration of the State", confirms that as a general rule the guarantees in the Convention extend to civil servants (see the Glasenapp and Kosiek v. Germany judgments of 28 August 1986, Series A nos. 104, p. 26, § 49, and 105, p. 20, § 35, and the Vogt v. Germany judgment of 26 September 1995, Series A no. 323, pp. 22-23, § 43).

42. Accordingly, the status of civil servant obtained by the applicant when he was appointed President of the Liechtenstein Administrative Court did not deprive him of the protection of Article 10.

43. In order to determine whether this provision was infringed it must first be ascertained whether the disputed measure amounted to an interference with the exercise of freedom of expression – in the form of a "formality, condition, restriction or penalty" – or whether it lay within the sphere of the right of access to the civil service, a right not secured in the Convention. In order to answer this question, the scope of the measure must be determined by putting it in the context of the facts of the case and of the relevant legislation (see the Glasenapp and Kosiek judgments cited above, p. 26, § 50, and p. 20, § 36).

44. In the Glasenapp and Kosiek cases, the Court analysed the action of the authorities as a refusal to grant the applicants access to the civil service on the ground that they did not possess one of the necessary qualifications. In the Vogt case, the Court found that Mrs Vogt, for her part, had been a permanent civil servant since February 1979. She was suspended in August 1986 and dismissed in 1987. It concluded that there was indeed an interference with the exercise of the right protected by Article 10 of the Convention (see the Vogt judgment cited above, p. 23, § 44). In the instant case, the Court considers likewise that recruitment to the civil service does not lie at the heart of the issue submitted to it. Even though the Prince raised the matter of a possible reappointment of the applicant as President of the Administrative Court in the future, his communications to the applicant essentially consisted in a reprimand for the opinions the latter had expressed previously.

45. The Government argue that the Prince's letter of 27 February 1995 was merely an advance announcement of a possible decision to be taken by the Prince in the future; thus it was a private letter and could not be equated to a sanction.

46. The Court reiterates in this connection that the responsibility of a State under the Convention may arise for acts of all its organs, agents and servants. As is the case in international law generally, their rank is immaterial since the acts by persons accomplished in an official capacity are imputed to the State in any case. In particular, the obligations of a Contracting Party under the Convention can be violated by any person exercising an official function vested in him (see Ireland v. the United Kingdom, application no. 5310/71, Commission's report of 25 January 1976, Yearbook 19, p. 758).

47. The Court notes that the Principality of Liechtenstein is a constitutional hereditary monarchy on a democratic and parliamentary basis; the power of the State is inherent in and emanates from the Prince and the people and shall be exercised by both of them in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution (Article 2 of the Constitution). Chapter II of the Constitution specifies various sovereign powers of the Prince, inter alia, the appointment of State officials (Article 11 of the Constitution).

48. The Court further notes that the applicant had been appointed President of the Liechtenstein Administrative Court in December 1993. On 27 February 1995 the Prince of Liechtenstein, in a letter to the applicant, informed him of his intention not to appoint him to public office again, should he be proposed by the Diet or any other body. The Prince's letter was prompted, and this is not in dispute between the parties, by a report in the Liechtensteiner Volksblatt concerning the lecture given by the applicant on 16 February 1995 on the nature and functions of the Liechtenstein Constitutional Court, including a statement that the competence of that court under the Constitution could, in matters of interpretation of the Constitution, extend to disputes involving the powers of the Prince. According to the latter, the views thus expressed by the applicant infringed the Constitution, and the applicant's attitude towards the Constitution made him unsuitable for public office. The Prince confirmed his intention not to appoint the applicant in subsequent letters of 4 April and 2 June 1995 and eventually, by letter of 17 April 1997, refused to reappoint the applicant as President of the Administrative Court after he had been proposed for this post by the Diet. Hence the Court cannot accept the argument that the letters of the Prince were private correspondence and did not constitute an act of State.

49. In examining whether there has been an interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression the Court finds that the Prince's letter of 27 February 1995 should be at the centre of its attention as it expressed for the first time the Prince's intentions vis-à-vis the applicant. However, this measure has to be seen in the context of the Prince's subsequent communications which confirmed these intentions.

50. Considering the contents of this letter the Court finds that there has been an interference by a State authority with the applicant's freedom of expression. The measure complained of occurred in the middle of the applicant's term of office as President of the Administrative Court; it was unconnected with any concrete recruitment procedure involving an appraisal of personal qualifications. From the terms of the letter of 27 February 1995 it appears that the Prince had come to a resolution regarding his future conduct towards the applicant, which related to the exercise of one of his sovereign powers, that is his power to appoint State officials. Moreover, the said letter was expressly addressed to the applicant as President of the Administrative Court, though sent to his place of residence. Thus, the measure complained of was taken by an organ which was competent to act in the manner it did and whose acts engaged the responsibility of Liechtenstein as a State under the Convention. The right of the applicant to exercise his freedom of expression was interfered with once the Prince, criticising the contents of the applicant's speech, announced the intention to sanction the applicant because he had freely expressed his opinion. The announcement by the Prince of his intention not to reappoint the applicant to a public post constituted a reprimand for the previous exercise by the applicant of his right to freedom of expression and, moreover, had a chilling effect on the exercise by the applicant of his freedom of expression, as it was likely to discourage him from making statements of that kind in the future.

51. It follows that there was an interference with the exercise of the applicant's right to freedom of expression, as secured in Article 10 § 1.

B. As to whether the interference was justified

52. Such an interference gives rise to a breach of Article 10 unless it can be shown that it was "prescribed by law", pursued one or more legitimate aim or aims as defined in paragraph 2 and was "necessary in a democratic society" to attain them.

1. "Prescribed by law" and legitimate aim

53. The applicant submitted that the interference complained of did not have any legal basis in Liechtenstein law. In particular, it had been unforeseeable for him that as a reaction to his speech the Prince would impose such a serious and far-reaching sanction. Furthermore the Prince's measure did not pursue any legitimate aim.

54. In the Government's view the interference, if there had been any, was justified on account of the applicant's violation of judicial norms of conduct and of his oath of office under Liechtenstein law, which included swearing loyalty to the Prince and obedience to the Constitution and the laws. Furthermore, the aim of the interference was to maintain public order and promote civil stability, and to preserve judicial independence and impartiality.

55. The Commission found that in examining the justification of the interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression, the central issue was whether this interference was "necessary in a democratic society". In view of the conclusions it reached with regard to this third condition, it did not find it necessary to examine compliance with the first two conditions.

56. Assuming that the interference was prescribed by law and pursued a legitimate aim, as the Government claimed, the Court considers that it was not "necessary in a democratic society", for the following reasons.

2. "Necessary in a democratic society"

57. The applicant submitted that the measure complained of constituted an interference with his right to freedom of expression which could not be justified under paragraph 2 of Article 10 as it was not "necessary in a democratic society".

58. The Commission shared this opinion while it was contested by the Government.

59. The Government submitted that Article 10 § 2 granted States a wide margin of appreciation in determining what political conduct was incompatible with the "decorum of judicial office". At the hearing they explained that beyond a certain level in the public service, dissenting from those who were free to appoint, reappoint or dismiss high-ranking officials, including (high-ranking) judges, carries a certain risk, a risk known to all concerned and so far not regarded as a violation of human rights. In their view, it was inherent in the nature of judicial office that a particularly high degree of self-restraint be observed by the holder of such office in making public pronouncements which had a political flavour.

60. The Government considered that the applicant's lecture on the functions of the Liechtenstein Constitutional Court contained a controversial political statement and a subtle but significant provocation of one of the sovereigns of Liechtenstein. The applicant had been aware that his statement regarding the competence of the Constitutional Court to decide in the event of a conflict between the Prince and Parliament contradicted the Prince's view, supported by the text of the Constitution, that he was completely immune from the compulsory jurisdiction of any court. In their submission, the applicant was invited as a judge to give a lecture, and he used the opportunity to make his own political and legal beliefs public. He thereby put at risk the public trust in judicial independence and impartiality.

61. The Court recalls that in its above-mentioned Vogt judgment (pp. 25-26, § 52) it summarised as follows the basic principles concerning Article 10 as laid down in its case-law:

(i) Freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and each individual's self-fulfilment. Subject to paragraph 2 of Article 10, it is applicable not only to "information" or "ideas" that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offend, shock or disturb; such are the demands of that pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness without which there is no "democratic society". Freedom of expression, as enshrined in Article 10, is subject to a number of exceptions which, however, must be narrowly interpreted, and the necessity for any restrictions must be convincingly established.

(ii) The adjective "necessary", within the meaning of Article 10 § 2, implies the existence of a "pressing social need". The Contracting States have a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether such a need exists, but it goes hand in hand with a European supervision, embracing both the law and the decisions applying it, even those given by independent courts. The Court is therefore empowered to give the final ruling on whether a "restriction" is reconcilable with freedom of expression as protected by Article 10.

(iii) The Court's task, in exercising its supervisory jurisdiction, is not to take the place of the competent national authorities but rather to review under Article 10 the decisions they delivered pursuant to their power of appreciation. This does not mean that the supervision is limited to ascertaining whether the respondent State exercised its discretion reasonably, carefully or in good faith; what the Court has to do is to look at the interference complained of in the light of the case as a whole and determine whether it was "proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued" and whether the reasons adduced by the national authorities to justify it are "relevant and sufficient". In so doing, the Court has to satisfy itself that the national authorities applied standards which were in conformity with the principles embodied in Article 10 and, moreover, that they based their decisions on an acceptable assessment of the relevant facts.

62. In the same judgment the Court declared:

> "These principles apply also to civil servants. Although it is legitimate for a State to impose on civil servants, on account of their status, a duty of discretion, civil servants are individuals and, as such, qualify for the protection of Article 10 of the Convention. It therefore falls to the Court, having regard to the circumstances of each case, to determine whether a fair balance has been struck between the fundamental right of the individual to freedom of expression and the legitimate interest of a democratic State in ensuring that its civil service properly furthers the purposes enumerated in Article 10 § 2. In carrying out this review, the Court will bear in mind that whenever civil servants' right to freedom of expression is in issue the 'duties and responsibilities' referred to in Article 10 § 2 assume a special significance, which justifies leaving to the national authorities a certain margin of appreciation in determining whether the impugned interference is proportionate to the above aim." (p. 26, § 53, and the Ahmed and Others v. the United Kingdom judgment of 2 September 1998, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1998-VI, p. 2378, § 56)

63. In assessing whether the measure taken by the Prince as a reaction to the statement made by the applicant in the course of his lecture on 16 February 1995 corresponded to a "pressing social need" and was "proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued", the Court will consider the impugned statement in the light of the case as a whole. It will attach particular importance to the office held by the applicant, the applicant's statement, the context in which it was made and the reaction thereto.

64. In December 1993 the applicant was appointed President of the Administrative Court and he held this office when, on 16 February 1995, he gave the lecture at issue. Since the applicant was a high-ranking judge at that time, the Court must bear in mind that, whenever the right to freedom of expression of persons in such a position is at issue, the "duties and responsibilities" referred to in Article 10 § 2 assume a special significance since it can be expected of public officials serving in the judiciary that they should show restraint in exercising their freedom of expression in all cases where the authority and impartiality of the judiciary are likely to be called in question. Nevertheless the Court finds that an interference with the freedom of expression of a judge in a position such as the applicant's calls for close scrutiny on the part of the Court.

65. As regards the applicant's lecture on 16 February 1995, the Court observes that this lecture formed part of a series of academic lectures at a Liechtenstein research institute on questions of constitutional jurisdiction and fundamental rights (see paragraph 8 above). The applicant's discourse included a statement on the competences of the Constitutional Court under Article 112 of the Liechtenstein Constitution. It was the applicant's view that the term "Government" used in this provision included the Prince, an opinion allegedly in conflict with the principle of the Prince's immunity from the jurisdiction of the Liechtenstein judiciary (see paragraphs 24 and 29).

66. In the applicant's view this statement was an academic comment on the interpretation of Article 112 of the Constitution. The Government, on the other hand, maintained that although it was being made in the guise of a legally aseptic statement, it constituted, in essence, a highly political statement involving an attack on the existing constitutional order and not reconcilable with the public office held by the applicant at the time.

67. The Court accepts that the applicant's lecture, since it dealt with matters of constitutional law and more specifically with the issue of whether one of the sovereigns of the State was subject to the jurisdiction of a constitutional court, inevitably had political implications. It considers that questions of constitutional law, by their very nature, have political implications. It cannot find, however, that this element alone should have prevented the applicant from making any statement on this matter. The Court further observes that in the context of introducing a bill amending the Constitutional Court Act in 1991, the Liechtenstein government had, in its accompanying comments, held a similar view, which had been opposed by the Prince but had found agreement in the Liechtenstein Diet, albeit only by a majority (see paragraph 30 above). The opinion expressed by the applicant cannot be regarded as an untenable proposition since it was shared by a considerable number of persons in Liechtenstein. Moreover, there is no evidence to conclude that the applicant's lecture contained any remarks on pending cases, severe criticism of persons or public institutions or insults of high officials or the Prince.

68. Turning to the Prince's reaction, the Court observes that he announced his intention not to appoint the applicant to public office again, should the applicant be proposed by the Diet or any other body. The Prince considered that the above-mentioned statement by the applicant clearly infringed the Liechtenstein Constitution. In this context, he also made reference to a political controversy with the Liechtenstein government in October 1992 and, in conclusion, he reproached the applicant, who had been a member of the government at that time and President of the Liechtenstein Administrative Court since 1993, with regarding himself as not being bound by the Constitution. In the Prince's view, the applicant's attitude towards the Constitution made him unsuitable for public office (see paragraph 11 above).

69. The Prince's reaction was based on general inferences drawn from the applicant's previous conduct in his position as a member of the government, in particular on the occasion of the political controversy in 1992, and his brief statement, as reported in the press, on a particular, though controversial, constitutional issue of judicial competence. No reference was made to any incident suggesting that the applicant's view, as expressed at the lecture in question, had a bearing on his performance as President of the Administrative Court or on any other pending or imminent proceedings. Also the Government did not refer to any instance where the applicant, in the pursuit of his judicial duties or otherwise, had acted in an objectionable way.

70. On the facts of the present case, the Court finds that, while relevant, the reasons relied on by the Government in order to justify the interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression are not sufficient to show that the interference complained of was "necessary in a democratic society". Even allowing for a certain margin of appreciation, the Prince's action appears disproportionate to the aim pursued. Accordingly the Court holds that there has been a violation of Article 10 of the Convention.

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONVENTION

71. The applicant complained that he did not have an effective judicial or other remedy enabling him to challenge the action taken by the Prince with regard to the opinion expressed on the occasion of his lecture. He relied on Article 13 of the Convention, which provides:

> "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in [the] Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

72. The Government disputed the above contention, emphasising that a remedy existed of which the applicant had failed to avail himself.

At the hearing the Government submitted that there were strong indications in the case-law of the Constitutional Court that it would not only consider a court or an administrative authority but also the Diet as one of the bodies against which a request for adjudication could be lodged with the Constitutional Court under Section 23 of the Constitutional Court Act. The applicant therefore had at his disposal an effective remedy within the meaning of Article 13 of the Convention as he could and should have challenged the Diet's failure to insist on his nomination as President of the Administrative Court.

73. In the applicant's submission, a request for adjudication to the Constitutional Court under Section 23 of the Constitutional Court Act required that the decision complained of should emanate from a court or an administrative authority. The Prince, however, was neither of these.

74. The Commission agreed with the applicant. It found that the Government had not succeeded in showing that, against the violation of Article 10 of the Convention alleged by the applicant, a remedy effective in practice as well as in law existed under Liechtenstein law. In particular, as regards a complaint with the Constitutional Court the Government had not put forward any example showing its application in a case similar to the present one.

75. Article 13 has been consistently interpreted by the Court as requiring a remedy in domestic law only in respect of grievances which can be regarded as "arguable" in terms of the Convention (see the Boyle and Rice v. the United Kingdom judgment of 27 April 1988, Series A no. 131, p. 23, § 52, and the Powell and Rayner v. the United Kingdom judgment of 21 February 1990, Series A no. 172, p. 14, § 31). Article 13 guarantees the availability at the national level of a remedy to enforce the substance of the Convention rights and freedoms in whatever form they might happen to be secured in the domestic legal order. The effect of this Article is thus to require the provision of a domestic remedy allowing the "competent national authority" both to deal with the substance of the relevant Convention complaint and to grant appropriate relief, although Contracting States are afforded some discretion as to the manner in which they conform to their obligation under this provision. The remedy must be "effective" in practice as well as in law (see the Mentes and Others v. Turkey judgment of 28 November 1997, Reports 1997-VIII, p. 2715, § 89).

76. In the light of the conclusion in paragraph 70 above, the requirement that the complaint be "arguable" is satisfied in respect of the submission in question (see the Vereinigung demokratischer Soldaten Österreichs and Gubi v. Austria judgment of 19 December 1994, Series A no. 302, p. 20, § 53).

77. As regards the Government's argument that the applicant should have seised the Constitutional Court against the Diet for not having insisted on its right to nominate him for a new term of office as President of the Administrative Court, it suffices to note that the applicant's complaint under Article 10 concerned acts by the Prince and not by the Diet. The Government, however, have failed to show that there exists any precedent in the Constitutional Court's case-law, since its establishment in 1925, that that court has ever accepted for adjudication a complaint brought against the Prince. They have therefore failed to show that such a remedy would have been effective.

78. It follows that the applicant has also been the victim of a violation of Article 13.

III. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 6 OF THE CONVENTION AND OF ARTICLE 14 TAKEN IN CONJUNCTION WITH ARTICLE 10

79. Before the Commission the applicant further alleged that he had been denied access to a tribunal to defend his reputation and seek protection of his personal rights, including his occupation and professional career, against the statements of the Prince. He relied on Article 6 § 1 of the Convention, the relevant part of which provides:

> "In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law …"

80. Before the Commission the applicant also complained that, because of his opinion regarding a particular legal issue, he was prejudiced in his access to public office. He relied on Article 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with Article 10. Article 14 of the Convention states:

> "The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in [the] Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status."

81. As regards the complaint under Article 6, the Commission found it appropriate to examine this complaint in relation to the more general obligation on States under Article 13 to provide an effective remedy in respect of violations of the Convention. It concluded that it was not necessary to determine whether there had been a violation of Article 6. As regards the complaint under Article 14, the Commission, having regard to its conclusion concerning Article 10, found that no separate issue arose under Article 14 taken in conjunction with Article 10.

82. Before the Court the applicant did not reiterate these complaints and the Court does not find it necessary to deal with the matter of its own motion.

IV. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 41 OF THE CONVENTION

83. The applicant sought just satisfaction under Article 41 of the Convention, which provides:

> "If the Court finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. Damage

84. Under the head of pecuniary damage, the applicant claimed 25,000 Swiss francs (CHF) compensation for economic loss suffered by him as a consequence of the measure complained of. He submitted that, unlike his predecessors, he had not been offered any remunerated position in Liechtenstein industrial and business circles.

85. The Government objected to this claim.

86. The Court finds that there is no sufficient causal link established between the damage claimed and the violation of the Convention found. Thus, it cannot allow the compensation claim submitted under this head.

87. Under the head of non-pecuniary damage, the applicant claimed CHF 30,000. He submitted that the Prince's statements had been highly offensive and had adversely affected his reputation.

88. The Government also opposed this claim.

89. The Court considers that the applicant may be taken to have suffered distress on account of the facts of the case. On an equitable basis, the Court awards him CHF 10,000 for non-pecuniary damage.

B. Costs and expenses

90. In respect of costs and expenses relating to his representation before the Convention institutions, the applicant claimed a total of CHF 91,014.05, namely CHF 44,927.20 for Mr Kley and CHF 46,086.85 for Mr Seeger.

91. The Government did not contest this claim.

92. The Court is satisfied that the hourly rates charged in the Strasbourg proceedings were reasonable. Taking into account that a hearing was held both before the Commission and the Court, it also finds the number of hours claimed not excessive. The claim for costs and expenses is thus to be allowed in its entirety.

C. Default interest

93. According to the information available to the Court, the statutory rate of interest applicable in Liechtenstein at the date of adoption of the present judgment is 5% per annum.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Holds by sixteen votes to one that there has been a violation of Article 10 of the Convention;

2. Holds by sixteen votes to one that there has been a violation of Article 13 of the Convention;

3. Holds unanimously that it is not necessary to consider whether there has been a violation of Article 6 of the Convention and of Article 14 taken in conjunction with Article 10;

4. Holds unanimously
   (a) that the respondent State is to pay the applicant, within three months, the following amounts:
      (i) 10,000 (ten thousand) Swiss francs for non-pecuniary damage;
      (ii) 91,014.05 (ninety-one thousand and fourteen) Swiss francs and five centimes for costs and expenses;

(b) that simple interest at an annual rate of 5% shall be payable from the expiry of the above-mentioned three months until settlement;

5. Dismisses unanimously the remainder of the applicant's claims for just satisfaction.

Done in English and in French, and delivered at a public hearing in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 28 October 1999.

JOINT CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGES CAFLISCH, ZUPANCIC AND HEDIGAN

We concur with the Court in its judgment but should like to enter a reservation as to the Court's reasoning in finding a violation of Article 10.

The matter complained of by the applicant, who alleged that it amounted to an interference with a right guaranteed by Article 10, is held to have been completed by the first letter written by HSH Prince Hans-Adam II of Liechtenstein. We do not share that view. The letter in question was dated 27 February 1995. At that juncture it could be regarded as the mere expression of an intention, which might very well have changed in the months that followed and which only crystallised into an "interference" with the Prince's subsequent confirming communications. Only in the light of the latter can it be accepted that the threat of a sanction indeed hung over the applicant. Furthermore, taken alone, the letter of 27 February 1995 could have been regarded as the expression of a private personal opinion. It is the subsequent confirming letters which justify concluding, without any possible doubt, that this measure was, in fact, an act of State.

We thus reach the conclusion that the measure which infringed the right guaranteed by Article 10 consisted in the Prince's communications taken as a whole.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE CABRAL BARRETO

(Translation)

I regret that I cannot share the opinion of the majority of the Court; in my opinion, there has not been a violation of the applicant's right to freedom of expression.

There are two decisive pieces of evidence in the case: the Prince's letter of 27 February 1995, in which the Prince expressed for the first time his intention of not reappointing the applicant as President of the Administrative Court, and the letter of 17 April 1997 to the President of the Diet, in which the Prince refused to make that appointment.

Let us examine these.

1. The letter of 27 February 1995 was a personal letter, sent to the applicant's private address, in which the Prince indicated his intention of not appointing the applicant to any public office again.

It will, I think, be helpful to reproduce the following passage:

> "In my eyes your attitude, Dr Wille, makes you unsuitable for public office. I do not intend to get involved in a long public or private debate with you, but I should like to inform you in good time that I shall not appoint you again to a public office should you be proposed by the Diet or any other body …"

I note at the outset that the Prince did not wish to get involved in a public discussion and that he merely wanted to indicate in good time his intention of taking a certain course of action if the opportunity arose.

I have difficulty in seeing how this letter constituted a "reprimand" (see paragraph 50 of the judgment).

The letter expressed above all the Prince's disagreement with the applicant's ideas about the interpretation of the Liechtenstein Constitution. That disagreement entailed the loss of the political confidence which the Prince was supposed to have in the applicant and consequently the announcement that the Prince intended to draw the necessary political conclusions.

Nothing more, in other words, than what the applicant could expect, regard being had to the controversy in 1992 between the Prince and the government (of which the applicant was then a member).

An intention does not, in itself, amount to a legal act or even an initial step towards performing such an act.

There is no doubt that we are here in the purely psychological field, still far from even a preparatory act, which would presuppose that physical acts had already been performed.

I would therefore be able to understand that the Prince's letter should be judged as having been quite simply designed to announce "in good time" his intention of carrying out an act, in order to give the applicant time to make the necessary preparations for his future.

It is true that this private letter announcing an intention became public and that it was confirmed by the other letters from the Prince, which were open letters.

All that, however, was due solely to the applicant's conduct and, as Mr Conforti rightly said in his dissenting opinion annexed to the Commission's report, the applicant cannot "avoid the application of the principle nemo contra factum suum proprium venire potest".

Accepting the contrary would, to my mind, contravene the letter and the spirit of Article 10 of the Convention. It is not possible to judge intentions without falling into the realm of a "virtual" violation, and that seems to me to be what has happened in the instant case.

2. The refusal to reappoint the applicant as President of the Administrative Court was, without any doubt, a legal act, and in the circumstances of the case I can accept that it was prompted by the opinions that the applicant had expressed, and that poses a problem under Article 10.

However, I consider that it is unnecessary to determine whether that refusal pursued a legitimate aim and whether it was necessary in a democratic society, since no one will dispute that we are here in the field of access to public office, a subject which was deliberately omitted from the Convention. That is acknowledged by the majority of the Court in paragraph 41 of the judgment.

I therefore conclude that there has been no violation of the Convention.

EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

COURT (PLENARY)

CASES OF DE WILDE, OOMS AND VERSYP ("VAGRANCY")
v. BELGIUM (MERITS)

(Application no. 2832/66; 2835/66; 2899/66)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

18 June 1971

In the De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp cases,

The European Court of Human Rights, taking its decision in plenary session in accordance with Rule 48 of its Rules and composed of the following Judges:

Sir Humphrey WALDOCK, President,
MM. H. ROLIN,
R. CASSIN,
Å.E.V. HOLMBÄCK,
A. VERDROSS,
E. RODENBOURG,
A.N.C. ROSS,
T. WOLD,
G. BALLADORE PALLIERI,
H. MOSLER,
M. ZEKIA,
A. FAVRE,
J. CREMONA,
S. BILGE,
G. WIARDA,
S. SIGURJÓNSSON,

and also Mr. M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr. J.F. SMYTH, Deputy Registrar, Decides as follows:

PROCEDURE

1. The De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp cases were referred to the Court by the Government of the Kingdom of Belgium ("the Government"). The cases have their origin in applications lodged in 1966 with the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission"), under Article 25 (art. 25) of the Convention, by Belgian nationals - Jacques De Wilde, Franz Ooms and Edgard Versyp - and concerning certain aspects of Belgian legislation on vagrancy and its application to these three persons. In 1967 the Commission ordered the joinder of the said applications insofar as they had been declared admissible and, on 19th July 1969, it adopted in their respect the report provided for in Article 31 (art. 31) of the Convention. The report was transmitted to the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on 24th September 1969.

The Government’s application, which referred to Articles 45, 47 and 48 (art. 45, art. 47, art. 48) of the Convention, was lodged with the Registry of the Court on 24th October 1969 within the period of three months laid down in Articles 32 (1) and 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47).

2. On 28th October 1969, the Registrar obtained from the Secretary of the Commission twenty-five copies of its report.

3. On 10th November 1969, the President of the Court drew by lot, in the presence of the Registrar, the names of six of the seven Judges called upon to sit as members of the Chamber, Mr. Henri Rolin, the elected Judge of Belgian nationality, being an ex officio member under Article 43 (art. 43) of the Convention. The six Judges so chosen were MM. Å. Holmbäck, A. Verdross, G. Balladore Pallieri, A. Favre, J. Cremona and S. Sigurjónsson. The President also drew by lot the names of three substitute Judges, namely MM. A. Bilge, E. Rodenbourg and G. Maridakis in this order.

Mr. Å. Holmbäck assumed the office of President of the Chamber in accordance with Rule 21, paragraph 7, of the Rules of Court.

4. The President of the Chamber ascertained, through the Registrar, the views of the Agent of the Government and of the President of the Commission on the procedure to be followed. By an Order of 23rd November 1969, he decided that the Government should file a memorial within a time-limit expiring on 15th February 1970 and that the Delegates of the Commission should have the right to reply in writing by 9th April 1970 as fixed by an Order of 12th February 1970. The respective memorials of the Government and the Commission reached the Registry on 9th February and 9th April 1970.

5. As authorised by the President of the Chamber in an Order of 18th April 1970, the Government filed a second memorial on 10th June 1970. On 1st July 1970, the Secretary of the Commission informed the Registrar that the Delegates did not wish to file a rejoinder.

6. On 10th January and 3rd March 1970, the President of the Chamber had instructed the Registrar to invite the Commission and the Government to produce a number of documents, which were placed on the file in February, April and May 1970.

7. At a meeting in Strasbourg on 28th May 1970, the Chamber decided, by virtue of Rule 48, "to relinquish jurisdiction forthwith in favour of the plenary Court" for the reason that the Commission had raised in the submissions of its memorial "certain questions on which it (was) desirable that the Court should be able to rule in plenary session".

Sir Humphrey Waldock assumed the office of President of the Court for the consideration of the present cases under Rule 21, paragraph 7, taken in conjunction with Rule 48, paragraph 3.

8. On 28th and 29th September 1970, the Court held a meeting in Paris to prepare the oral part of the procedure. On this occasion it decided to request the Commission and the Government to provide it with further documents and information which were received on 30th October and 16th November 1970, respectively.

Some other documents were filed by the Agent of the Government on 15th and 17th March 1971.

9. After having consulted the Agent of the Government and the Delegates of the Commission, the President decided, by Order of 1st October 1970, that the oral hearings should open on 16th November 1970.

10. The oral hearings began on the morning of 16th November 1970 in the Human Rights Building at Strasbourg. They continued during the two following days.

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government:
  Mr. J. DE MEYER, Professor
  at Louvain University, Assessor to the Council of State, Agent and Counsel;
- for the Commission:
  Mr. M. SØRENSEN, Principal Delegate, and
  Mr. W.F. DE GAAY FORTMAN, Delegate.

On the afternoon of 17th November, Mr. Sørensen informed the Court that the Delegates of the Commission intended to be assisted on a particular point by Me X. Magnée, avocat at the Brussels Bar. The Agent of the Belgian Government having expressed objections, the Court took note, by a judgment of 18th November, of the intention of the Delegates to avail themselves of the right conferred on them by Rule 29, paragraph 1, in fine.

The Court heard the addresses and submissions of Mr. Sørensen and Mr. De Meyer as well as their replies to the questions put by several Judges. It also heard, on the afternoon of 18th November, a short statement by Me Magnée of the point mentioned by the Principal Delegate.

The hearings were declared provisionally closed on 18th November.

11. Judge G. Maridakis, who had attended the oral hearings, could not take part in the consideration of the present cases after 31st December 1970, as the withdrawal of Greece from the Council of Europe became effective from that date.

12. After having made final the closure of the proceedings and deliberated in private, the Court gives the present judgment.

AS TO THE FACTS

13. The purpose of the Government’s application is to submit the De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp cases for judgment by the Court. On several points the Government therein expresses its disagreement with the opinion stated by the Commission in its report.

14. The facts of the three cases, as they appear from the said report, the memorials of the Government and of the Commission, the other documents produced and the addresses of the representatives appearing before the Court, may be summarised as follows:

A. De Wilde case

15. Jacques De Wilde, a Belgian citizen, born on 11th December 1928 at Charleroi, spent a large part of his childhood in orphanages. On coming of age, he enlisted in the French army (Foreign Legion) in which he served for seven and a half years. As a holder of books for a fifty per cent war disablement pension and a military retirement pension, he draws from the French authorities a sum which in 1966 amounted to 3,217 BF every quarter. He has work, from time to time at any rate, as an agricultural labourer.

16. The applicant reported on 18th April 1966 at 11.00 a.m. to the police station at Charleroi and declared that he had unsuccessfully looked for work and that he had neither a roof over his head nor money as the French Consulate at Charleroi had refused him an advance on the next instalment of his pension due on 6th May. He also stated that he had "never" up to then "been dealt with as a vagrant". On the same day at 12 noon, Mr. Meyskens, deputy superintendent of police, considered that De Wilde was in a state of vagrancy and put him at the disposal of the public prosecutor at Charleroi; at the same time, he asked the competent authorities to supply him with information about De Wilde. A few hours later, after being deprived of his liberty since 11.45 a.m., De Wilde attempted to escape. He was immediately caught by a policeman and he disputed the right of the police to "keep him under arrest for twenty four hours". He threatened to commit suicide.

The information note, dated 19th April 1966, showed that between 17th April 1951 and 19th November 1965 the applicant had had thirteen convictions by courts of summary jurisdiction or police courts and that, contrary to his allegations, he had been placed at the Government’s disposal five times as a vagrant.

17. On April 19th, at about 10 a.m., the police court at Charleroi, after satisfying itself as to "the identity, age, physical and mental state and manner of life" of De Wilde, decided, at a public hearing and after giving him an opportunity to reply, that the circumstances which caused De Wilde to be brought before the court had been established. In pursuance of Section 13 of the Act of 27th November 1891 "for the suppression of vagrancy and begging" ("the 1891 Act") the court placed the applicant "at the disposal of the Government to be detained in a vagrancy centre for two years" and directed "the public prosecution to execute the order".

18. After being first detained at the institution at Wortel and then from 22nd April 1966 at that of Merksplas, De Wilde was sent on 17th May 1966 to the medico-surgical centre at St. Gilles-Brussels from where he was returned to Merksplas on 9th June 1966. On 28th June 1966, he was transferred to the disciplinary prison at Turnhout for refusal to work (Section 7, sub-section 2, of the 1891 Act), and on 2nd August 1966 to that of Huy to appear before the criminal court which, on 19th August, sentenced him to three months' imprisonment for theft from a dwelling house. He was returned to Turnhout shortly afterwards.

19. On 31st May and 6th June 1966, that is, about a month and a half after his arrest and four weeks after sending his first letter to the Commission (3rd May 1966), the applicant wrote to the Minister of Justice invoking Articles 3 and 4 (art. 3, art. 4) of the Convention. He underlined the fact that on 6th May he had received 3,217 BF in respect of his pension and showed surprise that he had not yet been released. He also complained of being forced to work for the hourly wage of 1.75 BF. He added that he had refused to work in protest against the behaviour of the head of the block at Merksplas who had wrongfully claimed to be entitled to "take" from him 5% of his pension. Finally, he complained of the disciplinary measures taken on such refusal - punishment in a cell and confinement without privileges - and of hindrance to correspondence. On 7th June 1966, the Ministry of Justice requested the governor of the prison at St. Gilles to inform De Wilde "that his request for release" of 31st May would "be examined in due course".

The applicant took up his complaints again on 13th June and later on 12th July 1966. In this last letter, he enquired of the Minister why he had been transferred to the prison at Turnhout. He also pointed out that there was no work available at this institution which would enable him to earn his "release savings". On 15th July, the Ministry had him notified that his release before the prescribed period had expired could "be considered" "provided that his conduct at work (was) satisfactory" and "adequate arrangements for rehabilitation (had) been made".

De Wilde wrote again to the Minister on 8th August 1966. Due to his pension, he argued, he had "sufficient money"; in any case, "the results of (his) work" already amounted to more than 4,000 BF. As regards his rehabilitation, he stated that his detention made it "impossible"; it prevented him from corresponding freely with employers and the welfare officer had failed to help him. Nevertheless, on 12th August 1966, the Ministry considered that his application "(could) not at present be granted".

On 13th August 1966, the applicant wrote once again to the Minister claiming he could find board and lodging and work on a farm.

20. On 25th and 26th October 1966, the Ministry of Justice decided that, at the expiry of the sentence he had received on 19th August, the applicant could be released once his rehabilitation seemed ensured by the Social Rehabilitation Office of Charleroi (Section 15 of the 1891 Act).

De Wilde regained his freedom at Charleroi on 16th November 1966. His detention had lasted a little less than seven months, of which three months were spent serving the prison sentence.

21. According to a report of the Prisons' Administration, the applicant received only one disciplinary punishment between the beginning of his detention (19th April 1966) and the date of his application to the Commission (17th June 1966): for refusal to work at Merksplas, he was not permitted to go to the cinema or receive visits in the general visiting room until his transfer to Turnhout.

22. In his application lodged with the Commission on 17th June 1966 (No. 2832/66) De Wilde invoked Articles 3 and 4 (art. 3, art. 4) of the Convention. He complained in the first place of his "arbitrary detention" ordered in the absence of any offence on his part, without a conviction and in spite of his having financial resources. He also protested against the "slavery" and "servitude" which, in his view, resulted from being obliged to work in return for an absurdly low wage and under pain of disciplinary sanctions.

The Commission declared the application admissible on 7th April 1967; prior to this, the Commission had ordered the joinder of the case with the applications of Franz Ooms and Edgard Versyp.

B. Ooms case

23. On 21st December 1965 at 6.15 a.m., Franz Ooms, a Belgian citizen born on 12th April 1934 at Gilly, reported to Mr. Renier, deputy superintendent of police at Namur, in order "to be treated as a vagrant unless one of the social services (could find him) employment where (he could) be provided with board and lodging while waiting for regular work". He explained that of late he had been living with his mother at Jumet but that she could no longer provide for his upkeep; that he had lost a job as a scaffolding fitter at Marcinelle and, in spite of his efforts, had failed to find another job for over a month; that he no longer had any means of subsistence and that he had been "convicted" in 1959 for vagrancy by the police court at Jumet.

24. On the same day at about 10 a.m., the police court at Namur, after satisfying itself as to "the identity, age, physical and mental state and manner of life" of Franz Ooms, considered at a public hearing and after giving him an opportunity to reply that the circumstances which had caused him to be brought before the court had been established. In pursuance of Section 16 of the 1891 Act, the court placed him "at the disposal of the Government to be detained in an assistance home" and directed "the public prosecution to execute this order".

25. Ooms was detained partly at Wortel and partly at Merksplas. He also spent some weeks at the prison medico-surgical centre at St. Gilles-Brussels (June 1966).

26. On 12th April 1966, that is less than four months after his arrest and about five weeks before applying to the Commission (20th May 1966), the applicant petitioned the Minister of Justice for his release. He alleged he was suffering from tuberculosis and that his family had agreed to take him back with them and place him in a sanatorium. On 5th May, the Ministry, after receiving the unfavourable opinion of the doctor and of the director of the institution at Merksplas, considered the request to be premature.

Franz Ooms again made a petition for release on 6th June, this time to the Prime Minister. He pleaded that as "he had been ill since his detention" he had been unable to earn by his own work the 2,000 BF needed to make up his release savings, and repeated that his mother was willing to have him with her and to take care of him. The Ministry of Justice, to whom the Prime Minister's office had transmitted the request, also considered it to be premature; on 14th June, it requested the governor of St. Gilles prison to inform the applicant accordingly.

On 25th June 1966, the welfare department of the Salvation Army at Brussels certified that Franz Ooms would "be given work and lodging in (their) establishments immediately on his release". The applicant sent this declaration to the director of the welfare settlement at Wortel on 1st July, but without result.

His mother, Mme. Ooms, confirmed her son's declarations by letter of 15th July 1966 to the same director. In his reply of 22nd July, the director asked her to produce a certificate of employment, pointing out that "at the time of his possible discharge", the applicant had to have, besides a resting place, "a definite job by which he (could) ensure his upkeep".

Mme. Ooms also wrote to the Minister of Justice on 16th July, asking for a "pardon for (her) son". On 3rd August 1966, the Ministry informed her that he would be freed when "he (had) earned, by his prison work, the sum of money prescribed in the regulations as the release savings of vagrants interned for an indefinite period at the disposal of the Government".

In a report of 31st August 1966 drawn up for the Ministry of Justice, the director of the Wortel settlement pointed out that Franz Ooms had already received several criminal convictions, that this was his fourth detention for vagrancy, that his conduct could not be described as exemplary, and that his earnings amounted to only 400 BF. According to a medical certificate appended to the report, physical examinations of the applicant had revealed nothing wrong. As a result, on 6th September 1966, the Ministry instructed the director to inform the detainee "that his complaints had been found groundless".

On 26th September 1966, Ooms again petitioned the Prime Minister. To justify this step, he cited the negative attitude of the Department of Justice. He stated that he was the victim of "monstrous injustices" which he attributed to his being a Walloon. He alleged, in particular, that on 23rd March 1966, at Merksplas, he had been punished with three days in the cells and a month's confinement without privileges for refusing to sleep in a foul-smelling dormitory where the light was kept on all night, that he had been locked up naked and later "lightly clad" in a freezing cell which had brought on an attack of pneumonia and of tuberculosis for which he had had to spend three months in the sanatorium at the Merksplas institution. He also protested against the dismissal of the many petitions for release presented both by himself and by his mother. He finally declared his agreement to the opening of an enquiry for the purpose of verifying the truth of his allegations and he stated that he was ready to take action, if necessary, before a "national authority" within the meaning of Article 13 (art. 13) of the Convention.

Two days later, the Prime Minister's office informed the applicant that his letter had been transmitted to the Department of Justice.

Ooms was released ex officio at Charleroi on 21st December 1966, one year to the day after being put at the disposal of the Government (Section 18, first sentence, of the 1891 Act).

27. In his application lodged with the Commission on 20th May 1966 (No. 2835/66), the applicant mentioned that he was in the sanatorium of the Merksplas institution but that his mother had agreed to have him hospitalised in a "civil" clinic. He added that his illness completely prevented him from working and thereby earning the 2,000 BF for his release savings; in any case, he would need at least a year to earn such a sum, at the rate of 1.75 BF per hour. He was therefore surprised that the Ministry of Justice had considered his request for release to be premature.

Ooms, who had meanwhile been transferred to the prison at St. Gilles-Brussels, supplemented his original application on 15th June 1966. He declared that he had for the moment been cured of his pulmonary disease caused by ill-treatment and undernourishment, but his illness had left "traces" which made it impossible for him to perform "any heavy work". He also stressed that his mother, who was in receipt of a pension, wanted him home with her. In these circumstances he considered he was entitled to be released, and he complained of the Belgian authorities' refusal to recognise this right. Invoking Article 6, paragraph (3) (b) and (c) (art. 6-3-b, art. 6-3-c), of the Convention he further maintained that on his arrest he had asked in vain for free legal aid; this fact was contested before the Court by the Government's Agent.

That part of the application where Franz Ooms complained – apparently in subsequent letters - of ill-treatment and of a violation of his liberty of conscience and religion (Articles 3 and 9 of the Convention) (art. 3, art. 9) was declared inadmissible on 11th February 1967 as manifestly ill-founded (Appendix II to the Commission's report). On 7th April 1967, the Commission declared the remaining part of his application admissible, after having ordered its joinder with the applications of Jacques De Wilde and Edgard Versyp.

C. Versyp case

28. Edgard Versyp, a Belgian citizen born in Bruges on 26th April 1911, works, at least from time to time, as a draughtsman; he seems to have had his residence at Schaarbeek.

On 3rd November 1965, at 9 p.m., he appeared before Mr. Meura, deputy superintendent of police at Brussels; he carried a letter from the Social Rehabilitation Office requesting that he be given a night's shelter. He stated he had no fixed abode, no work or resources, and "(begged) to be sent to a welfare settlement"; he pointed out that he had "previously (been) in Merksplas" and did not wish for "any other solution". After spending the night in the municipal lock-up, where he had already been the night before, he was taken in charge by the Social Rehabilitation Office on 4th November at 9 a.m. On the same day, this office certified that so far as its services were concerned there was no objection to Versyp "being but in the charge of the prosecuting officer with a view to his possible placement in a state welfare settlement": he was "well-known to both (the) after-prison care and vagrancy sections" at the office and attempts so far to rehabilitate him had failed due to "his apathy, idleness and weakness for drink"; in any case, he refused "any other welfare action", except his detention. As a result, Versyp was immediately put at the disposal of the public prosecutor's office.

29. A few hours later, the police court in Brussels, having satisfied itself as to "the identity, age, physical and mental state and manner of life" of the applicant, considered, at a public hearing and after giving Edgard Versyp an opportunity to reply, that the circumstances which had caused him to be brought before the court had been established. In pursuance of Section 13 of the 1891 Act, the court placed him "at the disposal of the Government to be detained in a vagrancy centre for two years". It entrusted the execution of this order to the public prosecutor, who on that same day, 4th November 1965, required the director of the vagrancy centre of Merksplas to receive Versyp into his institution.

30. Versyp was detained at different times at Wortel, Merksplas and Turnhout.

31. On 7th February 1966, that is more than three months after his arrest and more than six months before applying to the Commission (16th August 1966), he wrote from Wortel to the Minister of Justice requesting his transfer to the solitary confinement division in Merksplas. His request was not transmitted to Brussels due to the imminent visit of the inspector-general who granted his request the next day.

On 10th May 1966, the applicant requested his transfer form Merksplas to the prison at St. Gilles-Brussels where, he thought, the Head of the Social Rehabilitation Service could succeed in getting him "work outside" to allow him "to live as an honest citizen". He stated that living "with other vagrants in Wortel and Merksplas" had "shattered" his morale and that he had neglected his work as he had had to receive treatment in hospital twice; he promised, however, to attend to "(his) business outside more efficiently in order to avoid a similar situation recurring". In a report of 16th May, the director of the Merksplas institution pointed out that Versyp, who had nine criminal convictions and had been detained four times for vagrancy, had spent the greater part of his detention in solitary confinement and could not adapt himself to communal life; the director therefore suggested his transfer to a solitary confinement prison (op zijn vraag naar een celgevangenis), in accordance with his request. As a result, he was sent on 23rd May to Turnhout Prison and not to that of St. Gilles; on 6th June, he complained of this to the Ministry of Justice, which ordered his return to Wortel.

On 22nd August 1966, Versyp begged the Ministry to grant him the opportunity of rehabilitating himself "in society according to (his) aptitudes through the good offices of the Brussels' Social Service". On 6th September, the authorities of the Wortel settlement informed him, on the instructions of the Ministry, that his case would be examined when the amount of his release savings showed that he was capable of doing a suitable job of work.

On 26th September, the applicant protested to the Ministry against this reply. According to him, he had been prevented "by devious means" from earning anything both at Wortel and Turnhout in order "that (he) could then be held for an even longer period". Thus, at Wortel they wanted to make him do work for which he was not fit - potato picking - and refused to give him other work which he was able to do. Furthermore, they had purported to forbid him to correspond with the Commission but without success as he had invoked the regulations and informed the public prosecutor's office. In short, he felt himself exposed to hostility which made him want to leave Wortel for Merksplas, or better still, for St. Gilles prison where, he claimed, the Social Rehabilitation Service would find him a suitable job and accommodation "in a hostel in Brussels".

The Ministry of Justice filed this letter without further action; on 28th September 1966, the director of the state welfare settlement at Wortel was requested so to inform the applicant.

Versyp was released on 10th August 1967, by virtue of a ministerial decision of 3rd August (Section 15 of the 1891 Act) and after one year, nine months and six days of detention. On 1st August the authorities of the Wortel settlement had given a favourable opinion on the new request for release which he had made some time before; they noted, amongst other things, that he would more easily find a job at that time than at the expiry of the term fixed in 1965 by the Brussels magistrate, that is in the month of November.

32. In the application which he lodged with the Commission on 16th August 1966 (No. 2899/66) and supplemented on 6th September 1966, the applicant invoked Articles 4, 5 and 6 (3) (c) (art. 4, art. 5, art. 6-3-c) of the Convention. He complained in the first place of his detention: he emphasised that he had a fixed abode at Brussels-Schaarbeek and had never begged and so he was surprised at having been placed in a vagrancy centre. He further alleged that he had had no opportunity of defending himself before the Brussels police court on 4th November 1965 as the hearing had lasted "scarcely two minutes" and he had not been granted free legal aid. He also complained of various features of the regime to which he was subjected. In order to prevent him accumulating the 2,000 BF required to constitute release savings, he had been left, he alleged, for several months without sufficient work. In a general way, he added, the directors of the various institutions acted in concert in order to prolong the detention of vagrants as much as possible; the Government, for its part, "encouraged" vagrancy which gave it a labour force almost without cost (1.75 BF per hour at manual work) and huge profits. Finally, Versyp maintained that his numerous letters addressed to the competent authorities, such as, for example, the inspector of prisons, the public prosecutor's office (July 1966) and the Minister of Justice (June and August 1966), invariably returned "to the director" who filed them without further action; these letters were not the object of any decision or, like his request for a transfer to Brussels, met with a refusal. One of them, that addressed on 7th February 1966 to the Minister of Justice by registered post, had even been opened by the director of the Wortel settlement who had not sent it.

On 7th April 1967, the Commission declared the application admissible; it had previously ordered its joinder with the applications of Jacques De Wilde and Franz Ooms.

D. Factors common to the three cases

33. According to Article 347 of the Belgian Criminal Code of 1867 "vagrants are persons who have no fixed abode, no means of subsistence and no regular trade or profession". These three conditions are cumulative: they must be fulfilled at the same time with regard to the same person.

34. Vagrancy was formerly a misdemeanour (Criminal Code of 1810) or a petty offence (Act of 6th March 1866), but no longer of itself constitutes a criminal offence since the entry into force of the 1891 Act: only "aggravated" vagrancy as defined in Articles 342 to 345 of the present Criminal Code is a criminal offence and these articles were not applied in respect of any of the three applicants. "Simple" vagrancy is dealt with under the 1891 Act.

35. According to Section 8 of the said Act "every person picked up as a vagrant shall be arrested and brought before the police court" - composed of one judge, a magistrate. The public prosecutor or the court may nonetheless decide that he be provisionally released (Section 11).

"The person arrested shall be brought before the magistrate within twenty-four hours and in his ordinary court, or at a hearing applied for by the public prosecutor for the following day". If that person so requests "he (shall be) granted a three days' adjournment in order to prepare his defence" (Section 3 of the Act of 1st May 1849); neither De Wilde, nor Ooms nor Versyp made use of this right.

36. Where, after having ascertained "the identity, age, physical and mental state and manner of life" of the person brought before him (Section 12), the magistrate considers that such person is a vagrant, Section 13 or Section 16 of the 1891 Act becomes applicable.

Section 13 deals with "able-bodied persons who, instead of working for their livelihood, exploit charity as professional beggars", and with "persons who through idleness, drunkenness or immorality live in a state of vagrancy"; Section 16 with "persons found begging or picked up as vagrants when none of the circumstances specified in Section 13 ... apply".

In the first case the court shall place the vagrant "at the disposal of the Government to be detained in a vagrancy centre, for not less than two and not more than seven years"; in the second case, the court may "place (him) at the disposal of the Government to be detained in an assistance home" for an indeterminate period which in no case can exceed a year (see paragraph 40 below).

Section 13 was applied to Jacques De Wilde and Edgard Versyp and Section 16 to Franz Ooms.

The distinction between the "reformatory institutions" referred to as "vagrancy centres" and "assistance homes" or "welfare settlements" (Sections 1 and 2 of the Act) has become a purely theoretical one; it has been replaced by a system of individual treatment of the persons detained.

Detention in a vagrancy centre is entered on a person's criminal record; furthermore, vagrants "placed at the disposal of the Government" suffer certain electoral incapacities (Articles 7 and 9 of the Electoral Code).

37. Magistrates form part of the judiciary and have the status of an officer vested with judicial power, with the guarantees of independence which this status implies (Articles 99 and 100 of the Constitution). The Court of Cassation, however, considers that the decisions given by them in accordance with Sections 13 and 16 of the 1891 Act are administrative acts and not judgments within the meaning of Section 15, sub-section 1, of the Act of 4th August 1832. They are not therefore subject to challenge or to appeal nor - except when they are ultra vires (see paragraph 159 of the Commission's report) – to cassation proceedings. The decisions of the highest court in Belgium are uniform on this point.

As to the Conseil d'État, it has so far had to deal with only two appeals for the annulment of detention orders for vagrancy. In a judgment of 21st December 1951 in the Vleminckx case, the Conseil d'État did not find it necessary to examine whether the Brussels police court's decision taken on 14th July 1950 in pursuance of Section 13 of the 1891 Act emanated from an authority which was "acting as an administrative authority within the meaning of Section 9 of the Act of 23rd December 1946"; the appeal lodged by Mr. Vleminckx on 31st July 1950 had been dismissed because:

> "the decision appealed against (was) a preliminary decision which (had been) followed by the Government's decision to detain the appellant in a vagrancy centre ...; the appellant (could) not establish that he (had) any interest in the annulment of a decision which merely (allowed) the Government to detain him, while the actual decision by which he was interned (had not) been appealed against".

As against this, on 7th June 1967, that is two months after the Commission had declared admissible the applications of Jacques De Wilde, Franz Ooms and Edgard Versyp, the Conseil d'État gave a judgment annulling the decision by which on 16th February 1965 the Ghent police court had placed a Mr. Du Bois at the disposal of the Government in pursuance of Section 16 of the 1891 Act. Before examining the merits, the Conseil d'État examined the admissibility - contested by the Minister of Justice - of the appeal lodged by Mr. Du Bois on 14th April 1965. In the light of the legislative texts in force, of the preparatory work thereto and of "the consistent case-law of the ordinary courts", the Conseil d'État considered that the placing of a vagrant at the disposal of the Government does not result from "the finding of a criminal offence" but amounts to "an administrative security measure" and that the decision ordering it is therefore "of a purely administrative nature" "so that no form of appeal is open to the person concerned ... before the ordinary courts". It added that "such an administrative decision by the magistrate" could not be considered as "a preliminary measure enabling the Government to take the effective decision on the matter of detention but is itself the effective decision placing the person concerned in a different legal position and is therefore of itself capable of constituting a grievance"; in any event, "the person concerned is immediately deprived of his liberty without any further decision by the Government".

Section 20, sub-section 2, of the Act of 23rd December 1946 constituting the Conseil d'État provides that where both this body and "an ordinary court rule that they are either competent or incompetent to entertain the same proceedings, the conflict of jurisdiction is settled, on the motion of the most diligent party, by the Court of Cassation" in plenary session. No such conflict appears to have come before the highest court of Belgium in vagrancy matters up to the present time.

The Belgian Government has had the reform of the 1891 Act under consideration for some time. According to the information given to the Court on 17th November 1970, the Bill which it is preparing to submit to Parliament provides in particular that an appeal against the magistrates' decisions may be made to the court of first instance.

38. "Able-bodied persons detained in a vagrancy centre or assistance home" are "required to perform the work prescribed in the institution" (Section 6 of the 1891 Act). Persons who, like Jacques De Wilde, and Edgard Versyp, refuse to comply with this requirement without good reason, in the opinion of the authorities, are liable to disciplinary measures. "Infirmity, illness or punishment may lead to a suspension, termination or stopping of work" (Articles 64 and 95, read in conjunction, of the Royal Decree of 21st May 1965 laying down general prison regulations).

"Unless stopped for disciplinary reasons", detained vagrants are entitled to "a daily wage" known as "allowances". Sums are retained "for administrative expenses" - "for the benefit of the State" – and "to form the release savings" which shall be "granted ... partly in cash and partly in clothing and tools". The Minister of Justice fixes the amount of the said release savings and, having regard to the various categories of detained persons and of work, the wages and the sums to be retained (Sections 6 and 17 of the 1891 Act; Articles 66 and 95, read in conjunction, of the Royal Decree of 21st May 1965).

At the time of the detention of the three applicants, the amount of the release savings which had to be thus accumulated - sums of money which a vagrant may receive from other sources not being taken into account - was fixed at 2,000 BF, at least for the "inmates" of welfare settlements (ministerial circular of 24th April 1964).

The minimum hourly allowance "actually paid" to detainees - save any deductions made for "wastage and poor work" - was 1,75 BF up to 1st November 1966, on which date it was increased by 25 centimes (ministerial circulars of 17th March 1964 and 10th October 1966). The allowance was not capable of assignment or liable to seizure in execution and was divided into two equal parts: "the reserved portion" which was credited to the person concerned and enabled him to form his release savings and the free portion which he received immediately (Articles 67 and 95, read in conjunction, of the Royal Decree of 21st May 1965).

39. According to Articles 20 to 24 and 95 of the Royal Decree of 21st May 1965, the correspondence of detained vagrants - who, in this as well as in other respects, are assimilated to convicted persons - may be subjected to censorship except any correspondence with the counsel of their own choice, the director of the institution, the inspector-general and the director-general of the prison administration, the secretary-general of the Ministry of Justice, the judicial authorities, the ministers, the chairmen of the legislative Chambers, the King, etc. Their correspondence with the Commission is not mentioned in this Decree but the Minister of Justice informed the governors of prisons and Social Protection Institutions, including those at Merksplas and Wortel, that "a letter addressed to this organ by a detainee is not to be censored but should be forwarded, duly stamped for abroad by the sender ..., to the Legal Department ... which shall undertake to transmit it to its destination" (circular of 7th September 1957 as it was in force at the time of the detention of the applicants; see also paragraph 31 above).

40. "Persons detained in an assistance home" - as Franz Ooms - may not "in any case be kept against their will for more than one year" (Section 18, first sentence, of the 1891 Act). They regain their freedom, as of right, before the expiry of this period "when their release savings (have reached) the amount ... fixed by the Minister of Justice", who shall, moreover, release them if he considers their detention "to be no longer necessary" (Sections 17 and 18, second sentence, of the 1891 Act).

As regards vagrants detained in a vagrancy centre - such as Jacques De Wilde and Edgard Versyp - they leave the centre either at the expiry of the period varying from two to seven years "fixed by the court" or at an earlier date if the Minister of Justice considers "that there is no reason to continue their detention" (Section 15 of the 1891 Act); the accumulation of the release savings and any other means which the detainee might have do not suffice for this purpose.

It seems that no detained vagrant has to date lodged an appeal with the Conseil d'État, under Article 9 of the Act of 23rd December 1946, for the annulment of a ministerial decision which had rejected his application for release.

41. Before the Commission and Sub-Commission, the three applicants invoked Articles 4, 5 (1), 5 (3), 5 (4), 6 (1), 6 (3) (b) and (c), 7, 8 and 13 (art. 4, art. 5-1, art. 5-3, art. 5-4, art. 6-1, art. 6-3-b, art. 6-3-c, art. 7, art. 8, art. 13) of the Convention. Two of them, De Wilde and Versyp, also alleged that Article 3 (art. 3) had not been observed.

42. In its report of 19th July 1969, the Commission expressed the opinion:

- that there was a violation of Articles 4 (art. 4) (nine votes to two), 5 (4) (art. 5-4) (nine votes to two) and 8 (art. 8) (ten votes to one);
- that there was no violation of Articles 3 (art. 3) (unanimous) and 5 (1) (art. 5-1) (ten votes to one);
- that Articles 5 (3) (art. 5-3) (unanimous), 6 (1) (art. 6-1) (ten votes to one), 6 (3) (art. 6-3) (ten votes to one) and 7 (art. 7) (unanimous) were inapplicable.

The Commission was further of the opinion that "it (was) no longer necessary to consider Article 13 (art. 13)" (unanimous).

The report contains several individual opinions, some concurring, others dissenting.

43. After the cases were brought before the Court the applicants repeated, and sometimes developed, in a memorandum which the Commission appended to its memorial, the greater part of their earlier arguments. They indicated their agreement or otherwise, according to the case, with the opinion of the Commission, to which De Wilde and Versyp "bowed" as regards Article 3 (art. 3) of the Convention.

AS TO THE LAW

I. ON THE QUESTIONS OF JURISDICTION AND ADMISSIBILITY RAISED IN THE PRESENT CASES

44. In its memorials of February and June 1970, the Government requested the Court, principally,

> "to declare that the applications introduced against Belgium by Jacques De Wilde on 17th June 1966, Franz Ooms on 20th May 1966 and Edgard Versyp on 16th August 1966, were not admissible as the applicants had failed to exhaust the domestic remedies and that therefore they should have been rejected by the European Commission of Human Rights under Article 26 and Article 27 (3) (art. 26, art. 27-3) of the Convention".

The Commission, for its part, requested the Court in its memorial of April 1970:

> "(1) In the first place:
> - to hold inadmissible the Belgian Government's request that it be declared that the Commission should have rejected the three applications under Articles 26 and 27, paragraph (3) (art. 26, art. 27-3), of the Convention, on the ground that the Court has no jurisdiction to pronounce on decisions by the Commission concerning the admissibility of applications;
> (2) alternatively:
> - to declare the said request inadmissible on the ground that the Belgian Government is debarred from making such a request to the Court since it did not raise the objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies before the Commission at the stage where the admissibility of the applications was under consideration;
> (3) in the further alternative:
> - to declare the said request ill-founded since, at the time when the three applications were submitted to the Commission, there was no effective remedy in Belgian law against decisions by magistrates in vagrancy cases".

45. At the oral hearings, the Agent of the Government submitted that it should please the Court:

> - "to find that it is fully competent to decide on the admissibility of the applications in the cases now before it and in particular to verify whether the applicants have or have not exhausted the domestic remedies";
> - "to find that the applications ... are inadmissible since the applicants failed to observe the provisions of Article 26 (art. 26) of the Convention".

The failure to observe Article 26 (art. 26) is alleged to have consisted not only in the non-exhaustion of domestic remedies but also, in the case of Edgard Versyp, in a failure to observe the six-month time-limit.

The Delegates of the Commission maintained without change the submissions on this point contained in their memorial of April 1970.

46. The Court is thus asked to consider, before any examination of the merits:

(1) whether it has jurisdiction to examine the contentions of the Government based on the alleged failure to comply with Article 26 (art. 26) of the Convention, either as regards the exhaustion of domestic remedies or as regards the six-month time-limit;

(2) if so, whether the Government must be held to be precluded from raising the inadmissibility of the applications, either on the ground of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies or, alternatively, in the case of Versyp, on the ground of his being out of time;

(3) if the Government is not held to be precluded, whether its contentions in regard to inadmissibility are well-founded.

A. As to the jurisdiction of the court to examine the submissions of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies and of delay made by the government against the applications accepted by the commission

47. In order to judge whether it has jurisdiction to examine the submissions of the Government objecting to the examination of the present applications, the Court refers to the text of the Convention and especially to Article 45 (art. 45) which determines its jurisdiction ratione materiae. This Article (art. 45) specifies that "the jurisdiction of the Court shall extend to all cases ("toutes les affaires") concerning the interpretation and application of the ... Convention which the High Contracting Parties or the Commission shall refer to it in accordance with Article 48 (art. 48)". Under this provision, as the Court pointed out in its judgment of 9th February 1967 ("Linguistic" case, Series A, p. 18), "the basis of the jurisdiction ratione materiae of the Court is established once the case raises a question of the interpretation or application of the Convention".

48. The phrase "cases concerning the interpretation and application of the ... Convention", which is found in Article 45 (art. 45), is remarkable for its width. The very general meaning which has to be attributed to it is confirmed by the English text of paragraph (1) of Article 46 (art. 46-1) which is drafted in even wider terms ("all matters") than Article 45 (art. 45) ("all cases").

49. True, it follows from Article 45 (art. 45) that the Court may exercise its jurisdiction only in regard to cases which have been duly brought before it and its supervision must necessarily be directed first to the observance of the conditions laid down in Articles 47 and 48 (art. 47, art. 48). Once a case is duly referred to it, however, the Court is endowed with full jurisdiction and may thus take cognisance of all questions of fact and of law which may arise in the course of the consideration of the case.

50. It is therefore impossible to see how questions concerning the interpretation and application of Article 26 (art. 26) raised before the Court during the hearing of a case should fall outside its jurisdiction. That possibility is all the less conceivable in that the rule on the exhaustion of domestic remedies delimits the area within which the Contracting States have agreed to answer for wrongs alleged against them before the organs of the Convention, and the Court has to ensure the observance of the provisions relating thereto just as of the individual rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Convention and its Protocols.

The rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies, which dispenses States from answering before an international body for their acts before they have had an opportunity to put matters right through their own legal system, is also one of the generally recognised principles of international law to which Article 26 (art. 26) makes specific reference.

As for the six months' rule, it results from a special provision in the Convention and constitutes an element of legal stability.

51. This conclusion is in no way invalidated by the powers conferred on the Commission under Article 27 (art. 27) of the Convention as regards the admissibility of applications. The task which this Article (art. 27) assigns to the Commission is one of sifting; the Commission either does or does not accept the applications. Its decisions to reject applications which it considers to be inadmissible are without appeal as are, moreover, also those by which applications are accepted; they are taken in complete independence (see mutatis mutandis, the Lawless judgment of 14th November 1960, Series A, p. 11). The decision to accept an application has the effect of leading the Commission to perform the functions laid down in Articles 28 to 31 (art. 28, art. 29, art. 30, art. 31) of the Convention and of opening up the possibility that the case may be brought before the Court; but it is not binding on the Court any more than the Court is bound by the opinion expressed by the Commission in its final report "as to whether the facts found disclose a breach by the State concerned of its obligations under the Convention" (Article 31) (art. 31).

52. For the foregoing reasons, the Court considers it has jurisdiction to examine the questions of non-exhaustion and of delay raised in the present cases.

B. As to estoppels (French "forclusion")

53. The jurisdiction of the Court to rule on the submissions made by a respondent Government based on Article 26 (art. 26) as a bar to claims directed against it, does not in any way mean that the Court should disregard the attitude adopted by the Government in this connection in the course of the proceedings before the Commission.

54. It is in fact usual practice in international and national courts that objections to admissibility should as a general rule be raised in limine litis. This, if not always mandatory, is at least a requirement of the proper administration of justice and of legal stability. The Court itself has specified in Rule 46, paragraph 1, of its Rules, that "a preliminary objection must be filed by a Party at the latest before the expiry of the time-limit fixed for the delivery of the first pleading".

Doubtless, proceedings before the Court are not the same as those which took place before the Commission and usually the parties are not even the same; but they concern the same case and it results clearly from the general economy of the Convention that objections to jurisdiction and admissibility must, in principle, be raised first before the Commission to the extent that their character and the circumstances permit (compare the Stögmüller judgment of 10th November 1969, Series A, pp. 41-42, paragraph 8, and the Matznetter judgment of the same date, Series A, p. 32, paragraph 6).

55. Furthermore, there is nothing to prevent States from waiving the benefit of the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies, the essential aim of which is to protect their national legal order. There exists on this subject a long established international practice from which the Convention has definitely not departed as it refers, in Article 26 (art. 26), to "the generally recognised rules of international law". If there is such a waiver in the course of proceedings before the Commission (see, for example, Yearbook of the Convention, Vol. 7, pp. 258-260), it can scarcely be imagined that the Government concerned is entitled to withdraw the waiver at will after the case has been referred to the Court.

56. In examining the proceedings which took place before the Commission, the Court finds that the Government had, in its first observations on the admissibility of the applications, raised against one of the complaints of Franz Ooms grounds of inadmissibility based on non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. As the Commission considered that complaint to be manifestly ill-founded, it did not find it necessary to rule on this objection. The partial decision which it gave on this point in the Ooms case is dated 11th February 1967.

At the oral hearings which followed that partial decision and the decisions of the same date in the two related cases, a member of the Commission put a question, on 6th April 1967, to the Agent of the Government about the possibility of challenging before the Conseil d'État magistrates' decisions in vagrancy matters (Sections 13 and 16 of the 1891 Act) and the Minister of Justice's decisions refusing to release a detained vagrant (Sections 15 and 18 of the same Act). The Agent of the Government replied that that superior administrative court considered it had no jurisdiction to hear an appeal against a magistrate's order (Vleminckx judgment of 21st December 1951, cf. paragraph 37 above); he underlined, however, that there was "at least one case" - Du Bois - "pending before the Conseil d'État in which the problem of the right to appeal against a magistrate's decision had again been raised"; he further expressed his personal opinion that "a decision of the Minister refusing" to release a detained vagrant could doubtless be set aside if need be by the Conseil d'État "on a pure point of law". He did not, however, use this as an argument to request the Commission either to reject the applications for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies or to adjourn its decision on their admissibility.

The Commission thus felt itself able to conclude that there were no domestic remedies and consequently to find in its decision of 7th April 1967, declaring the applications admissible, "that the applicants (had) observed the conditions laid down in Article 26 (art. 26) of the Convention".

57. Two months later, however, on 7th June 1967, the Conseil d'État delivered a judgment in which it reversed its former case-law; it declared admissible and allowed Mr. Du Bois' appeal for annulment of the magistrate's order (see paragraph 37 above). The Government informed the Commission of this judgment in its memorial of 31st July 1967 and formally requested that the three applications be rejected as inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. Counsel for the applicants expressed the view that the respondent Government "could not at this stage dispute the admissibility of the applications as this had been finally determined by the Commission's decision of 7th April 1967" (paragraph 59 of the report). On 8th February 1968, the Agent of the Belgian Government repeated the request at the hearing before the Commission (paragraphs 124 and 125 of the report): he invited the Commission to give "a second decision on admissibility to the effect that the wording of the Belgian Conseil d'État's judgment clearly establishes that (the) applicants had available to them a remedy which they did not make use of, although they could have done so".

Finally, the Commission refused this request in its report adopted on 19th July 1969 (paragraph 177). The Commission recalled that "in accordance with the principles of international law referred to by Article 26 (art. 26) of the Convention an applicant is not required to exhaust a domestic remedy if, in view of the consistent case-law of the national courts, this remedy has no reasonable chance of success"; it pointed out that this was the case prior to the Du Bois judgment of 7th June 1967 as regards recourse against magistrates' decisions in vagrancy matters and concluded that it had been right in declaring the three applications admissible and that the above-mentioned judgment did "not constitute a new factor justifying the reopening of the decision on the admissibility of the applications".

In these circumstances, the Court cannot consider that the Government is precluded from raising before it the objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies as regards the orders of the magistrates at Charleroi, Namur and Brussels.

58. The same is not true of the Government's alternative submission that the applicant Versyp was out of time.

Versyp applied to the Commission on 16th August 1966 that is more than six months after the decision of the Brussels police court of 4th November 1965, ordering his detention for vagrancy (see paragraphs 29 and 31 above). The Government argues from this that, if the Court considered that the decision was not at the time subject to any form of appeal, Versyp's application to the Commission should be held to be inadmissible for failure to observe the time-limit laid down by Article 26 (art. 26) in fine of the Convention.

The Court observes that this submission was never made before the Commission nor even before the Court during the written procedure: the Agent of the Government presented it for the first time in his address of 16th November 1970, that is more than three years after the Commission's decision on admissibility and more than one year after the case had been brought before the Court.

In these circumstances, the Court finds that the Government is precluded from submitting that Versyp's application was out of time.

59. The same finding holds good for the submission of non-exhaustion of remedies made by the Government before the Court as regards the decisions of the Minister of Justice rejecting the three applicants' petitions for release.

The applicants argued that their being kept in detention by the Minister had violated Article 5 (1) (art. 5-1) of the Convention. The Government contends that it would have been open to them to contest the said decisions before the Conseil d'État alleging a violation of Article 5 (art. 5), which is directly applicable in Belgian law, and that they failed to take this course. But the Government never relied, before the Commission, on Article 26 (art. 26) of the Convention on this point (cf. paragraphs 56 and 57 above); for the reasons already mentioned, it cannot do so for the first time before the Court.

C. As to the substance of the contention of the government regarding the exhaustion of domestic remedies

60. The Court recalls that under international law, to which Article 26 (art. 26) makes express reference, the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies demands the use only of such remedies as are available to the persons concerned and are sufficient, that is to say capable of providing redress for their complaints (Stögmüller judgment of 10th November 1969, Series A, p. 42, paragraph 11).

It is also recognised that it is for the Government which raises the contention to indicate the remedies which, in its view, were available to the persons concerned and which ought to have been used by them until they had been exhausted.

The information provided by the Belgian Government in this connection partly concerns the orders for detention, partly relates to the subsequent detention of the applicants. As the Court has found that the Government is precluded from making submissions based on the latter information (see paragraph 59 above), only the former part is relevant in connection with Article 26 (art. 26) of the Convention. The Government's line of argument on this point underwent a clear change in the course of the proceedings.

61. It was never contested that the decisions taken by the magistrates in regard to Jacques De Wilde, Franz Ooms and Edgard Versyp were of an administrative nature and so were not subject to appeal or to proceedings in cassation (see paragraph 37 above).

The Agent of the Government acknowledged too, at the first hearings before the Commission and apparently basing himself on the Vleminckx judgment of 21st December 1951, that the Conseil d'État would not either have allowed an appeal against the said orders for detention.

After the Du Bois judgment of 7th June 1967, the Government's Agent acknowledged that the former case-law was "a little out of touch with the facts in the sense that there was in fact no further administrative decision after the magistrate's decision" (paragraph 120 of the Commission's report). Before the Court he expressed the same view, noting that the alleged ministerial decision referred to in the Vleminckx judgment was "simply an administrative measure of execution" of the magistrate's order or in other words "a purely physical operation". This point of view appears to be correct: the examination of the files of the proceedings before the magistrates shows that what actually happened was that the competent officers of the public prosecutor's department were instructed by the magistrates at Charleroi, Namur and Brussels to execute their orders and to this end they "required" the directors of the institutions at Wortel and Merksplas "to receive" De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp "into (the) institution" without there being any further "decision" in the matter (see paragraphs 17, 24 and 29 above). The Minister may doubtless intervene under the 1891 Act to stop the execution of the orders for detention. In practice, however, the Minister does not as a rule use this power and he did not do so in the present cases.

Yet the Agent of the Government argued before the Commission and then before the Court that it followed from the same Du Bois judgment that the magistrates' orders for detention for vagrancy were in fact open to challenge before the Conseil d'État. He added that the Du Bois case was already pending before that superior administrative court at the time when the detention of the applicants was ordered, that there existed therefore at that time a possibility of a reversal of the rule stated in the Vleminckx case and that, for this reason, the applicants were not entitled to be excused from attempting to use such a remedy.

62. The Court is unable to accept this point of view. The Court finds - without it even being necessary to examine here whether recourse to the Conseil d'État would have been of such a nature as to satisfy the complaints - that according to the settled legal opinion which existed in Belgium up to 7th June 1967 recourse to the Conseil d'État against the orders of a magistrate was thought to be inadmissible.

This was the submission of the Government itself before the Conseil d'État in the Du Bois case. One cannot reproach the applicants that their conduct in 1965 and 1966 conformed with the view which the Government's Agent continued to express at the beginning of 1967 at the hearings on admissibility before the Commission and which was prevalent in Belgium at the time.

Furthermore, once the Du Bois judgment of 7th June 1967 was known, the applicants were not in a position to benefit from the possible remedy it seemed to open up because, well before that judgment was pronounced, the time-limit of sixty days prescribed by Article 4 of the Regent's Decree of 23rd August 1948 on the procedure before the administrative division of the Conseil d'État had expired.

The Court is therefore of the opinion that, as regards the complaints concerning the detention orders, the Government's submission of inadmissibility on the ground of failure to observe the rule on the exhaustion of domestic remedies is not well-founded.

II. AS TO THE MERITS

63. In regard to the merits of the present cases the Government and the Commission in substance reiterated at the oral hearings the submissions contained in their respective memorials.

The Government requested the Court:

> "to find that the decisions and measures which are the subject of the applications brought against Belgium by Jacques De Wilde on 17th June 1966, by Franz Ooms on 20th May 1966 and by Edgard Versyp on 16th August 1966 are not in conflict with Belgium's obligations under the European Convention of Human Rights."

For its part, the Commission asked the Court to "decide:

> (1) whether or not the jurisdiction exercised by the magistrate in deciding to place the applicants at the Government's disposal on the ground of vagrancy is such as to fulfil the requirements of the Convention, particularly of Article 5, paragraph (4) (art. 5-4);
> (2) whether or not the Convention, particularly Article 5, paragraph (4) (art. 5-4), was violated by the fact that the applicants did not have at their disposal a remedy before a court which, at reasonable intervals, after the initial decision on detention, could have investigated whether their detention was still lawful and order their release if such was no longer the case;

(3) whether or not the Convention, particularly Article 7 and Article 6, paragraph (1) and paragraph (3) (b) and (c) (art. 7, art. 6-1, art. 6-3-b, art. 6-3-c), was violated by the fact that the reformative measures taken vis-à-vis vagrants under Belgian law are in practice, as alleged, of a penal nature;

(4) whether or not the Convention, particularly Article 4 (art. 4), was violated by the fact that the applicants were subjected to forced labour during a period of detention which allegedly did not meet the requirements of Article 5 (art. 5);

(5) whether or not the Convention, particularly Article 8 (art. 8), was violated by the fact that the applicants' correspondence was censored during their detention."

It appears from the cases before the Court that questions on the merits arise also in connection with Article 5, paragraphs (1) and (3), Article 3 and Article 13 (art. 5-1, art. 5-3, art. 3, art. 13).

A. As to the "general and preliminary observation" of the government

64. In its memorials and oral pleadings, the Government recalled that the Court's function is to rule on three specific cases where the legislation in issue was applied and not on an abstract problem relating to the compatibility of the legislation with the Convention; on this point the Government cited the De Becker judgment of 27th March 1962 (Series A, p. 26 in fine). Starting from that premise, the Government stressed that the applicants had reported voluntarily to the police and that their admission to Wortel and Merksplas had been the result "of an express or implicit request" on their part, express for Versyp and Ooms, implicit for De Wilde. According to the Government, such a "voluntary reporting" can scarcely amount to being "deprived of liberty" within the meaning of Article 5 (art. 5). From this it concluded that the Court ought to rule out forthwith any idea of a failure to comply with the requirements of the Convention, as regards both "the detention itself" and "the conditions of detention".

65. The Court is not persuaded by this line of argument. Temporary distress or misery may drive a person to give himself up to the police to be detained. This does not necessarily mean that the person so asking is in a state of vagrancy and even less that he is a professional beggar or that his state of vagrancy results from one of the circumstances - idleness, drunkenness or immorality - which, under Section 13 of the Belgian Act of 1891, may entail a more severe measure of detention.

Insofar as the wishes of the applicants were taken into account, they cannot in any event remove or disguise the mandatory, as opposed to contractual, character of the decisions complained of; this mandatory character comes out unambiguously in the legal texts (Sections 8, 13, 15, 16 and 18 of the 1891 Act) and in the documents before the Court.

Finally and above all, the right to liberty is too important in a "democratic society" within the meaning of the Convention for a person to lose the benefit of the protection of the Convention for the single reason that he gives himself up to be taken into detention. Detention might violate Article 5 (art. 5) even although the person concerned might have agreed to it. When the matter is one which concerns ordre public within the Council of Europe, a scrupulous supervision by the organs of the Convention of all measures capable of violating the rights and freedoms which it guarantees is necessary in every case. Furthermore, Section 12 of the 1891 Act acknowledges the need for such supervision at national level: it obliges the magistrates to "ascertain the identity, age, physical and mental state and manner of life of persons brought before the police court for vagrancy". Nor does the fact that the applicants "reported voluntarily" in any way relieve the Court of its duty to see whether there has been a violation of the Convention.

B. As to the alleged violation of paragraph (1) of article 5 (art. 5-1)

66. It appears from the record that the applicants alleged, inter alia, a violation of the first paragraph of Article 5 (art. 5-1) of the Convention; the Government contested this submission and the Commission itself rejected it in its report.

Insofar as it applies to the present cases, Article 5 (1) (art. 5-1) provides as follows:

> "Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law:
> ...
> (e) the lawful detention ... of vagrants;

67. The applicants were provisionally deprived of their freedom by the police superintendent to whom they presented themselves and they were brought by him within twenty-four hours, as provided by Section 3 of the Act of 1st May 1849, before the magistrate who placed them at the disposal of the Government (see paragraphs 16, 17, 23, 24, 28 and 29 above).

The lawfulness of the action of the police superintendents has not been challenged; as the persons concerned reported voluntarily and indicated that they were in a state of vagrancy it was only normal that they should be brought before the magistrate for a decision. This action, moreover, was of a purely preliminary nature.

It was by virtue of the magistrates' orders that the detention took place. It is therefore by reference to these orders that the lawfulness of the detention of the three applicants must be assessed.

68. The Convention does not contain a definition of the term "vagrant". The definition of Article 347 of the Belgian Criminal Code reads: "vagrants are persons who have no fixed abode, no means of subsistence and no regular trade or profession". Where these three conditions are fulfilled, they may lead the competent authorities to order that the persons concerned be placed at the disposal of the Government as vagrants. The definition quoted does not appear to be in any way irreconcilable with the usual meaning of the term "vagrant", and the Court considers that a person who is a vagrant under the terms of Article 347 in principle falls within the exception provided for in Article 5 (1) (e) (art. 5-1-e) of the Convention.

In the present cases the want of a fixed abode and of means of subsistence resulted not merely from the action of the persons concerned in reporting voluntarily to the police but from their own declarations made at the time: all three stated that they were without any employment (see paragraphs 16, 23 and 28 above). As to the habitual character of this lack of employment the magistrates at Charleroi, Namur and Brussels were in a position to deduce this from the information available to them concerning the respective applicants. This would, moreover, also be indicated by the fact that, although they purported to be workers, the three applicants were apparently not in a position to claim the minimum number of working days required to be effected within a given period which, in accordance with the Royal Decree of 20th December 1963 (Articles 118 et seqq.), would have qualified them for unemployment benefits.

69. Having thus the character of a "vagrant", the applicants could, under Article 5 (1) (e) (art. 5-1-e) of the Convention, be made the subject of a detention provided that it was ordered by the competent authorities and in accordance with the procedure prescribed by Belgian law.

In this connection the Court observes that the applicants did not receive the same treatment: De Wilde was placed at the disposal of the Government on 19th April 1966 for two years but was released on 16th November 1966; Ooms was placed at the disposal of the Government on 21st December 1965 for an indefinite period and was released after one year, that is on the expiry of the statutory term; Versyp was placed at the disposal of the Government on 4th November 1965 for two years and was released on 10th August 1967, that is after one year, nine months and six days (see paragraphs 17, 20, 24, 26, 29 and 31 above).

As the Court has already noted, the placing of a person at the disposal of the Government for a fixed period differs from that for an indefinite period not solely by the fact that it is pronounced for a minimum period of two years (Section 13 of the 1891 Act) while the other may not last longer than one year (Sections 16 and 18): the first is also more severe in that it is entered on the criminal record (see paragraph 36 above), and in regard to electoral disabilities (see paragraph 158 of the Commission's report).

In the present cases, the orders concerning De Wilde and Versyp do not disclose which of the four conditions mentioned in Section 13 may have led the magistrates to apply this section rather than Section 16, but they refer to the administrative file of the persons concerned. The file on Jacques De Wilde contained an information note dated 19th April 1966 - the day he appeared before the magistrate at Charleroi - which listed various convictions and orders placing him at the disposal of the Government (see paragraph 16 above). Furthermore, the Brussels police court had before it, when Versyp appeared there, a document from the Social Rehabilitation Office in which his state of vagrancy was attributed to idleness and to weakness for drink (see paragraph 28 above).

70. The Court has, therefore, not found either irregularity or arbitrariness in the placing of the three applicants at the disposal of the Government and it has no reason to find the resulting detention incompatible with Article 5 (1) (e) (art. 5-1-e) of the Convention.

C. As to the alleged violation of paragraph (3) of article 5 (art. 5-3)

71. Before the Commission, the applicants also alleged that there had been a violation of paragraph (3) of Article 5 (art. 5-3) which provides that:

> "Everyone arrested or detained in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 (c) (art. 5-1-c) ... shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release pending trial ...".

Paragraph (1) (c) of Article 5 (art. 5-1-c), to which the text quoted refers, is solely concerned with "the lawful arrest or detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence or when it is reasonably considered necessary to prevent his committing an offence or fleeing after having done so"; as simple vagrancy does not amount to an offence in Belgian law (see paragraph 34 above), the applicants were arrested and detained not under sub-paragraph (c) of the first paragraph of Article 5 (art. 5-1-c) - nor, it may be added, under sub-paragraph (a) (art. 5-1-a) ("after conviction by a competent court") - but in fact under sub-paragraph (e) (art. 5-1-e). From this the Court must conclude - as did the Commission - that paragraph (3) (art. 5-3) was not applicable to them.

D. As to the alleged violation of paragraph (4) of article 5 (art. 5-4)

72. The Commission accepted to a certain extent the arguments of the applicants and expressed the opinion that the system in issue fails to comply with Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention.

According to paragraph (4) of Article 5 (art. 5-4), which is applicable inter alia to vagrants detained under sub-paragraph (e) of paragraph (1) (art. 5-1-e), "everyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful".

73. Although the Court has not found in the present cases any incompatibility with paragraph (1) of Article 5 (art. 5-1) (see paragraphs 67 to 70 above), this finding does not dispense it from now proceeding to examine whether there has been any violation of paragraph (4) (art. 5-4). The latter is, in effect, a separate provision, and its observance does not result eo ipso from the observance of the former: "everyone who is deprived of his liberty", lawfully or not, is entitled to a supervision of lawfulness by a court; a violation can therefore result either from a detention incompatible with paragraph (1) (art. 5-1) or from the absence of any proceedings satisfying paragraph (4) (art. 5-4), or even from both at the same time.

1. As to the decisions ordering detention

74. The Court began by investigating whether the conditions in which De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp appeared before the magistrates satisfied their right to take proceedings before a court to question the lawfulness of their detention.

75. The applicants were detained in execution of the magistrates' orders: their arrest by the police was merely a provisional act and no other authority intervened in the three cases (see paragraph 67 above).

A first question consequently arises. Does Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) require that two authorities should deal with the cases falling under it, that is, one which orders the detention and a second, having the attributes of a court, which examines the lawfulness of this measure on the application of the person concerned? Or, as against this, is it sufficient that the detention should be ordered by an authority which had the elements inherent in the concept of a "court" within the meaning of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4)?

76. At first sight, the wording of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) might make one think that it guarantees the right of the detainee always to have supervised by a court the lawfulness of a previous decision which has deprived him of his liberty. The two official texts do not however use the same terms, since the English text speaks of "proceedings" and not of "appeal", "recourse" or "remedy" (compare Articles 13 and 26 (art. 13, art. 26)). Besides, it is clear that the purpose of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) is to assure to persons who are arrested and detained the right to a judicial supervision of the lawfulness of the measure to which they are thereby subjected; the word "court"

("tribunal") is there found in the singular and not in the plural. Where the decision depriving a person of his liberty is one taken by an administrative body, there is no doubt that Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) obliges the Contracting States to make available to the person detained a right of recourse to a court; but there is nothing to indicate that the same applies when the decision is made by a court at the close of judicial proceedings. In the latter case the supervision required by Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) is incorporated in the decision; this is so, for example, where a sentence of imprisonment is pronounced after "conviction by a competent court" (Article 5 (1) (a) of the Convention) (art. 5-1-a). It may therefore be concluded that Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) is observed if the arrest or detention of a vagrant, provided for in paragraph (1) (e) (art. 5-1-e), is ordered by a "court" within the meaning of paragraph (4) (art. 5-4).

It results, however, from the purpose and object of Article 5 (art. 5), as well as from the very terms of paragraph (4) (art. 5-4) ("proceedings", "recours"), that in order to constitute such a "court" an authority must provide the fundamental guarantees of procedure applied in matters of deprivation of liberty. If the procedure of the competent authority does not provide them, the State could not be dispensed from making available to the person concerned a second authority which does provide all the guarantees of judicial procedure.

In sum, the Court considers that the intervention of one organ satisfies Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4), but on condition that the procedure followed has a judicial character and gives to the individual concerned guarantees appropriate to the kind of deprivation of liberty in question.

77. The Court has therefore enquired whether in the present cases the magistrate possessed the character of a "court" within the meaning of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4), and especially whether the applicants enjoyed, when appearing before him, the guarantees mentioned above.

There is no doubt that from an organisational point of view the magistrate is a "court"; the Commission has, in fact, accepted this. The magistrate is independent both of the executive and of the parties to the case and he enjoys the benefit of the guarantees afforded to the judges by Articles 99 and 100 of the Constitution of Belgium.

The task the magistrate has to discharge in the matters under consideration consists in finding whether in law the statutory conditions required for the "placing at the disposal of the Government" are fulfilled in respect of the person brought before him. By this very finding, the police court necessarily decides "the lawfulness" of the detention which the prosecuting authority requests it to sanction.

The Commission has, however, emphasised that in vagrancy matters the magistrate exercises "an administrative function" and does not therefore carry out the "judicial supervision" required by Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4). This opinion is grounded on the case-law of the Court of Cassation and of the Conseil d'État (see paragraph 37 above). The Commission had concluded from this that the provision of a judicial proceeding was essential.

78. It is true that the Convention uses the word "court" (French "tribunal") in several of its Articles. It does so to mark out one of the constitutive elements of the guarantee afforded to the individual by the provision in question (see, in addition to Article 5 (4), Articles 2 (1), 5 (1) (a) and (b), and 6 (1) (tribunal) (art. 5-4, art. 2-1, art. 5-1-a, art. 5-1-b, art. 6-1). In all these different cases it denotes bodies which exhibit not only common fundamental features, of which the most important is independence of the executive and of the parties to the case (see Neumeister judgment of 27th June 1968, Series A, p. 44, paragraph 24), but also the guarantees of judicial procedure. The forms of the procedure required by the Convention need not, however, necessarily be identical in each of the cases where the intervention of a court is required. In order to determine whether a proceeding provides adequate guarantees, regard must be had to the particular nature of the circumstances in which such proceeding takes place. Thus, in the Neumeister case, the Court considered that the competent courts remained "courts" in spite of the lack of "equality of arms" between the prosecution and an individual who requested provisional release (ibidem); nevertheless, the same might not be true in a different context and, for example, in another situation which is also governed by Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4).

79. It is therefore the duty of the Court to determine whether the proceedings before the police courts of Charleroi, Namur and Brussels satisfied the requirements of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) which follow from the interpretation adopted above. The deprivation of liberty complained of by De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp resembles that imposed by a criminal court. Therefore, the procedure applicable should not have provided guarantees markedly inferior to those existing in criminal matters in the member States of the Council of Europe.

According to Belgian law, every individual found in a state of vagrancy is arrested and then brought - within twenty-four hours as a rule - before the police court (Section 8 of the 1891 Act and Section 3 of the Act of 1st May 1849). Regarding the interrogation of this individual, the 1891 Act limits itself to specifying in Section 12 that the magistrate ascertains the identity, age, physical and mental state and manner of life of the person brought before him. Regarding the right of defence, the only relevant provision is found in Section 3 of the Act of 1st May 1849, which provides that the person concerned is granted a three-day adjournment if he so requests. According to information provided by the Government, the Code of Criminal Procedure does not apply to the detention of vagrants.

The procedure in question is affected by the administrative nature of the decision to be given. It does not ensure guarantees comparable to those which exist as regards detention in criminal cases, notwithstanding the fact that the detention of vagrants is very similar in many respects. It is hard to understand why persons arrested for simple vagrancy have to be content with such a summary procedure: individuals liable to sentences shorter than the terms provided for by Section 13, and even Section 16, of the 1891 Act - including those prosecuted for an offence under Articles 342 to 344 of the Criminal Code (aggravated vagrancy) - have the benefit of the extensive guarantees provided under the Code of Criminal Procedure. This procedure undoubtedly presents certain judicial features, such as the hearing taking place and the decision being given in public, but they are not sufficient to give the magistrate the character of a "court" within the meaning of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) when due account is taken of the seriousness of what is at stake, namely a long deprivation of liberty attended by various shameful consequences. Therefore it does not by itself satisfy the requirements of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) and the Commission was quite correct in considering that a remedy should have been open to the applicants. The Court, however, has already held that De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp had no access either to a superior court or, at least in practice, to the Conseil d'État (see paragraphs 37 and 62 above).

80. The Court therefore reaches the conclusion that on the point now under consideration there has been a violation of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) in that the three applicants did not enjoy the guarantees contained in that paragraph.

2. As to the rejection of the requests for release addressed by the applicants to the administrative authorities

81. In the applicants' view there was a violation of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) not only because of the conditions in which their detention was ordered by the magistrate, but also because of the refusal of their requests for release.

82. The Court finds that the applicants could without doubt have appealed to the Conseil d'État and that this appeal would have been effective if the Minister of Justice had violated the 1891 Act in refusing their requests for release. None of them, however, claims to have been in one of those situations where the Act requires that detention should end. De Wilde and Versyp were in fact released 0before the expiry of the period of two years fixed by the magistrate (Section 13 of the 1891 Act; paragraphs 17, 20, 29, 31 in fine and 40 above); Ooms was released on the expiry of the statutory period of one year and his release savings had not before that time reached the prescribed amount (Sections 16, 17 and 18, first paragraph, of the 1891 Act; paragraphs 24, 26 in fine and 40 above).

The applicants could also have contended before the Conseil d'État

- as they did before the Commission, though not very precisely (see paragraph 48 of the report) - that their detention had in any event violated Article 5 (1) (art. 5-1) of the Convention, particularly because, due to supervening circumstances, they had lost their character of vagrants. In fact

Article 5 (art. 5) of the Convention is directly applicable in the Belgian legal system, such that its violation could have been complained of before the Conseil d'État and it cannot be affirmed a priori that it would not have decided speedily.

83. On the other hand, the requests looked to the Minister of Justice to use the discretionary power conferred upon him by the 1891 Act (Sections 15 and 18) to decide, in the light of the circumstances relied on by the interested party or of other pertinent information, whether a detained vagrant should be released before the statutory period or the term fixed by the magistrate's decision. To that extent, whatever action was taken thereafter falls completely outside the application of the provision of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention. This latter provision, in fact, requires supervision only of the lawfulness of the placing in detention or of its continuation.

84. The Court does not therefore find any violation of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) on the point at issue.

E. As to the alleged violation of articles 6 and 7 (art. 6, art. 7)

85. The Commission and the Government both submit that Articles 6 and 7 (art. 6, art. 7), relied upon by the applicants, are inapplicable.

86. The Court has come to the conclusion that, during the hearing before the magistrates, the applicants were not dealt with in accordance with the requirements of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) (see paragraphs 74 to 80 above). This conclusion makes it superfluous to examine whether Article 6 (art. 6) was applicable in this case, and if so, whether it was observed.

87. As to Article 7 (art. 7), it is clear that it is not relevant. Simple vagrancy is not an "offence" under Belgian law and the magistrate did not find the applicants "guilty" nor impose a "penalty" on them (see, mutatis mutandis, the Lawless judgment of 1st July 1961, Series A, p. 54, paragraph 19).

F. As to the alleged violation of article 4 (art. 4)

88. According to Article 4 (art. 4) of the Convention,

> "(1) ...
> (2) No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour.
> (3) For the purpose of this Article the term 'forced or compulsory labour' shall not include:
> (a) any work required to be done in the ordinary course of detention imposed according to the provisions of Article 5 (art. 5) (...);

..."

In the Commission's view the work which the applicants were compelled to perform was not justified under Article 4 (art. 4) as, in its opinion, there had been a breach of paragraph (4) of Article 5 (art. 5-4).

89. The Court too has, in these cases, found a violation of the rights guaranteed by Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) (see paragraphs 74 to 80 above), but it does not think that it must deduce therefrom a violation of Article 4 (art. 4). It in fact considers that paragraph (3) (a) of Article 4 (art. 4-3-a) authorises work ordinarily required of individuals deprived of their liberty under Article 5 (1) (e) (art. 5-1-e). The Court has found moreover, on the basis of information before it, that no violation of Article 5 (1) (e) (art. 5-1-e) has been established in respect of De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp (see paragraphs 67 to 70 above).

90. Furthermore, the duty to work imposed on the three applicants has not exceeded the "ordinary" limits, within the meaning of Article 4 (3) (a) (art. 4-3-a) of the Convention, because it aimed at their rehabilitation and was based on a general standard, Section 6 of the 1891 Act, which finds its equivalent in several member States of the Council of Europe (see paragraph 38 above and Appendices IV and V to the Commission's report).

The Belgian authorities did not therefore fail to comply with the requirements of Article 4 (art. 4).

G. As to the alleged violation of article 8 (art. 8)

91. During their detention, the applicants' correspondence was supervised to a certain extent. In the Commission's view this led to a violation of Article 8 (art. 8), on the one hand because the detention of the applicants was unlawful in that Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) had not been complied with and on the other hand because, even if it was lawful, ordinary detention for vagrancy cannot entail the restrictions on the freedom of correspondence which are permissible in criminal matters.

92. On the first argument, the Court recalls mutatis mutandis the reasons given in paragraph 89 above on compulsory labour.

93. On the second argument, the Court recalls that Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention provides that:

> "(1) Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
> (2) There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

The Court finds that the supervision in question, which constitutes unquestionably an "interference by a public authority with the exercise of (the) right" enshrined in paragraph (1) of Article 8 (art. 8-1), was "in accordance with the law" - within the meaning of paragraph (2) (art. 8-2) - as it is provided for in Articles 20 to 23 of the Royal Decree of 21st May 1965 taken in conjunction with Article 95. It then observes, in the light of the information given to it, that the competent Belgian authorities did not transgress in the present cases the limits of the power of appreciation which Article 8 (2) (art. 8-2) of the Convention leaves to the Contracting States: even in cases of persons detained for vagrancy, those authorities had sufficient reason to believe that it was "necessary" to impose restrictions for the purpose of the prevention of disorder or crime, the protection of health or morals, and the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. These restrictions did not in any event apply in a long series of instances enumerated in Article 24 of the Royal Decree of 21st May 1965 nor in connection with the applicants' correspondence with the Commission (see paragraph 39 above). Finally, there is nothing to indicate that there was any discrimination or abuse of power to the prejudice of the applicants (Articles 14 and 18 of the Convention) (art. 14, art. 18).

H. As to the alleged violation of article 3 (art. 3)

94. De Wilde and Versyp complained of disciplinary punishments inflicted on them for refusing to work but the Commission did not consider that these punishments violated Article 3 (art. 3).

Having regard to the facts before it, the Court also does not find, even ex officio, any suggestion of a violation of this text.

I. As to the alleged violation of article 13 (art. 13)

95. The applicants invoked Article 13 (art. 13) of the Convention, alleging that they did not have "an effective remedy before a national authority" in order to obtain the protection of the rights guaranteed by Articles 5, 3, 4, 6, 7 and 8 (art. 5, art. 3, art. 4, art. 6, art. 7, art. 8).

The Court has already ruled that the applicants were not dealt with in a manner compatible with the requirements of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) (see paragraphs 74 to 80 above); to this extent, it does not think it has to enquire whether there has been a violation of Article 13 (art. 13).

As to the applicants' other complaints, the Court limits itself to finding that Articles 3 to 8 (art. 3, art. 4, art. 5, art. 6, art. 7, art. 8) of the Convention are directly applicable in Belgian law. If, therefore, the applicants considered that the administrative decisions put in issue had violated the rights guaranteed by these articles, they could have challenged them before the Conseil d'État.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT,

I. AS TO THE QUESTIONS OF JURISDICTION AND ADMISSIBILITY RAISED IN THESE CASES

1. Holds by twelve votes to four that the Court has jurisdiction to deal with the questions of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies and of delay raised in these cases;

2. Holds unanimously that the Government is not precluded from relying on the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies as regards the orders of the magistrates at Charleroi, Namur and Brussels;

3. Holds unanimously that the Government is precluded from submitting that the application of Edgard Versyp was made out of time;

4. Holds unanimously that the Government is precluded from relying on the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies as regards the decisions of the Minister of Justice rejecting the three applicants' requests for release;

5. Declares ill-founded, unanimously, the Government's submission that there was non-exhaustion of domestic remedies as regards the complaints relating to the detention orders;

6. Finds, therefore, unanimously, that the Court has jurisdiction to rule on the merits of the present cases.

II. AS TO THE MERITS

1. Holds unanimously that the "voluntary reporting" by the applicants does not suffice to establish the absence of any violation of the Convention;

2. Holds unanimously that there has been no breach of Article 5 (1) (art. 5-1);

3. Holds unanimously that Article 5 (3) (art. 5-3) is not applicable in the present cases;

4. Holds by nine votes to seven that there has been a breach of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) in that the applicants had no remedy open to them before a court against the decisions ordering their detention;

5. Holds by fifteen votes to one that there has been no violation of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) by reason of the rejection of the requests for release addressed by the applicants to the administrative authorities;

6. Holds unanimously that it is not called upon to pronounce on the alleged breach of Article 6 (art. 6);

7. Holds unanimously that Article 7 (art. 7) is not applicable in the present cases;

8. Holds unanimously that there has been no breach of Article 4 (art. 4);

9. Holds by fifteen votes to one that there has been no breach of Article 8 (art. 8);

10. Holds unanimously that there has been no breach of Article 3 (art. 3);

11. Holds unanimously that it is not called upon to pronounce on the alleged violation of Article 13 (art. 13) as regards the point referred to at II-4 above;

12. Holds unanimously that there has been no breach of Article 13 (art. 13) as regards the other complaints of the applicants;

13. Reserves for the applicants the right, should the occasion arise, to apply for just satisfaction on the issue referred to at point II-4 above.

JOINT SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGES ROSS AND SIGURJÓNSSON

(Translation)

According to Article 26 (art. 26) of the Convention, the Commission may not deal with the petition addressed to the Secretary General of the Council of Europe (Article 25) (art. 25) until all domestic remedies have been exhausted.

According to Article 27 (3) (art. 27-3), the Commission shall reject any petition referred to it which it considers inadmissible under Article 26 (art. 26).

According to Article 28 (art. 28), in the event of the Commission accepting a petition referred to it, it shall undertake an examination of the petition with a view to ascertaining the facts and place itself at the disposal of the parties concerned with a view to securing a friendly settlement of the matter on the basis of respect for Human Rights.

According to Article 31 (art. 31), if a solution is not reached the Commission shall draw up a report on the facts and state its opinion as to whether the facts found disclose a breach by the State concerned of its obligations under the Convention, and this report shall be transmitted to the Committee of Ministers.

According to Article 32 (art. 32), if the question is not referred to the Court in accordance with Article 48 (art. 48) within a period of three months from the date of the transmission of the Commission's report to the Committee of Ministers, the Committee of Ministers shall decide by a two-thirds majority whether there has been a violation of the Convention.

According to Article 45 (art. 45), "The jurisdiction of the Court shall extend to all cases concerning the interpretation and application of the present Convention which the High Contracting Parties or the Commission shall refer to it in accordance with Article 48 (art. 48)".

The expression "case" means the facts found by the Commission in its report. A "case" does not exist until the Commission's report has been transmitted to the Committee of Ministers. The Commission, in its report which is transmitted to the Committee of Ministers, finds the facts and states an opinion as to whether the facts found disclose a breach by the State concerned of its obligations under the Convention. If the case is not referred to the Court in accordance with Article 48 (art. 48), the Committee of Ministers decides whether there has been a violation of the Convention.

If the "case" is referred to the Court, its jurisdiction consists in interpreting and applying the Convention to all the "matters", i.e. to all the facts found by the Commission in its report, and in rendering a final judgment (Article 52) (art. 52) as to whether those facts disclose a breach by the State concerned of its obligations (engagements: Article 19 (art. 19)) under the Convention. A final judgment can only be a judgment that deals with the merits of the "case", that is to say, whether the facts found by the Commission disclose a violation of the Convention.

The admissibility or inadmissibility of the petition is a preliminary (procedural) question which is left to the "powers" of the Commission (Article 25 (4)) (art. 25-4). As against this, the question whether the facts found in the Commission's report disclose a breach by the State concerned of its obligations under the Convention is a matter for the jurisdiction of the Court, and if the case is not brought before the Court it is a matter for the jurisdiction of the Committee of Ministers.

The question of the admissibility or inadmissibility of the petition is, from the standpoint of pure logic, one and indivisible. The Commission either has jurisdiction or it has not. It would be illogical if the Commission had exclusive jurisdiction when it rejected a petition but did not have exclusive jurisdiction when it accepted one, so that the Court's jurisdiction (or that of the Committee of Ministers if the case is not referred to the Court) also covers the preliminary (procedural) question whether the Commission, in accepting the petition, has rightly or wrongly interpreted and applied Article 27 (art. 27) of the Convention.

Under Protocol No. 3 (P3) to the Convention, Article 29 (art. 29) is deleted from the Convention and the following provision is inserted:

> "After it has accepted a petition submitted under Article 25 (art. 25), the Commission may nevertheless decide unanimously to reject the petition if, in the course of its examination, it finds that the existence of one of the grounds for non-acceptance provided for in Article 27 (art. 27) has been established.
> In such a case, the decision shall be communicated to the parties."

Under this provision, the Commission may at any time return to the preliminary (procedural) question of the admissibility or inadmissibility of the petition accepted and reject the petition, by a unanimous decision, if it finds that the existence of one of the grounds for inadmissibility provided for in Article 27 (art. 27) has been established.

The Commission's power to resume at any time its consideration of the admissibility proves that it has sole jurisdiction on this point and that, unless there is a unanimous decision to reject a petition accepted, the Court has no jurisdiction to consider this preliminary question. Thus, there is a saving of time and, at the same time, the prestige of the Court remains intact as the Court is rid of questions which do not relate to the facts found in the Commission's report.

The Contracting Parties inserted Article 26 (art. 26) in order to have it solemnly declared that the Convention does not depart from the generally recognised principle that there can be no access to an international authority until all domestic remedies have been exhausted.

One might have expected the sanction to be included in the same Article 26 (art. 26). One might even have expected that nothing be said. On the contrary, the sanction was included in Article 27 (art. 27) as one of the grounds for inadmissibility. The words "the Commission shall reject" have the same meaning as "the Commission feels, the Commission considers".

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE BILGE

(Translation)

I do not share the opinion expressed in the judgment as regards the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain submissions on the non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. In paragraphs 47-49, the judgment, referring to Article 45 (art. 45), gives the Court's jurisdiction a wide scope which corresponds neither to the texts nor to the aim and purpose of the Convention.

It is true that, according to Article 45 (art. 45), "The jurisdiction of the Court shall extend to all cases concerning the interpretation and application of the present Convention which the High Contracting Parties or the Commission shall refer to it in accordance with Article 48 (art. 48)", but the Court has interpreted the text broadly. One of the three elements of the basis of the Court's jurisdiction provided for in this article (art. 48) is the word "affaires" ("cases"). Relying on the English version of paragraph (1) of Article 46 (art. 46-1), the Court interprets this word as "all matters". But in interpreting a text which is authentic in two languages, one cannot, in my opinion, give preference to one language: one must find the meaning which best reconciles the two texts, taking into account the aim and purpose of the Convention. In the different articles of the Convention, the French text constantly uses the word "affaire" while the English text expresses the same concept by the words "question", "cases" and "matters". The English version is not, from this point of view, a text which has a uniform terminology on which one can rely. The text of Article 45 (art. 45) does not provide sure indications to clarify the meaning of the word "affaires". One must therefore go to the source of the Court's jurisdiction to harmonise the words quoted and find a common meaning. According to Articles 31 and 32 (art. 31, art. 32) what is referred as an "affaire" ("case") by the Commission to the Committee of Ministers or to the Court is the question whether there has or has not been a violation of the Convention. The word "affaire" must therefore be interpreted in this sense.

This meaning of the word "affaire" is also confirmed by the general plan of the Convention. By Article 19 (art. 19), the Convention set up two organs, the Commission and the Court, to ensure the observance of Human Rights. To this aim, the Commission and the Court have defined powers. Competence to accept an application and to check its admissibility belongs to the Commission. Jurisdiction to decide whether there has been a violation of the Convention belongs to the Court. It is within this field that the Court enjoys full jurisdiction.

The purpose of the Convention is to ensure the observance of Human Rights. To achieve this end the Court must reach a decision as quickly as possible without letting the case drag on unreasonably. Through a broad interpretation of Article 45 (art. 45), the judgment has set up a system of supervision by the Court of the Commission's decisions on admissibility. An enormous waste of time and effort would result in cases where the Court should find, generally four or five years after the admissibility of the applications, that Article 26 (art. 26) has not been observed. If there is jurisdiction to supervise decisions of admissibility, it must be exercised at the first stage of the proceedings. Such supervision is not provided for by the Convention, because it is left to the competence of the Commission.

I agree with the judgment when it states, in paragraph 50, that "the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies, which dispenses States from answering before an international body for their acts before they have had an opportunity to put matters right through their own legal system, is also one of the generally recognised principles of international law to which Article 26 (art. 26) makes specific reference". However, I do not agree with the judgment in deducing therefrom a supervisory jurisdiction of the Court. In effect, the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies is not concerned with the internal organisation of a given international jurisdictional body. As stated above, the Convention set up two organs to ensure the observance of Human Rights. The aim of the rule in question is achieved if the rule is observed by one of these organs and, above all, by the organ entrusted with the task of checking the observance of the conditions of admissibility. This is all the more true since, according to paragraph (3) of Article 27 (art. 27-3), the condition of exhaustion of domestic remedies is a preliminary question which concerns essentially the admissibility of the application. It is for the Commission to decide whether this condition is fulfilled. If the question of exhaustion of domestic remedies is raised before the Commission and the latter has decided the issue, the requirements of the rule in question are completely satisfied from the point of view of international law.

Moreover, the judgment states in paragraph 51 that "the task which this Article [27] (art. 27) assigns to the Commission is one of sifting; the Commission either does or does not accept the applications. Its decisions to reject applications which it considers to be inadmissible are without appeal as are, moreover, also those by which applications are accepted; they are taken in complete independence". The judgment adds, however, that the decision of the Commission to accept a case "is not binding on the Court any more than the Court is bound by the opinion expressed by the Commission". I cannot accept this reasoning. First of all, the decision of admissibility taken by the Commission and the opinion expressed by it on the merits are of a different nature. An opinion, by its very nature, does not bind anyone. There is no need to cite it alongside the decision of admissibility for the purpose of making an argument against the latter.

According to Articles 25 and 27 (art. 25, art. 27), the decision on the admissibility of an application falls within the competence of the Commission. In the exercise of this jurisdiction, the Commission checks the observance of the conditions of admissibility. In the course of this examination it takes into consideration the condition laid down in Article 26 (art. 26). This article (art. 26) is addressed, as the text itself bears witness, to the Commission and not to the Court. It is part of the Commission's field of activity. On the other hand, it is not reasonable to declare that the decision of refusal binds the Court while that of admissibility does not, for the two aspects of the same jurisdiction cannot be separated. In adopting another solution, the judgment has opened a way of proceeding, which, in my view, does not conform to the principles of good administration of justice.

For the reasons set out above, I think that the Court has no jurisdiction to entertain submissions of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies.

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE WOLD

As to the jurisdiction

I have come to the conclusion that the Court has no jurisdiction regarding admissibility. In regard to individual petitions, the task of the Commission is one of sifting and screening. One feared to get too many unjustified petitions. It was necessary at an early stage to select the applications which the European supervisory organs should deal with. The preparatory works show that all conditions for admissibility - exhaustion of remedies, compatibility with the provisions of the Convention and not manifestly ill-founded – were considered from the same angle, namely to prevent a flood of cases. The whole responsibility with regard to admissibility - also including exhaustion of local remedies - was laid upon the Commission. The member States seemed to be fully satisfied that this function should be the task of the Commission and the Commission alone.

The Court is not a court of appeal in relation to the Commission. The Commission shall, according to Article 19 (art. 19), ensure observance of the engagements undertaken by the Contracting States. The Court has the same duty. But the task is divided between these two organs. The majority of the Court admits that "... the Commission either does or does not accept the applications. Its decisions to reject applications which it considers to be inadmissible are without appeal as are, moreover, also those by which applications are accepted; they are taken in complete independence ...". But if this is so, how can then the Court through "interpretation or application" of Article 26 (art. 26) set aside the Commission's final decision laying down that all internal remedies are exhausted? The majority contend that as the Court's jurisdiction according to Article 45 (art. 45) shall extend to "all cases concerning the interpretation and application ... which the High Contracting Parties or the Commission shall refer to it", it is "impossible to see how questions concerning the interpretation and application of Article 26 (art. 26) ... should fall outside its jurisdiction". But the Court's jurisdiction is limited to cases referred to it by the Commission or a State. The question of exhaustion of internal remedies is not part of the case as this question is already finally decided by the Commission, exercising a judicial function against which no appeal lies. The interpretation and application of Article 26 (art. 26) do not therefore fall within the jurisdiction of the Court.

The Court has competence to decide its own jurisdiction, but it is not competent to make decisions regarding the jurisdiction of the Commission.

A decision of non-admissibility on the ground that the local remedies have not been exhausted is a final judicial decision. The application of the individual cannot go further. In this respect the Commission's jurisdiction is absolute without any interference by the Court, although the decision will always depend on an interpretation and application of Article 26 (art. 26). But exactly the same is the fact when the Commission finds that the application is admissible on the ground that the internal remedies have been exhausted. That is also a final judicial decision.

The Contracting States must accept the negative decision by the Commission: why should they have a right to challenge the positive one? It is an identical jurisdiction which the Commission exercises in both cases. The individual has to abide by a decision of non-admissibility. The opposite decision gives him a justified expectation that his claim will now be dealt with by the European international organs. If the Court nevertheless exercises its own jurisdiction in regard to admissibility and decides against the Commission's decision, the inequality between the applicant and the State in proceedings before the Court will be more aggravated, which can only harm the cause of Human Rights. The provisions in Articles 28 to 31 (art. 28, art. 29, art. 30, art. 31) clearly show that the meaning of the Convention is that the Contracting States shall also abide by a decision of admissibility. The Commission acts immediately upon its finding that the application, in whole or in part, is admissible. There is no means by which the decision laying down that all internal remedies have been exhausted can be controlled or tried by any other organ. The Commission's further dealing with the application is consequently in full compliance with the Convention when the Commission accepts the petition (Article 28) (art. 28), and undertakes to ascertain the facts, to examine the petition and carry out - if need be - an investigation. It shall try to secure a friendly settlement and if a friendly settlement is not reached, the Commission shall draw up its report on the facts and state its opinion "as to whether the facts found disclose a breach by the State concerned of its obligations under the Convention". The Commission performs a conscientious, strenuous and very extensive work - and we are confronted with a report which is prepared in full legal compliance with the provisions of the Convention and consequently according to Article 44 (art. 44), the Commission - as well as a State - has "the right to bring a case before the Court". When the Commission, or a State, exercises this right and decides to bring a case before the Court, the Court cannot decline to deal with it or decide that it will not go into the merits of the case.

As regards especially the exhaustion of internal remedies, it should be noted that the Commission, regularly and in several meetings, discusses thoroughly the question of admissibility in default of which it is not possible to bring the case duly before the Court. A State may easily waive any objections regarding exhaustion of remedies. Furthermore, a State will have every opportunity to remedy a decision during the time the application has been under consideration by the Commission, and the question of exhaustion discussed at length. This is usually the situation in every application which is dealt with by the Commission. It seems unreasonable that, under these circumstances, a State shall have the right to pursue this question of local remedies further and take it up before the Court. In this connection to speak about the rule of exhaustion as marking out the limits "within which the Contracting States have agreed to answer for wrongs alleged against them before the organs of the Convention", and that "the Court has to ensure (its) observance ... just as of the individual rights and freedoms ...", carries really no weight. As to the interests of a State in regard to exhaustion of remedies, the State itself has every opportunity to look after them before the Commission, which also protects these interests.

Articles 44, 45 and 48 (art. 44, art. 45, art. 48) speak about "a case" or "cases" brought before the Court by the Commission or by a State. The Court's jurisdiction, as mentioned above, is laid down in Article 45 (art. 45) as extending to all cases the Commission - or a State - has referred to the Court. One may ask what the Convention means by using the denomination case. The answer is simple. The case is the "report on the facts" and the Commission's opinion "whether the facts found disclose a breach by the State concerned of its obligations under the Convention" (Article 31) (art. 31). It is in respect of this report that the Court has jurisdiction to interpret and apply the Convention. In other words it is the merits which the Court shall try. Nothing less, nothing more!

The report shall be transmitted to the Committee of Ministers (Article 31 (2)) (art. 31-2) and, if the case is not referred to the Court, the Ministers shall make the decision. The Committee of Ministers is competent to "decide ... whether there has been a violation of the Convention" (Article 32 (1)) (art. 32-1), the Court has jurisdiction to examine "cases concerning the interpretation and application of the Convention" (Article 45) (art. 45). But there is in actual fact no difference between the competence of the Committee of Ministers and the competence of the Court. It is generally understood that the Ministers shall not deal with the question of admissibility, they shall only decide whether there has been a violation. But is it not just the same competence the Court exercises? The Ministers shall of course also "interpret and apply" the Convention in the same way as the Court. The fact that the Ministers do not deal with the question of admissibility bears out the contention that the Court has not this competence either. The Ministers and the Court stand in a supplementary position to each other. There is no reason to believe that their jurisdiction in regard to exhaustion of internal remedies should not be the same.

Finally, if the Court takes upon itself jurisdiction in regard to admissibility, the consequence will be that the Commission's report may not be dealt with by any responsible organ, and no final decision taken whether a violation has taken place or not. And that in spite of the fact that the report may very well contain the considered opinion of the members of the Commission that grave violations of the Convention have taken place! This result is really detrimental to the cause of Human Rights and it does not seem consistent with sound common sense.

Regarding the alleged violation of paragraph (1) of Article 5 (art. 5-1)

In this regard I concur with the conclusions of the Court. I find it, however, sufficient to state that I am in full agreement with the opinion of the Commission in regard to paragraph (1) (e) of Article 5 (art. 5-1-e) (paragraph 186 of the Commission's report). It is not for the Court or the Commission to decide whether a municipal law was correctly applied, it is sufficient that the procedure prescribed by the municipal law is applied correctly.

As to the alleged violation of paragraph (4) of Article 5 (art. 5-4)

Here I concur with the conclusion of the Court but I cannot adhere to the Court's reasoning in regard to the question whether Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) requires that two authorities should deal with a case. The Court's reasoning in respect to the text of the Convention and also the Court's statement that the supervision required by Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) is incorporated in the magistrate's decision are, in my view, not adequate on this point regarding the question of a person deprived of his liberty being entitled, even at a later stage, to bring proceedings before a court. The opinion of the Commission was divided. The European Court does not, however, in my view, need to decide this question. With this reservation I concur with the Court's conclusion on this point.

As regards the alleged violation of Article 4 (art. 4)

In this respect I also concur with the conclusions of the Court but in my view the work imposed upon the vagrants, De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp, was an incorporated consequence of the magistrate's decision of detention and cannot be considered an independent separate violation of the Convention. On these grounds I vote for the conclusion that no violation of Article 4 (art. 4) has taken place.

As to the alleged violation of Article 8 (art. 8)

Here I have a dissenting opinion. I cannot see that it was necessary for the public authorities to interfere with the correspondence of the detained vagrants. The authorities had no reason to believe that they had to censor the correspondence, either for the purpose of preventing disorder or crime, or for the protection of health and morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. The vagrants had committed no crime and even if the authorities, in their interference with the vagrants' private correspondence, were within their jurisdiction according to Belgian law they were most certainly overstepping Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention.

In regard to Article 8 (art. 8) of the Convention I therefore find that a violation has taken place.

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE ZEKIA

The main issues involved in the present case may be summarised as follows:

1. Has this Court jurisdiction to examine, after the ruling made by the Commission in favour of the admissibility of the petitions lodged by the applicants, submissions relating to (a) the non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, (b) the non-observance of the six months' time-limit, occurring in Article 26 (art. 26) of the Convention?

2. If this Court possesses such jurisdiction, to decide:
(a) whether domestic remedies had been exhausted, and
(b) whether the six months' limit was observed with the object and meaning of Article 26 (art. 26) of the Convention.

3. Whether the Belgian State has failed to meet its obligation under Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention by not providing the judicial machinery envisaged by the said Article for the benefit and protection of persons detained under the Belgian Vagrancy Act of 1891 in conjunction with Article 5 (1) (e) (art. 5-1-e) of the Convention.

4. Whether as a consequence of the alleged failure to provide an appropriate judicial machinery as per Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) or for other reasons, Belgium violated Articles 3, 4 (2) and (3), 5 (1), 6 (1) (3b) (3c), 7 and 13 (art. 3, art. 4-2, art. 4-3, art. 5-1, art. 6-1, art. 6-3-b, art. 6-3-c, art. 7, art. 13) of the said Convention.

Although I respectfully agree with the majority decision and the conclusions arrived at in respect of the major issues, yet as my line of reasoning differs to some extent in a number of points from that of the majority, I thought it appropriate to give very briefly a concurrent opinion.

I am not dealing with the factual aspect of the case. I am content for this purpose to refer to the part of the main judgment dealing with the facts of the case.

As to issue No. 1

My answer to the questions framed in issue No. 1 is in the affirmative. The Court has jurisdiction to examine (a) whether the domestic remedies have been exhausted and (b) whether the six months' time-limit has been observed. Both (a) and (b) are preconditions laid down under Articles 26 and 27 (art. 26, art. 27) for the exercise of jurisdiction by the Commission and as they constitute component parts of the Convention both fall within the ambit of Article 45 (art. 45) shall extend to all cases concerning the interpretation and application of the present Convention which the High Contracting Parties or the Commission shall refer to it in accordance with Article 48 (art. 48)". Article 49 (art. 49) leaves the last word to the Court in deciding its own jurisdiction.

I do not consider, however, that the holding of this view in any way amounts to a transgression of the domain of the Commission, admittedly an independent body within the structure of the European Convention. A ruling on the inadmissibility of an application by the Commission is final for all intents and purposes with all its implications. On the other hand, a ruling on the admissibility of such application does not and ought not to have the far-reaching effect and result that all matters touching the prerequisites for the acceptance of a petition have been decided upon once and for all and can not be questioned by any authority whatsoever including the Committee of Ministers and the Court. Had the case been so, the Court would have been handicapped in the exercise of its jurisdiction and precluded from arriving at conclusions which might appear to be inconsistent with the way in which the Commission dealt with one or more of the preconditions attached to the admissibility of a petition under Articles 26 and 27 (art. 26, art. 27).

This could not have been the intention of the Parties to the Convention. Moreover, the exhaustion of domestic remedies, prior to any right of a recourse to an international tribunal, is a vital precondition recognised by international law and governments are as a rule particularly jealous for the observance of such conditions.

The ruling on the admissibility of a petition by the Commission, strictly speaking, is not in issue before the Court. Such a ruling in the affirmative was made and as a result it set in motion the Commission who investigated the applicants' complaints under Articles 28 and 29 (art. 28, art. 29), and made its report under Article 31 (art. 31). In other words the ruling in question fulfilled the object it was intended to achieve.

As to issue No. 2

I agree with the Commission's decision that domestic remedies in the accompanying circumstances of the case were exhausted. The same applies as to whether Versyp's petition was made in time. I am of the opinion that all these applicants, throughout the material time, could not reasonably anticipate any remedy for which they could institute proceedings prior to the "Du Bois" judgment.

As to issue No. 3 relating to the alleged violation of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention

The Belgian Government strongly argued that the requirement of the Convention under Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) has been satisfied by the fact that the detention of the applicants in a vagrancy centre or assistance home was ordered by a magistrate. Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) reads: "Everyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful".

Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) postulates the detention of a person effected by some authority and that such person disputes the lawfulness of his detention and wishes to take proceedings in a court in order to obtain a judicial decision on the lawfulness or otherwise of his detention with a view to his release from such detention if he succeeds in his recourse or appeal.

Could the functions of the magistrate whose primary duty is to implement the Vagrancy Act of 1891, and in pursuance of that Act, to investigate "the identity, age, physical and mental state and manner of life" of the person involved and if satisfied to send such person suspected as vagrant in pursuance of Sections 13 and 16 of the said Act to a vagrancy centre or to an assistance home, conform or correspond with the functions of a court whose primary duty would be to ascertain, according to Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4), whether the vagrant in question is lawfully detained or not.

Even if we admit that the magistrate constitutes a court for deciding the lawfulness of the detention, he has not before him a case of detention the lawfulness of which is sub judice. Detention originates from his own order. He cannot be the judge of his own act. He is not there to decide either as to the lawfulness of the arrest and detention by the policemen who brought the applicant before him with a view to investigating whether a state of vagrancy existed and if it did which of the courses under Sections 13 and 16 of the Vagrancy Act of 1891 is to be adopted.

The applicants are not the persons who instituted proceedings before the magistrate. Apart from the unsuitability and inadequacy of its procedural rules, if the magistrate could be considered as the court under Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4), then his decision is expected to be a judicial one, that is a decision in a declaratory form that the detention of the applicants is lawful or unlawful. The Conseil d'État, however, in the Du Bois case, in connection with the nature of the order of the magistrate, authoritatively stated that placing a vagrant at the disposal of the Government is not the result of a criminal offence but "an administrative security measure ... of a purely administrative nature".

It is obvious from what has been said that the magistrate in applying Sections 13 and 16 of the Vagrancy Act of 1891 was performing administrative and not judicial functions, as one would have expected a court to discharge its duties under Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4).

Even if we accept, for argument's sake, the magistrate constituting a police court with a competence to decide speedily lawfulness of detention for the purpose of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4), could it be said that a detainee during the period of his continued detention can apply anew to the said magistrate to decide about the legality of such detention? An order of detention might be lawful at its inception but it cannot be said that irrespective of any supervening events it continues to be lawful throughout the duration of his detention.

Can it be said that, after the decision of the Conseil d'État in the Du Bois case, the way to seeking a remedy by a vagrant detainee is wide open and therefore if there was a gap in the Belgian judicial system in connection with Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) this no longer existed? I have my doubts about this. As a rule, High Judicial or Administrative Tribunals, in all countries, are not suited for the delivery of speedy decisions contemplated in the Article (art. 5) in question. The decision on the lawfulness of a detention might depend not only on the legal aspect but also on the consideration of the factual aspect of a case. The High Courts, administrative or otherwise, as a rule are not inclined to go deeply into the factual aspects of the case.

But this is a matter for the future. If the constitution and the procedural rules of the Conseil d'État, as well as the time at their disposal, allow them to deal speedily with recourses coming from the inmates of the vagrancy centres or assistance homes so much the better for this class of detainees.

I am therefore of the opinion that the Belgian State failed, within the material period, to discharge its obligations under Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention.

As to issues in No. 4

Failure on the part of the Government to make available, for the applicants under detention, a court in which they could institute proceedings for obtaining a decision on the lawfulness of their detention, in my view, does not necessarily amount to a violation of Articles 3 to 6 (art. 3, art. 4, art. 5, art. 6) of the Convention. These Articles (art. 3, art. 4, art. 5, art. 6), although inter-related with Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4), are not interdependent. Because there was no court available for the applicants to decide whether they were rightly or wrongly kept in detention it does not necessarily follow that they were unlawfully detained. On the material, documentary or otherwise, put before us, I cannot say that the detention of the applicants under the relevant Belgian Act and procedure was unlawful. Allegations of contraventions of other Articles of the Convention, independently of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4), have not been substantiated. In this connection I respectfully associate myself with the views expressed in the main judgment.

The consideration for a remedy, due to violation of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4), is up to the national authority to decide as per Article 13 (art. 13), which reads:

> "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

I have, however, to make certain reservations. This Court having been called upon to decide on allegations of contraventions of certain Articles of the Convention has to pronounce judgment on the evidence available. In doing so, however, one can not lose sight of the fact that the proper forum for deciding the legality of the detention under Article 5 (1) (e) (art. 5-1-e) is the national court where applicants could go and adduce before it the evidence they possess. Strictly speaking, applicants are not parties before our Court.

I entertain, therefore, doubts as to what extent our Court can pronounce final and binding judgments on matters primarily falling within the jurisdiction of the national courts, access to which might be rendered possible in the future.

JOINT SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGES BALLADORE PALLIERI AND VERDROSS

(Translation)

We regret that on several points we are not able to agree with the judgment.

First, we cannot go so far as the judgment in declaring at paragraph 69: "Having thus the character of a vagrant the applicants could ... be made the subject of a detention". In our opinion, the Court is not, in the first place, competent to declare that a person is a vagrant any more than to declare that a person is a criminal or of unsound mind. It can only find that this or that criterion has been established in internal law in accordance with a lawful procedure conforming to the requirements of the Convention in a way which renders legitimate certain measures taken by the State. Apart from this, since in the Court's opinion the applicants were not in a position to have supervised within the meaning of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention the lawfulness of their alleged character of a vagrant, it had to be concluded that there were perhaps very strong reasons to hold that they were vagrants and that it was permitted to undertake and pursue the appropriate procedure, but that the state of vagrancy could not yet be considered to exist according to the Convention. The same principle as that in Article 6 (2) (art. 6-2) of the Convention is applicable here ("Everyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law"). According to the Court, the state of vagrancy was not lawfully established because of the violation of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention; it was therefore still to be presumed that they were not vagrants.

The judgment finds, on the contrary, that the state of vagrancy could be taken as established (a conclusion of which it takes account, moreover, in paragraphs 89 and 92) and it accepts that the Belgian Government took the measures allowed by the Convention against vagrants. In these circumstances, it seems rather difficult to understand how the conclusion can be reached that there has been a violation of the Convention by the Belgian State.

On the other hand, if, while admitting that in the present cases one was actually dealing with vagrants for whom the measures (deprivation of liberty) provided for by the Convention were allowed, one nonetheless adds that the Belgian Act, due to its undeniable imperfections, does not offer sufficient guarantees to ensure the observance of the Convention in all cases, it is easy to object that it is not at all the Court's function to judge in abstracto the worth of the legislation of a Contracting State. The jurisdiction of the Court is conditioned by the presence of a victim (Articles 5 (5) and 48 (b) of the Convention) (art. 5-5, art. 48-b) and the Court's task is to put right the wrong suffered by the person concerned. Without a victim, no condemnation of a State by the Court is possible.

As regards more particularly the proceedings mentioned in Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention, there are several points on which we are in agreement with the Court. First of all, the Court states, quite rightly in our opinion, that the Convention requires only the supervision by a judicial organ of the measures taken by the police, irrespective of whether this control is exercised ex officio or at the request of the interested party. We also agree with the Court in accepting that the Belgian magistrate, invested with jurisdiction to decide in vagrancy matters, is a court independent of the executive and enjoying the guarantees afforded to the judges by Articles 99 and 100 of the Belgian Constitution. Similarly, we can also accept that the magistrate necessarily decides on the lawfulness of the detention which the prosecuting authority requests him to sanction. Lastly, the same is true of the finding that the procedure before the said magistrate allows certain rights of the defence and presents certain judicial features, such as the hearing taking place and the decision being given in public. Nevertheless, the Court finishes by deciding that all this is not sufficient.

In the opinion of the Court the forms of the procedure need not necessarily be identical in each of the cases where the Convention requires the intervention of a court. Once again, we agree with the Court: one cannot, for example, consider the procedure for the detention of a person of unsound mind to be satisfactory if it did not include medical examinations fully guaranteeing objectivity and competence. But, in the present cases, the Court says that the deprivation of liberty complained of by the applicants resembles very closely that imposed in criminal cases and that therefore the procedure to be followed should not provide guarantees markedly inferior to those existing in criminal matters in the member States of the Council of Europe. This comparison seems scarcely exact to us. Shelter in an assistance home or in a vagrancy centre is not quite the same as being locked in prison; the consequences are not shameful to the same degree; release can be requested and obtained at any time, which is not the case where a prison sentence is being served. On the other hand, it must be emphasised that the decision of the magistrate in vagrancy matters deals simply with the existence of certain factual conditions which are quite easily established and which do not require either a lengthy investigation or long hearings. A rather simplified procedure therefore normally suffices.

To conclude, detention for vagrancy is a particular measure of security, sometimes requested by the interested persons themselves and very different from detention in a criminal case. It is perhaps otherwise in the only case where the placing at the disposal of the Government is not of a temporary and transitory nature but is decided for a whole determinate period which, according to Belgian law, can go up to seven years. In that case it can reasonably be asked whether this is not a sort of conviction and sentence, and even quite a serious one, to which the ordinary guarantees of criminal procedure should apply. The Court however has not made an abstraction of this case, which concerned only some of the applicants; moreover, De Wilde and Versyp, who were both placed at the disposal of the Government for two years, were released before, and one of them well before, the expiry of the term which thus does not seem to be as rigorous as a criminal sentence. With all reservations as to the compatibility in general of the Belgian law with the Convention, we do not believe that in the present cases there are sufficient elements to support the conclusion that there has been a violation on this point by the Belgian Government of the applicants' right protected by Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention.

We cannot follow the Court on yet another point. Even if the decision of the magistrate does not constitute the result of proceedings before a court, within the meaning of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention, the Court has not taken into account, as it should have done, the possibility of appealing to the Conseil d'État. It is true that, although the applicants failed to appeal to the Conseil d'État, the Court has unanimously declared the submission of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies to be ill-founded for the reason that the applicants can not be blamed for not having attempted an appeal which, according to established case-law, was inadmissible. This, however, does not mean that such an appeal could not have been possible. The Du Bois case, which was already pending at the time of the detention of the applicants, reversed the former case-law and the Conseil d'État decided that the orders of the magistrates in vagrancy matters were subject to appeal to it. An appeal by the applicants which would very likely have been the subject of a decision by the Conseil d'État subsequent to the Du Bois judgment would have been dealt with in the same way and would have been declared admissible and then judged. From the uncertainty of the situation existing at the time, while in spite of the previous case-law to the contrary a new attempt to appeal to the Conseil d'État had already been made and had finally been crowned with success, no argument can be drawn either to deny that, according to the communis opinio, there had then been exhaustion of domestic remedies or to deny that, this notwithstanding, the real possibility of an appeal existed. The applicants can ask to be excused for not having entered an appeal which at that time seemed ill-founded but they cannot seriously complain that an appeal did not exist which in fact existed.

It must also be added that the Court has acknowledged (paragraph 82) that the Convention is directly applicable in Belgium so that any alleged violation of the Convention could have been submitted for examination by the superior administrative court once the latter had, as in the Du Bois case, declared itself competent to examine the magistrate's orders. The Court finally does not omit to emphasise that nothing allows it to be affirmed a priori that the Conseil d'État would not have decided speedily.

Even if the magistrate does not constitute the court mentioned in Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention, the appeal to the Conseil d'État, which was admissible at the time of the proceedings, is enough to prevent it being declared that there has been a violation of this provision of the Convention by the Belgian Government.

COLLECTIVE SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGES HOLMBÄCK, RODENBOURG, ROSS, FAVRE AND BILGE

(Translation)

The Court has decided, by a majority of nine votes to seven, that there has been a violation of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) in that the applicants could not take proceedings before a court against the decisions ordering their detention.

In our opinion this decision is not well-founded. The following are the reasons for our opposition to this part of the judgment.

1. The system of protection of Human Rights set up by the Convention comprises two types of applications:

(a) interstate applications, that is those by which a State refers to the Commission any breach of the provisions of the Convention by another State (Article 24 of the Convention) (art. 24); and

(b) individual applications, that is by persons claiming to be victims of the violation by a State of the rights set forth in the Convention (Article 25 of the Convention) (art. 25).

The difference in character between the two types of applications has been demonstrated in particular by the decision of the Commission on the admissibility of the applications by Denmark, Norway, Sweden and the Netherlands against Greece, of 31st May 1968. The Commission observed

> "that, under Article 24 (art. 24) of the Convention, any High Contracting Party may refer to the Commission 'any alleged breach of the provisions of the Convention by another High Contracting Party' ('tout manquement aux dispositions de la présente Convention qu'elle croira pouvoir être imputé à une autre Partie Contractante'); whereas it is true that, under Article 25 (art. 25), only such individuals may seize the Commission as claim to be 'victims' of a violation of the Convention; whereas, however, the condition of a 'victim' is not mentioned in Article 24 (art. 24); whereas, consequently, a High Contracting Party, when alleging a violation of the Convention under Article 24 (art. 24), is not obliged to show the existence of a victim of such violation either as a particular incident or, for example, as forming part of an administrative practice". (Yearbook 1968, p. 776)

Then again, the Commission's precedents are well-defined in the decision of 8th January 1960, X against Ireland, in which the Commission considered that

> "it is clear from Article 25 (1) (art. 25-1) of the Convention that the Commission can properly receive an application from a person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals only if such persons ... claim to be the victim of a violation by one of the High Contracting Parties of the rights set forth in the Convention; ... it follows that the Commission can examine the compatibility of domestic legislation with the Convention only with respect to its application to a person ... and only insofar as its application is alleged to constitute a violation of the Convention in regard to the applicant person, ... and whereas, therefore, in a case submitted by an individual under > Article 25 (art. 25), the Commission is not competent to examine in abstracto the question of the conformity of domestic legislation with the provisions of the Convention". (Yearbook 3, pp. 218-220)

In perfect harmony with the Commission, the Court decided in the De Becker case (Judgment of 27th March 1962, p. 26) that

> "the Court is not called upon, under Articles 19 and 25 (art. 19, art. 25) of the Convention, to give a decision on an abstract problem relating to the compatibility of (the national) Act with the provisions of the Convention, but on the specific case of the application of such an Act to the applicant and to the extent to which the latter would, as a result, be prevented from exercising one of the rights guaranteed by the Convention". (See also Digest of Case Law, No. 299; "Les Droits de l'Homme", European Colloquy of 1965: Ganshof van der Meersch, pp. 208 et seqq., Scheuner, p. 363; Vasak: La Convention européenne, No. 190; Monconduit: La Commission européenne, p. 188)

Thus, the Court has to examine not whether Belgian legislation, analysed in abstracto, satisfies the requirements of the Convention, but solely whether the applicants have been "victims" of a violation of the provisions of the Convention guaranteeing their rights in the specific circumstances in which they found themselves and having regard to their conduct, acts and omissions. In such cases there can be no violation of the Convention unless it is proved that the rights of the applicants have been violated, not nominally, but in a concrete way by a decision or measure of the administrative or judicial authority.

2. The underlying concept of the judgment is that the procedure instituted by Belgian legislation is too summary; consequently, it does not guarantee to the vagrants sufficient protection of their rights and does not meet the requirements of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention.

The consequence which the Convention draws from the violation of Article 5 (art. 5) is that the victim of an unlawful detention has an enforceable right to compensation (Article 5 (5)) (art. 5-5). It is for the State to make reparation, if possible, for the consequences of the decision or measure attacked; all the same, the judgment must inform it as to the nature and extent of the damage. If internal law allows of only partial reparations "the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party" (Article 50 of the Convention) (art. 50).

Yet the judgment, which has limited itself to an abstract criticism of the Belgian legal system, does not say what are the legal effects of the unlawful detention of the applicants.

3. Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention provides that "everyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings ..." before "a court ...". The Convention clearly specifies proceedings (un recours) before a court (un tribunal). There is no doubt that it is the magistrate who orders the detention. Nor was there in the Belgian legal system as applied up to the Du Bois judgment of 7th June 1967 - a judgment subsequent to the ratification of the Convention - any real possibility of taking proceedings before a court. But it is obvious that Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention was conceived in contemplation of the case where detention is ordered by the police authorities, which measure must be submitted to judicial supervision (Commission's report, para. 176). As, under Belgian law, the detention is ordered by a judge, judicial supervision of the lawfulness of detention is incorporated in the decision and this is done ex officio.

The hearings have clarified this point. The Commission's report shows (para. 176) that, in the opinion of MM. Sørensen and Castberg, members of the Commission, the requirements of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) are satisfied as soon as the lawfulness of the deprivation of liberty is examined by a court exercising judicial jurisdiction, even if there has not been a previous judicial decision; in such a case, the word "proceedings" ("recours") had no independent meaning. At the hearing of 18th November 1970, Mr. Sørensen, the Principal Delegate of the Commission, explained that the majority of the Commission had not shared his opinion because Belgian legislation did not provide a further supervision of the lawfulness of the detention. However, the 1891 Act provides at Sections 15 and 18 that the Minister of Justice shall release detained persons, whose detention he considers to be no longer necessary. The Commission did not take into account that, during their detention, the applicants had had the right to request their release, on the ground that their detention was no longer justified, and to complain of the nature, which in their opinion had become unlawful, of their detention, as well as, moreover, of any violation of their rights by the administrative authorities by addressing themselves to the Minister of Justice and by way of an appeal against a negative decision of this authority to the Conseil d'État. Although the applicants addressed many requests to the Minister of Justice, none of them appealed to the Conseil d'État which did not therefore pronounce itself on the lawfulness of their continued detention.

It must finally be pointed out that, under Article 60 (art. 60) of the Convention, the provisions of the Convention may not be construed in a way that limits the rights ensured under national legislation. Hence, as the Belgian legislation goes further than Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) in that it institutes a compulsory supervision of the lawfulness of detention - while the Convention provides only the possibility of taking proceedings - it takes precedence over the text of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) on this point, and this precisely by virtue of Article 60 (art. 60) of the Convention.

4. The Commission, although acknowledging that the magistrate is a judicial organ (report, paras. 89-90), considered that Belgian legislation did not observe Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention because the decision the magistrate takes is of an administrative nature. And the judgment of our Court states that the procedure in question is affected by the administrative nature of the decision to be given (para. 79).

The Convention, however, does not here distinguish between an administrative and a judicial decision. In any event, the boundary line between the two functions cannot be traced according to specific criteria. Many administrative acts involve a jurisdictional function (see Carré de Malberg, Théorie générale de l'État, I, p. 762). Many judicial acts contain an administrative element: in passing judgment, the judge sitting in a criminal court fulfils a judicial function, which consists in ascertaining whether the conduct of the accused comes under the provisions of the law and in assessing the degree of guilt; in addition, he determines the sentence by a decision which forms part of the administrative function.

The 1891 legislator expressly considered the magistrate to be a judicial authority (Section 2). In fact the function of a magistrate in vagrancy matters involves a decision of an administrative nature, which is preceded by a judicial activity consisting of the examination of the legal conditions which justify the detention and of the decision which closes this examination.

5. The criticism which the judgment levels at Belgian legislation is that it has not instituted satisfactory guarantees for the protection of the rights of vagrants. It is appropriate to examine whether the applicants have had the opportunity to defend themselves and whether the decisions taken in their regard are vitiated by arbitrariness.

The decision which the magistrate is called upon to take is the detention, that is a measure of deprivation of liberty. Contrary to what was said in the Neumeister judgment (p. 44, para. 24), that the term court "in no way relates to the procedure to be followed", it has to be accepted that where the authority can order deprivation of liberty, a procedure must be followed which gives the person concerned every possibility of defending himself.

Now "in these cases the proceedings before the magistrate are in public and ... the parties have an opportunity to be heard. The judge is required to hear the defence of the person brought before him who has the right to be assisted by a lawyer; he can apply to the judge for investigation to be made and in particular for witnesses to be heard; when the judge grants such an application the witnesses are heard in the presence of the person concerned who may make his observations on the evidence given. The judge must give reasons for his decision". (report, para. 190, individual opinion of Mr. Welter, member of the Commission)

The judgment states (para. 79) that the only provision relevant to the right of defence appears in Section 3 of the Act of 1st May 1849 which affords an adjournment of three days to the person concerned if he so requests. It must however be added that, by virtue of Section 11 of the 1891 Act, the public prosecutor is empowered to release the arrested person pending the hearing (report, footnote 1 to para. 164); this is to allow for a preparation of the defence.

It is quite true that the legal procedure is summary. However, if there were no national rule of procedure applicable, it would not necessarily follow that the decision of detention would be unlawful. What is essential is that the principles of law underlying Articles 5 and 6 (art. 5, art. 6) of the Convention be respected and, particularly, that the vagrants be given the opportunity to state all the circumstances relating to their condition, that they can bring forward all their means of defence and, if necessary, that they have the benefit of free legal aid. And these principles are incorporated in Belgian national law; they are in perfect accord with Belgian legislation. At a hearing of the Commission on 6th April 1967, Me Magnée, counsel for the applicants, admitted expressly that the assistance of a lawyer is granted to the vagrant within the three-day period if he so requests.

It is clearly established then that the three applicants abandoned the exercise of the rights granted to them for their defence. We shall see further on under point 6 how very understandable it was that they behaved in this way.

Under Section 12 of the 1891 Act "the magistrate shall ascertain the identity, age, physical and mental state and manner of life of the persons brought before the police court". It is not open to the Court to presume that any of the magistrates who dealt with these cases did not act in all conscience and mindful of all the rights of the persons concerned.

6. It is not contested that, at the time of the orders of detention, the three applicants were vagrants. The magistrate was, therefore, bound to order their detention. He had to decide whether the vagrant was to be sent to an assistance home (Section 16 of the 1891 Act) or to a vagrancy centre (Section 13). Detention in an assistance home is ordered for one year at most. Detention in a vagrancy centre is for at least two years. Ooms was detained in an assistance home, De Wilde and Versyp in a vagrancy centre.

The case of Ooms is a simple one. Ooms, who had many convictions in criminal cases and had been detained four times as a vagrant, presented himself at the police station to be dealt with as a vagrant, unless a social service found him a job. His request was acceded to; he was placed in an assistance home.

Does the application of Section 13 of the 1891 Act rather than Section 16 in the cases of De Wilde and Versyp indirectly amount to a violation of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention which implies that the judgment must be delivered in circumstances which guarantee a proper administration of justice?

Regarding Article 5 (1) (art. 5-1) of the Convention the Commission stated (report, para. 186): "It is not for the Commission to decide whether the municipal law was correctly applied by the competent authorities in the present cases, provided that an examination of the proceedings does not show that the authorities acted arbitrarily". The same holds good for Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) and for the role of the Court.

Section 13 of the 1891 Act provides for placement in a vagrancy centre of "able-bodied persons who, instead of working for their livelihood, exploit charity as professional beggars and persons who through idleness, drunkenness or immorality live in a state of vagrancy".

The detention of vagrants is a security measure which, while training the individual to work and possibly overcoming his urge for drink, aims at removing the dangers he represents for society.

The Brussels magistrate, before whom Versyp was brought – Versyp insisted on his return to the welfare settlements, as he had been in Merksplas before - was, at the time of the interrogation, in possession of a report of the Brussels Social Rehabilitation Office (dated 4th November 1965), stating in particular: "all our attempts at rehabilitation have failed on account of his apathy, idleness and weakness for drink". Furthermore, his criminal record discloses 24 convictions for larceny and attempted larceny, indecent assault, drunkenness, travelling without a ticket, assault and receiving stolen property; and, in addition, three previous detentions for vagrancy. The magistrate's order refers expressly to Versyp's examination and to his file, which contains, inter alia, the aforementioned report from the Social Rehabilitation Office. The detention note (of 4th November 1965) indicates the motives for the detention, "apathy, idleness and weakness for drink".

When De Wilde presented himself at the Charleroi police station after spending some nights at the railway station, he declared that he had never been placed as a vagrant. The magistrate asked for an information note (it is dated 19th April 1966) which shows thirteen convictions for various offences, of which six involved sentences of imprisonment for larceny, and, in addition, five previous detentions for vagrancy. The magistrate's order refers to the examination and file which includes the aforementioned information note. It is worthy of note that De Wilde, released on 16th November 1966, was again detained for vagrancy, during the proceedings, from 11th January 1967 to 15th May 1967.

Is it possible to consider that the measure taken by the two magistrates at Brussels and Charleroi was arbitrary? An act is arbitrary when it violates in a serious and obvious way a legal rule or again when it is devoid of all serious justification. The least one can say is that it has not been proved that the magistrates at Brussels and Charleroi clearly violated Section 13 of the 1891 Act when, in placing Versyp and De Wilde in a vagrancy centre, they took into consideration the moral and social disorder which characterised the behaviour of these two vagrants.

Even the applicants' counsel, who had stated "very incidentally" that Versyp was contesting the application of Section 13 of the 1891 Act in his regard, did not, as the Commission stated (report, para. 51, footnote 1), take up the complaint again either at the hearing before the Commission on 8th February 1968 or in the final conclusions submitted during that hearing. Moreover, the Commission did not go into this complaint in its memorial to the Court, nor did the applicants' counsel do so in his observations appended to the Commission's memorial.

7. To conclude: the three applicants were vagrants. They were detained for vagrancy. The order of detention was made by a court and with the formalities of a public hearing in the presence of the parties during and after which the persons appearing had the opportunity to avail themselves of all means of defence. They did not make use of this right. The clearly established facts show that the measures taken in their regard were not arbitrary and that it is doubtful whether other magistrates or even a court of appeal could have come to decisions appreciably different from those which were taken.

It is impossible to deduce from the facts that the applicants were victims of a violation by the Belgian authorities of the rights which the Convention guarantees to them.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

COURT (PLENARY)

CASES OF DE WILDE, OOMS AND VERSYP ("VAGRANCY")
v. BELGIUM (ARTICLE 50)

(Application no. 2832/66; 2835/66; 2899/66)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

10 March 1972

In the De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp cases,

The European Court of Human Rights, taking its decision in plenary session in accordance with Rule 48 of its Rules and composed of the following Judges:

Sir Humphrey WALDOCK, President,
MM. G. BALLADORE PALLIERI
R. CASSIN
Å. E. V. HOLMBÄCK
A. VERDROSS
H. ROLIN
E. RODENBOURG
A. N. C. ROSS
T. WOLD
H. MOSLER
M. ZEKIA
A. FAVRE
J. CREMONA
G. WIARDA
S. SIGURJÓNSSON,

and also MM. M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and J. F. SMYTH, Deputy Registrar, Decides as follows on the question of the application of Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention in the present cases:

PROCEDURE

1. The De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp cases - referred to the Court on 24 October 1969 by the Government of the Kingdom of Belgium ("the Government") - have their origin in petitions lodged in 1966 with the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") by three Belgian nationals concerning certain aspects of Belgian legislation on vagrancy and its application to these three persons.

2. By judgment of 18 June 1971 the Court rejected a number of complaints made by the three applicants with respect to their detention under the vagrancy laws in force in Belgium. In particular, the Court held that there had been no breach of Article 5 (1) (art. 5-1) of the Convention, since it had "not found either irregularity or arbitrariness in the placing of the three applicants at the disposal of the Government" and had "no reason to find the resulting detention incompatible with Article 5 (1) (e) (art. 5-1-e) of the Convention" (point II-2 of the operative part of the judgment and paragraphs 66-70 of the reasoning).

On the other hand, the Court held that there had been a breach of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) in that the applicants had "had no remedy open to them before a court against the decisions ordering their detention" (point II-4 of the operative part of the judgment). On this point the Court found that the proceedings before a magistrate in regard to vagrants prescribed by Belgian law did not by themselves satisfy the requirements of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) and that a remedy before a court should therefore have been open to the applicants by which the lawfulness of their detention might be determined (paragraphs 74-80 of the reasoning). The Court further reserved for the applicants the right, should the occasion arise, to apply for just satisfaction on this issue (point II-13 of the operative part of the judgment).

3. On 27 September 1971, the Principal Delegate of the Commission, making reference to point II-13 of the operative part of the judgment, transmitted to the Registrar a letter dated 23 July in which the applicants' counsel asked the Commission to request the Court to award to his clients damages for "unlawful detention".

4. After consultation with the members of the Court, the President directed that the examination of this aspect of the cases should be conducted by the Judges who had taken part in the judgment of 18 June 1971. One of these Judges, Mr. Bilge, could not, however, exercise his functions as he has been appointed a member of the Turkish Government (Rule 4 of the Rules of Court).

5. On the instructions of the President, the Registrar requested the Agent of the Government, and then the Delegates of the Commission, to present their written observations on the question of the application of Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention. The Registrar received these observations on 27 October and 17 December 1971; a memorandum from the applicants' counsel was appended to the Commission's observations.

6. By Order of 4 January 1972, the President of the Court:

- authorised the Agent of the Government to file a second memorial not later than 31 January on the understanding that he could complete it at the oral hearings;

- and, the Delegates of the Commission having intimated that they did not desire to present further written observations, decided that the oral hearings should open on 14 February.

The Government's second memorial was received at the Registry on 31 January 1972.

7. On 10 January, the Agent of the Government sent to the Registrar, for the information of the Court, statistics of the appeals presented under the transitional provisions contained in Section 2 of the Act of 6 August 1971 (see paragraph 13 below).

8. The public hearings took place on 14 February in the Human Rights Building at Strasbourg.

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government:
Mr. J. DE MEYER, Professor
at Louvain University, Assessor to the Council of State, Agent and Counsel;
- for the Commission:
Mr. M. SØRENSEN, Principal Delegate, and
Mr. G. SPERDUTI, Delegate.

The Court heard the addresses and submissions of Mr. Sørensen and Mr. De Meyer as well as their replies to questions put by the Court and by individual Judges.

The hearings were declared provisionally closed on 14 February.

9. After having made final the closure of the hearings and deliberated in private, the Court gives the present judgment.

AS TO THE FACTS

10. The Court is called upon to rule only on the question of the application of Article 50 (art. 50) in the present cases. Thus, as regards the facts the Court will confine itself here to giving a brief outline and for the rest it refers to paragraphs 15 to 43 of its judgment of 18 June 1971.

11. That judgment concerned the detention of De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp ordered by decisions of the magistrates at Charleroi, Namur and Brussels on 19 April 1966, 21 December 1965 and 4 November 1965 respectively under Sections 13 (in the cases of De Wilde and Versyp) and 16 (in the case of Ooms) of the Act of 27 November 1891 for the suppression of vagrancy and begging. De Wilde regained his freedom after a little less than seven months (three of which he spent serving a prison sentence), Ooms after one year and Versyp after one year, nine months and six days.

12. In the course of the proceedings before the Commission, the applicants each claimed 500 Belgian francs (BF) damages per day of detention. Their counsel, Me. Magnée, now relies on the judgment of 18 June 1971 to claim, on behalf of each of them, damages of 300 BF per day of "unlawful detention".

With that object, Me. Magnée began by addressing to the Belgian Minister of Justice, on 22 and 30 June 1971, two letters of which the first related to Versyp and the second to Ooms. On 12 July, the Minister replied that the Government could only apply the law as it stood while waiting for the Bill on "social misfits" - which it had introduced even before the judgment of 18 June 1971 - to be passed. Considering this reply to amount to a refusal contrary to the principle of the supremacy of international treaty law over national law, Me. Magnée informed the Minister, on 14 July that he proposed to bring the matter before the "competent authorities" and to notify the Commission.

Counsel for the applicants did in fact write first to the Committee of Ministers - 16 July - to inform them of the Minister of Justice's refusal which implied, he alleged, a violation of the Court's judgment; he later wrote, on 23 July, to the Commission referring to Articles 5 (5), 48 and 50 (art. 5-5, art. 48, art. 50) of the Convention and requested the Commission to bring before the Court the claim made by each of his three clients.

On 2 August, he addressed to the Minister of Justice a letter concerning De Wilde which was worded in the same terms as the letters of 22 and 30 June. The Minister acknowledged its receipt on 12 August, noting that along with the other two it had been communicated by Me. Magnée to the Commission.

13. In its memorial of 27 October 1971, the Government pointed out to the Court that on 17 June 1971 it had tabled in Parliament a Bill on "social misfits" intended to replace the 1891 Act. The Government added that, desiring to comply with the judgment of 18 June 1971 without awaiting the passage of this Bill, it had voted by Parliament an Act of 6 August 1971 amending the 1891 Act and containing two sections. The first, which inserted a new section, numbered 16 bis, in the 1891 Act, provides that decisions taken under Sections 13 and 16 are henceforth made subject to the remedies available under the Code of Criminal Procedure, including appeal. Section 2 was a transitional provision: it specified that vagrants or beggars held in detention on the entry into force of the 1971 Act (4 September 1971) in execution of a decision taken under Section 13 or Section 16 of the 1891 Act, could exercise for a period of one month the remedy provided for at Section 16 bis.

AS TO THE LAW

I. AS TO THE ADMISSIBILITY OF THE APPLICANTS' CLAIMS

14. In its written observations of October 1971 and January 1972 and also at the oral hearings, the Government requested the Court to rule

> "that the applications for compensation lodged with the Commission on behalf of the applicants are not admissible since the domestic remedies have not been exhausted".

15. In support of this submission, the Government relied, in the first place, on Article 26 (art. 26) of the Convention contending that this provision applied not only to the original petition addressed by an individual to the Commission under Article 25 (art. 25) but also to a claim for compensation made by him after the Court has held that in his case there has been a violation of a right guaranteed by the Convention.

Article 26 (art. 26) reads: "The Commission may only deal with the matter after all domestic remedies have been exhausted, according to the generally recognised rules of international law ..."; Article 27 (3) (art. 27-3) then provides that "the Commission shall reject any petition referred to it which it considers inadmissible under Article 26 (art. 26)". This last provision therefore defines a condition to which the Commission's "dealing with" the case is subjected; it concerns "petitions" lodged with that organ. In other words, this provision relates to the institution of the proceedings which fall within Section III of the Convention. The present cases no longer relate to such proceedings but to the final phase of proceedings brought before the Court in accordance with Section IV on the conclusion of those to which the petitions of Jacques De Wilde, Franz Ooms and Edgard Versyp gave rise before the Commission. The claims made by the three applicants for compensation are not new petitions; they relate to the reparation to be decided by the Court in respect of a violation adjudged by the Court and they have nothing to do with the introduction of proceedings before the Commission under Articles 25, 26 and 27 (art. 25, art. 26, art. 27) of the Convention; while the Commission transmitted them to the Court, it did so without any accompanying report and solely with a view to giving the Court the assistance which, in a general way, it lends to the Court in accordance with Rule 71 of its Rules of Procedure.

The Court, like the Delegates of the Commission, is therefore of the opinion that Article 26 (art. 26) is not applicable in the present matter.

16. In support of its plea of inadmissibility, the Government put forward a second argument based on Article 50 (art. 50): as they had not exhausted domestic remedies, the applicants had not established, according to the Government, that Belgian internal law "allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences" of the violation found by the judgment of 18 June 1971; it followed that their claims for damages were inadmissible.

In the Court's opinion, the part of the sentence just quoted states merely a rule going to the merits. If the draftsmen of the Convention had meant to make the admissibility of claims for "just satisfaction" subordinate to the prior exercise of domestic remedies they would have taken care to specify this in Article 50 (art. 50) as they did in Article 26 (art. 26), combined with Article 27 (3) (art. 27-3), in respect of petitions addressed to the Commission. In the absence of such an explicit indication of their intention, the Court cannot take the view that Article 50 (art. 50) enunciates in substance the same rule as Article 26 (art. 26).

Moreover, Article 50 (art. 50) has its origin in certain clauses which appear in treaties of a classical type - such as, Article 10 of the German Swiss Treaty on Arbitration and Conciliation, 1921, and Article 32 of the Geneva General Act for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes, 1928 - and have no connection with the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies.

In addition, if the victim, after exhausting in vain the domestic remedies before complaining at Strasbourg of a violation of his rights, were obliged to do so a second time before being able to obtain from the Court just satisfaction, the total length of the procedure instituted by the Convention would scarcely be in keeping with the idea of the effective protection of Human Rights. Such a requirement would lead to a situation incompatible with the aim and object of the Convention.

17. The Court therefore sees no reason to declare the claims in question inadmissible and will proceed to examine into their merits.

II. AS TO THE MERITS OF THE APPLICANTS' CLAIMS

18. The present stage of these cases revolves around Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention which reads:

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the present Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

19. In its written observations of October 1971 and January 1972 and at the oral hearings, the Government requested the Court to rule:

> - "that the conditions required for the application of Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention have not been fulfilled in the present cases;
> - that it is not necessary to afford satisfaction to the applicants".

At the hearing in the afternoon of 14 February, the Commission's final submission was

> "may it please the Court to grant the applicants appropriate satisfaction, bearing in mind that a new remedy has been introduced in Belgian law following the judgment given on 18 June 1971 by the European Court of Human Rights and thus indirectly following the applications lodged by MM. De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp with the Commission".

20. The Government submitted in particular that Belgian internal law enables the national courts to order the State to make reparation for damage caused by an illegal situation for which it is responsible whether this situation constitutes a breach of rules of internal law or of rules of international law. It would follow that the applicants have to take proceedings before the national courts; as they have not done so their claims for damages were not only inadmissible (see paragraph 16 above) but also without foundation.

The Court cannot accept this view.

No doubt, the treaties from which the text of Article 50 (art. 50) was borrowed had more particularly in view cases where the nature of the injury would make it possible to wipe out entirely the consequences of a violation but where the internal law of the State involved precludes this being done. Nevertheless, the provisions of Article 50 (art. 50) which recognise the Court's competence to grant to the injured party a just satisfaction also cover the case where the impossibility of restitutio in integrum follows from the very nature of the injury; indeed, common sense suggests that this must be so a fortiori. The Court sees no reason why, in the latter case just as in the former, it should not have the right to award to the injured persons the just satisfaction that they had not obtained from the Government of the respondent State.

This is clearly the position in the present cases. Neither the Belgian internal law, nor indeed any other conceivable system of law, can make it possible to wipe out the consequences of the fact that the three applicants did not have available to them the right, guaranteed by Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4), to take proceedings before a court in order to have the lawfulness of their detention decided. Furthermore, the Belgian Government has declined to give De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp the compensation which they claimed.

The mere fact that the applicants could have brought and could still bring their claims for damages before a Belgian court does not therefore require the Court to dismiss those claims as being ill-founded any more than it raises an obstacle to their admissibility (see paragraph 16 above).

21. Where the consequences of a violation are only capable of being wiped out partially, the affording of "just satisfaction" in application of Article 50 (art. 50) requires that:

(i) the Court has found "a decision or measure taken" by an authority of a Contracting State to be "in conflict with the obligations arising from the ... Convention";

(ii) there is an "injured party";

(iii) the Court considers it "necessary" to afford just satisfaction.

According to the Government, none of these conditions has been fulfilled in the present cases.

22. First, the Court's judgment of 18 June 1971 was, it is alleged, directed only to a situation created by a "certain deficiency in legislation and in case-law" which did not amount to a "decision" or "measure".

The Court cannot accept this view. In the cases brought before it which had their origin in petitions lodged under Article 25 (art. 25), the Court was not called upon to give a decision on an abstract problem relating to the compatibility of provisions of Belgian law with the Convention but on the specific case of the application of the provisions in law to the applicants (see the De Becker judgment of 27 March 1962, Series A, page 26). In questions of liability arising from the failure to observe the Convention there is in any event no room to distinguish between acts and omissions.

23. Nor can the existence of an "injured party" be denied. In the context of Article 50 (art. 50) these two words must be considered as synonymous with the term "victim" as used in Article 25 (art. 25); they denote the person directly affected by the act or omission which is in issue. De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp, whom the Commission rightly found to be victims in declaring their petitions admissible, are thus also "injured parties".

24. On the other hand, the Government is correct in questioning the existence of damage. Each of the applicants claims, as just satisfaction, the sum of 300 BF per day of detention. For this claim to be successful, it would be necessary that their deprivation of liberty had been caused by the absence - found by the Court to be contrary to Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention - of any right to take proceedings before a court by which the lawfulness of their detention might be decided. But this is not the case here. In its judgment of 18 June 1971, the Court did not find "either irregularity or arbitrariness in the placing of the three applicants at the disposal of the Government" and it had "no reason to find the resulting detention incompatible with Article 5 (1) (e) (art. 5-1-e) of the Convention" (Series A, pp. 38-39, para. 70). The Court therefore does not see how the taking of proceedings to test merely the point of lawfulness dealt with in the requirements of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) could have enabled the applicants to obtain their release any sooner.

Moreover, the applicants had the benefit of free legal aid before the Commission, and later with the Commission’s Delegates, and they have not made any point concerning costs which they may have incurred without reimbursement.

Finally, the Court does not find that in the present cases any moral damage could have been caused by the lack of a remedy which met the requirements of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4).

25. Although, for the reasons given above, the Court finds it has to refuse to grant the compensation claimed by the applicants, it notes that Belgium has taken, as the Committee of Ministers stated on 18 January 1972 in connection with Article 54 (art. 54) of the Convention, legislative measures with a view to ensuring in matters of vagrancy the application of the Convention in that State.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT,

1. Declares unanimously that the applicant’s claims for damages are admissible,

2. Declares by fourteen votes to one that the applicants’ claims for damages are not well-founded.

JOINT SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGES HOLMBÄCK, ROSS AND WOLD

Although we concur in the decision rendered by the Court we regret not to be able to agree with the reasons given for this decision on a particular point, namely the interpretation of Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention in paragraph 20 of the judgment.

It is a well known fact that this Article (art. 50) is modelled on clauses found in a number of arbitration treaties, e.g. the German-Swiss Treaty of Arbitration and Conciliation, 1921, Article 10, and the Geneva General Act for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes, 1928, Article 32 (see, for example, Heribert Golsong, Das Rechtsschutzsystem der Europäischen Menschenrechtskonvention (1958), p. 106). These clauses were inserted to deal with the situation that a State, although willing enough to fulfil its international obligations, for constitutional reasons is unable to do so without changing its Constitution. They confer on the arbitral tribunal the power to transform this obligation into an obligation to pay to the injured party an equitable satisfaction of another kind.

We assume that Article 50 (art. 50) serves the same purpose as these model clauses and that it should be interpreted accordingly. On this basis it is obvious that the article according to its wording does not apply to the cases before the Court.

It appears from the wording of Article 50 (art. 50) that this article applies only under the condition that "the internal law of the said Party", i.e. the Party who has taken a decision or measure completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the Convention, "allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure". Such reparation must in the present cases consist in the paying of compensation for damages, if any, incurred by the applicants as a consequence of the fact that their detention was ordered in contravention of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention. The applicants themselves assess their claim for compensation in the amount of 300 BF for each of them per day of unlawful detention.

So the question arises, whether or not internal Belgian law allows the Belgian State to make full reparation in the sense of paying full compensation to the applicants as claimed, assuming that their claim is well-founded. In our opinion the applicants have afforded no proof that Belgian law does not allow full reparation to be made, whereas the Belgian Agent has convincingly argued that Belgian law provides remedies for the granting of full compensation. It follows that the said condition for the application of Article 50 (art. 50) is not fulfilled.

The reasoning of the judgment in paragraph 20 is to the effect that although according to its wording Article 50 (art. 50) covers only situations in which the impossibility of making full reparation is due to the law of the State that has contravened the Convention, common sense suggests that the article a fortiori must apply also where the impossibility of restitutio in integrum follows from the very nature of the injury. This argument is, in our opinion, unsound. It presupposes that there is an absolute obligation on the State to restore to the applicants the liberty of which they have been deprived. But this cannot be so because of the maxim impossibilium nulla est obligatio.

The judgment operates with two hypothetical situations, the one "where the nature of the injury would make it possible to wipe out entirely the consequences of a violation" and the other where the very nature of the injury makes restitutio in integrum impossible. The Court sees no reason why "in the latter case just as in the former" the Court should not have the right to award just satisfaction. Of course the Court has the same right in both cases. But in both cases the competence of the Court is dependent upon the fact that the internal law does not allow full reparation. The consequences of a violation can never "be wiped out entirely". This criterion, which is completely alien to the text of Article 50 (art. 50) can only give rise to doubt and uncertainty. But even more serious is the fact that the judgment leads to the Court in fact assuming jurisdiction in respect to claims for reparation in all cases where full restitutio is impossible, regardless of the state of the internal law.

Our interpretation of Article 50 (art. 50) is in complete harmony with other provisions of the Convention and with the general ideas inherent in it concerning the enforcement of the obligations it imposes.

Thus, Article 5 (5) (art. 5-5) provides that "everyone who has been the victim of arrest or detention in contravention of this Article shall have an enforceable right to compensation". This provision clearly directs the injured party to seek redress in the courts of the State which has committed the contravention. More generally, Article 13 (art. 13) provides that "everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity". It would, indeed, be astonishing and disharmonious if Article 50 (art. 50), alongside this reference to national remedies, instituted a concurrent means of redress by direct application to this Court.

Further, in Article 53 (art. 53) the High Contracting Parties have undertaken to abide by the decision of the Court in any case to which they are parties. And in Article 54 (art. 54) it is provided that the judgment of the Court shall be transmitted to the Committee of Ministers which shall supervise its execution.

The general idea behind these various provisions obviously is that the Convention relies on the Contracting Parties to fulfil their obligations according to the Convention voluntarily by means of decisions and measures taken within their domestic jurisdiction. Relying on this willingness of the Contracting Parties to comply in good faith with their obligations, the general rule is that a party claiming to be injured must seek redress before the national courts and not before the European Court of Human Rights. There is one exception: if the national law of the State prevents it from making full reparation Article 50 (art. 50) confers on this Court the power to afford just satisfaction to the injured party.

For these reasons we hold that Article 50 (art. 50) does not apply in the cases now before the Court from which it follows that the Court lacks jurisdiction to deal with the applicant’s claims.

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE VERDROSS

(Translation)

I am in agreement with the Court's judgment but would like to add some general remarks on the interpretation of Article 50 (art. 50) of the Convention.

Under this provision the Court, after finding that the Convention has been violated, may "if necessary" afford "just satisfaction to the injured party", "if the internal law" of the respondent State "allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences" of the act that was held to be contrary to the Convention.

It clearly follows from the French text ("si le droit interne ... ne permet qu'imparfaitement d'effacer les conséquences") - as from the English text - that before it may make a decision on just satisfaction the Court must enquire whether the injured person can obtain adequate compensation by taking appropriate steps under the internal law of the respondent State.

If the Court comes to the conclusion that this question should be answered in the affirmative it seems to me that it is in accordance with the spirit and general system of the Convention for the Court first to allow the respondent State the option of granting the injured party adequate compensation under its own procedure. By acting in this way the Court retains its jurisdiction to assure itself that this satisfaction is provided in an adequate manner and within a reasonable time to be fixed by the Court.

It is true that one might counter this line of argument by saying that the respondent State could settle the matter with the injured party immediately after the judgment in which the Court found that the Convention had been violated. This solution, however, would seem to me to overlook the fact that in order to have legally adequate satisfaction there must always be impartial judicial proceedings. If, therefore, the respondent State makes such proceedings available to the injured party it has done all it can at the beginning to make reparation for the consequences of the violation of the Convention.

The need for the Court to give in the first place the respondent State the option of affording the injured party adequate satisfaction through its own courts is felt especially at the initial stage of the application of Article 50 (art. 50): on the Court's interpretation of this provision will depend the legislative measures which the States will have to take in order to comply with this interpretation.

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE MOSLER

(Translation)

I agree with the whole of the judgment. I would, however, like to add some remarks as to the scope of the Court's jurisdiction in connection with the obligation of the State concerned to make reparation through its own law and through its internal administrative and judicial procedures for the consequences of the violation imputed to it. In the present cases, the Court rightly remarked that it was not necessary to refrain from taking a decision until the applicants had applied for compensation to a Belgian court (see paragraph 20 in fine of the judgment). However, the relevant part of the judgment does not state whether the Court drew this conclusion merely from the twofold fact that in the three cases before it restitutio in integrum was impossible (paragraph 20) and that no pecuniary loss or moral damage could be found (paragraph 24) or whether it considered generally that Article 50 (art. 50), in referring to the internal law of the State in question, covers only the cases in which restitutio in integrum is possible and those where it is excluded by the very nature of the violation. It thus remains uncertain whether the Court should take the internal law into consideration in other situations where neither of these two last hypotheses applies.

I should like to explain the interpretation of Article 50 (art. 50) on which I have relied in concurring in this part of the reasons set out in the judgment.

1. In my opinion, Article 50 (art. 50) constitutes the basis of the Court's jurisdiction in all cases - including those mentioned in Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) - where just satisfaction ("une satisfaction équitable") is claimed by an applicant whose case before the European Commission of Human Rights has finally terminated in a decision by the Court establishing that the State in question has violated the Convention.

2. In all cases where the Court finds that there has been a violation resulting from a decision or measure taken by an authority of a High Contracting Party the Court must, in the very words of Article 50 (art. 50), enquire whether the internal law of the said Party allows reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure. This conclusion is essential on account of the broad wording used in the text as well as its intrinsic meaning.

3. It follows by implication from Article 50 (art. 50) that the obligation imposed on the High Contracting Parties by Article 53 (art. 53) of the Convention to abide by the decision of the Court includes a duty to make reparation for all the consequences which the violation has caused to the applicants whose complaint has led to the Court's judgment. This duty is therefore not limited to putting an end to the violation: it also extends to making good the damage suffered by the applicants. Although the duty to make good the damage resulting from an injury which has been established by the decision of an international court derives from general international law, it was necessary to confer expressly upon the Court, by a clause in the European Convention on Human Rights, jurisdiction to grant satisfaction to the person injured. Since the applicant is not party to the proceedings before the Court, the object of those proceedings, strictly speaking, is not the damage suffered by him but the violation of the Convention alleged against the respondent State. It follows that the effects of the judgment relate only to the finding of a violation; they do not extend to the consequences which the violation has involved for the person concerned. It was thus necessary to confer on the Court an additional jurisdiction enabling it in special circumstances to afford just satisfaction.

4. The first question to be investigated by the Court when applying Article 50 (art. 50) is therefore to determine exactly what these consequences are: the measures to be taken to ensure as complete a reparation as possible will depend on the answer to this question.

5. These measures will vary according to the nature of the damage suffered.

(a) If the nature of the violation allows of restitutio in integrum it is the duty of the State held liable to bring this about. For example, the consequences of an expropriation which has been declared unlawful by the Court must be wiped out by restoring the expropriated property. The Court has neither the jurisdiction nor the practical means to do this itself. If in such a case the national law only allows partial restitutio in integrum to be made, it is the Court which has to afford just satisfaction for those consequences of the injury for which it has not been possible to make reparation. It is for the Court to assess the effectiveness of the national law in this matter.

(b) If the nature of the injury prevents any restitutio in integrum, for example because the violation involved facts the effect of which cannot be retroactively removed, the violation may also have involved other consequences for which, by their nature, reparation can be made. Thus, the victim of a violation may have suffered pecuniary loss through having lost an opportunity of finding employment or by having had to pay his lawyer. It may likewise happen that equity demands that he should be granted compensation for moral damage. If, as in the vagrants' case, the primary consequences of the injury cannot be made good either by any internal law or by the Court the national legislature and administration may nevertheless provide for reparation for the secondary consequences.

In every case where such secondary damages are involved the Court has, in my opinion, jurisdiction to decide on them, no matter whether the internal law allows, does not allow, or allows only partial, reparation to be made. However one interprets the German-Swiss Treaty of Arbitration and Conciliation of 3 December 1921 (see paragraphs 16 and 20 of the judgment, and the address of the Commission's Principal Delegate) which together with other classical arbitration clauses served as a model for Article 50 (art. 50), this article does not restrict the Court's jurisdiction to cases involving restitutio in integrum or compensation for an irreversible act causing damage. The Court's jurisdiction extends to every kind of damage caused by the violation. This conclusion is based both on the very wording of Article 50 (art. 50), which is broader than that of the corresponding clauses in the above-mentioned treaties and on the special nature of the Convention, which is designed to ensure the protection of the individual (see, mutatis mutandis, the Wemhoff judgment of 27 June 1968, p. 23).

(c) The position must be the same if the injury can only be made good by pecuniary compensation, for example if something which has been unlawfully requisitioned is destroyed or lost and so cannot be restored to its owner.

6. Article 50 (art. 50) provides that when the Court is considering what satisfaction is just it shall take account of the remedies provided by the national law. The Court must enquire whether the national law allows or does not allow reparation to be made for the consequences of the violation or only allows partial reparation to be made and if necessary afford such satisfaction as it considers fair. If consideration of the national law were to be excluded with regard to all the other consequences of an injury the result would be that the substantive right to obtain damages and the remedies for the implementation of this right would have no effect on the Court's deliberations when it was dealing with a claim for reparation brought before it. The respondent State would lose the option of complying by its own means with the judgment establishing the violation. This would discourage the State from introducing in its national law provisions ensuring such satisfaction.

7. This interpretation does not, however, imply that the Court should require an applicant to exhaust the domestic remedies. That solution would amount to creating a new procedural hurdle similar to that in Article 26 (art. 26) and this was quite rightly excluded in paragraph 20 of the judgment. Nevertheless, the Court cannot itself take a decision until the applicant has attempted, by making use of the means available to him under the internal law, to obtain satisfaction from the national authorities. The Court has jurisdiction to assure itself that such satisfaction can be obtained within a reasonable time and that the result will be fair. If difficulties are encountered in obtaining satisfaction the Court can, bearing in mind the extremely long proceedings before the Commission (after exhaustion of the domestic remedies) and then before the Court itself, grant such compensation as it thinks fit, without being obliged to wait for the completion of the national proceedings. It has competence to decide according to the circumstances of each individual case to what extent it will await the result of the applicants' claims before the national authorities. It can lay down time-limits after the expiry of which it will examine the results achieved and itself decide on the question of satisfaction.

8. In the De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp cases the placing of the applicants in detention was, according to the judgment of 18 June 1971, lawful under the Belgian law in force at the time. Under Article 5 (1) (e) (art. 5-1-e) of the Convention the Court had to take the national law as its starting point. Thus, the primary injury was not the detention as such but the absence of any right to take proceedings before a "court" in accordance with the definition given in that judgment. The Belgian Act of 6 August 1971 establishing a remedy could not put this matter right retrospectively. It is the very nature of the violation which makes restitutio in integrum impossible. It is, however, conceivable that there might be secondary consequences to be made good. The Court rightly enquired whether such consequences existed in the present cases and I agree with it in thinking that there were none.

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE ZEKIA

I respectfully agree with the views expressed in the judgment of the Court, As to the Law, Part I on admissibility and Part II on the merits of the case, except the concluding declaratory part of the judgment embodied in the second part disentitling the applicants to damages altogether.

The Court, after finding the applicants' claims for damages admissible, declared that the claims for damages were not well-founded.

In its original judgment of 18 June 1971, the Court reserved for the applicants the right, should the occasion arise, to apply for just satisfaction on the issue relating to the breach of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention.

The applicants applied to the authorities in Belgium and later to the Commission for compensation as envisaged in the original judgment. Their application was turned down by the Belgian authorities and eventually reached this Court, through the Commission, for consideration. It is true the way the applicants framed their claim for damages was not an acceptable one. Once this Court declared in an unreserved final form that there was no breach of Article 5 (1) (e) (art. 5-1-e), any claim for damages relating to their detention and the duration of such detention or the nature of their detention - whether under Section 13 of 16 of the Belgian 1891 Act – becomes untenable. Their claim for damages, therefore, calculated on the basis of detention - per diem or otherwise - was rightly rejected.

What is left is the inconvenience caused to the applicants in their endeavour to vindicate their right to a judicial decision as to the legality of their detention. Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) makes it incumbent on the High Contracting Parties to the Convention to render available a court to deal summarily with cases of detainees under Article 5 (1) (art. 5-1) who dispute the legality of their detention, with a view to obtaining their release if such detention is found unlawful.

The Court found that there was no judicial forum answering the requirements of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) at the time the applicants were detained. They petitioned the Commission; their complaints were investigated and found to be admissible and in the reported opinion of the Commission the respondent State was found in contravention of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) of the Convention.

The case of the applicants was brought before the Court which in turn confirmed that there was violation of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4) by the respondent State.

Petitions to the Commission were filed by the applicants in the year 1966 and the judgment of this Court touching their complaints was delivered in the middle of 1971.

It was a right recognised to the vagrant applicants to dispute the lawfulness of their detention before a court of law in their own country which could deal with their recourse in a summary way. This right was denied to them. They had to petition the Commission of Human Rights and incur all expenses and inconvenience in presenting their case before the commissioners and later had to pursue their claims through the Commission before this Court. The applicants were entitled to know from a judicial authority in the country they lived, within a short time of the order for their detention, whether they were rightly or wrongly detained under the order of the police magistrate. Instead they had to travel a long way and wait for years to obtain a judicial decision as to whether they were rightly kept in detention. Instead of knowing within a matter of days whether they were rightly or wrongly detained they had to pursue a long cumbersome procedure before two international bodies of jurists in order to get the answer.

They are surely entitled to be reimbursed for the extra expenses incurred before the Commission and this Court. It is true that we do not exactly know whether they did incur any expense or if they did what was the amount incurred but this, I suggest, could easily be referred to the Registry of this Court to be ascertained and dealt with. In my view, the applicants ought not to be deprived of their costs in vindicating their rights in the way they did. Unless they acted in bad faith, or their petition was devoid of any merits, or their application could be described as frivolous or vexatious or an abuse of the process of the Court, I cannot see how they could be deprived of their costs. On the contrary the very fact that the Commission of Human Rights ruled that their petitions were admissible and in their reported opinion found that there was a contravention of Article 5 (4) (art. 5-4), strongly supports the view that the applicants acted in good faith and their case was not devoid of merit. In other words, they honestly believed that they were not lawfully detained and they had a case for judicial consideration.

Since our Court is competent to give just satisfaction to a victim of a violation of the provisions in the Convention, I entertain no doubt that we possessed the power to award costs to the applicants if we thought the circumstances of the case warranted such course.

EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

COURT (PLENARY)

CASES DE WILDE, OOMS AND VERSYP ("VAGRANCY")
v. BELGIUM

(Application no. 2832/66; 2835/66; 2899/66)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

18 November 1970

In the De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp cases,

The European Court of Human Rights, taking its decision in plenary session in accordance with Rule 48 of the Rules of Court, and composed of the following Judges:

Sir Humphrey WALDOCK, President
(Rules 21, paragraph 7, and 48, paragraph 3),

MM. H. ROLIN,
R. CASSIN,
Å.E.V. HOLMBÄCK,
A. VERDROSS,
G. MARIDAKIS,
E. RODENBOURG,
A.N.C. ROSS,

H. MOSLER,
M. ZEKIA,
A. FAVRE,
J. CREMONA,
S. BILGE,
G. WIARDA,
S. SIGURJÓNSSON,

and also Mr. M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr. J.F. SMYTH, Deputy Registrar,

Decides as follows on the question of procedure raised at the hearing of the afternoon of 17th November 1970:

Whereas, at the hearing on 17th November 1970, Mr. Sørensen, Principal Delegate of the Commission, announced to the Court the intention of the Delegates to avail themselves of the assistance of Me Magnée under Rule 29, paragraph 1, of the Rules of Court; whereas he indicated that Me Magnée, of the Brussels Bar, would furnish to the Court, under the control and responsibility of the Delegates, fuller explanations on certain points relating to the issues arising under Article 7 and Article 6, paragraph (3) (art. 7, art. 6-3), of the Convention; and whereas he informed the Court that on these matters the Delegates were insufficiently informed;

Whereas Mr. De Meyer, Agent for the Belgian Government, objected to the course of action intended by the Commission on the grounds that:

(a) the Commission, in his opinion, must be taken to be sufficiently informed on the points in question, seeing that in July 1969, it had drawn up its final report stating its findings of the facts in the present cases;

(b) since Me Magnée had been counsel for the three individual claimants before the Commission, the application of Rule 29, paragraph 1, intended by the Delegates would defeat the provisions of Article 44 (art. 44) and the whole spirit of the Convention under which, according to Mr. De Meyer, individuals may not plead before the Court;

Whereas under Article 44 (art. 44) of the Convention "only High Contracting Parties and the Commission shall have the right to bring a case before the Court" ("Seules les Hautes Parties Contractantes et la Commission ont qualité pour se présenter devant la Cour"); whereas it follows that "Contracting States and the Commission are alone empowered to bring a case before the Court or to appear in Court" - comparaître juridiquement - (Lawless Judgment of 14th November 1960, p. 15);

Whereas Rule 29, paragraph 1, of the Rules of Court provides that the Delegates of the Commission "may, if they so desire, have the assistance of any person of their choice"; whereas, furthermore, any person appointed by the Delegates in accordance with Rule 29, paragraph 1, may be called upon to speak in the hearings before the Court (Rule 37 of the Rules of Court);

Whereas Rule 29, paragraph 1, recognises for the Delegates a right which it is for them to exercise "if they so desire", that is to say, by appreciating at each stage of the proceedings before the Court the usefulness of availing themselves of that right;

Whereas Rule 29, paragraph 1, does not place any limit on the freedom of the Delegates in their choice of persons to assist them; and whereas, therefore, it does not preclude them, inter alia, from having the assistance of the lawyer or former lawyer of an individual applicant;

Whereas the Court has previously held in its Lawless Judgment of 7th April 1961, page 24, that nothing precludes the Commission from asking "the applicant to nominate a person to be available to the Commission’s Delegates"; and whereas in the same judgment the Court further held that "it did not follow that the person in question has any locus standi in judicio" (ibidem);

Whereas, by the very terms of Rule 29, paragraph 1, the role of such a person consists of assisting the Delegates of the Commission whose main function is to assist the Court (Lawless Judgment of 14th November 1960, page 11);

Whereas, in consequence, the person assisting the Delegates must restrict himself in his statements to presenting to the Court explanations on points indicated to him by the Delegates, and this always subject to the control and responsibility of the Delegates;

Whereas it is the duty of the Delegates to ensure the observance of this fundamental requirement by any person assisting them, in order to avoid any situation inconsistent with Article 44 (art. 44) of the Convention;

Whereas, in any event, it is for the Court, whose President directs the hearings, "to ensure that the Convention is respected and, if need be, to point to any irregularities" (see mutatis mutandis Lawless Judgment of 14th November 1960, page 12);

FOR THESE REASONS,

Takes note, by sixteen votes against one, of the intention of the Delegates of the Commission to entrust Me Magnée with the task of assisting them at the hearing of 18th November 1970;

Decides to proceed with the examination of the merits of the cases.

Done in English and French, the English text being authentic, at the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, this eighteenth day of November one thousand nine hundred and seventy.

In accordance with Article 51 (2) (art. 51-2) of the Convention and Rule 50 (2) of the Rules of Court the separate concurring opinion of Judge Rolin and the dissenting opinion of Judge Favre are annexed to the present judgment.

SEPARATE CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE ROLIN

(Translation)

I realise that, in view of its Rules 29 and 37, the Court cannot object to the Commission having the assistance of any person of its choice, in this case the Belgian lawyer Me Magnée, or to his addressing the Court. But I still think it would be unacceptable for Me Magnée, who appeared before the Commission as counsel for the applicants, to address the Court "in the name of the Commission" as Mr. Sørensen, Delegate, appeared to suggest at the hearing on 17th November.

Moreover, I think that to hear counsel for the applicants can only be justified if he confines himself to those new points raised in the written and oral proceedings before the Court on which the Commission considers it was not sufficiently informed previously and with which it therefore could not deal in its report.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE FAVRE

(Translation)

The Commission may have the assistance, according to Rule 29 of the Rules of Court, of any person of its choice. It may therefore have the assistance of the applicant's lawyer, which is usually the case.

But Rule 29 needs to be interpreted in the light of Article 44 (art. 44) of the Convention, which provides that only the High Contracting Parties and the Commission shall have the right to bring a case before the Court.

The Commission's task is to defend the public interest. It cannot be represented, even partially, by the applicant's lawyer, who acts on the applicant's behalf.

The applicant's lawyer may not speak at the Court's hearing on behalf of the Commission or in order to submit an opinion different from the Commission's.

He could be heard by the Court only under Rule 38 of the Rules of Court, which enables the Court to hear any person whose statements seem likely to assist it in the carrying out of its task. In such case, it is the Court that would say on what facts it desires explanations.

The Court's judgment does not seem compatible with Article 44 (art. 44) of the Convention. It departs from an established practice. I cannot approve it.
